Rolling Back Time

Wilmington, N. C.

ARMED with high-powered charts, maps, and legal counsel, and marching under the shop-worn "road to socialism" banner, a group of real-estate men have delayed the construction of a public-housing project in Wilmington for a year now and may hold it up for another year. So far they have lost every skirmish: state commissions, city councils, and the Superior Court have denied their claims. Now they are seeking a decision by the state Supreme Court.

A year ago, when the Housing Authority of the City of Wilmington was looking for a site for a 150-unit project, its eye chanced to light on some fallow fields lying beyond an outlying industrial district, and that, it decided, was the place. It did not know, or if it knew felt safe in ignoring, that a number of real-estate dealers, headed by Richard A. Shew, planned a residential development in the neighborhood and had spent money laying out streets, blocks, and utility systems on nice-looking charts.

At first the project went forward smoothly. After clearing things with Washington, the city asked the state Utilities Commission for authority to condemn the so-called Willard Street area for a public-housing site. Willard Street, by the way, existed only on paper, although it had been dedicated at formal ceremonies some time before. Last August 3 the Utilities Commission notified the city that condemnation could proceed.

The real-estate men, who had been fuming none too quietly up till then, promptly came out into the open with full-page newspaper advertisements and with protests to the county commissioners and the City Council. They notified the Utilities Commission of their intention to appeal its ruling and obtained a court injunction prohibiting the city from beginning to build. On October 15 they appeared in the New Hanover County Superior Court to defend the injunction, having engaged Ozmer Henry, a crack Lumberton lawyer, as their chief counsel at a reputed $500 a day in court. Their case rested on two points: first, they contended the project would break the Housing Authority's own rule of thumb by increasing public housing to more than 20 per cent of local substandard units; and, second, that without state legislation the city could not take over a street that had been dedicated.

They also had an imposing sheaf of signed affidavits protesting against the housing project, including some, they said, from public officials. The only one by an official they produced was a statement from a worker in the juvenile court who observed that she thought it would be better to have the project on the other side of town. The rest of the affidavits were from the dealers who had planned the new development and who foresaw a decline in the value of their property if the project were built.

On October 23 Judge Walter J. Bone dissolved the injunction prohibiting the city from proceeding. One might have thought the question was settled. But it was not. On November 9 the real-estate men appeared before the City Council, armed again with Ozmer Henry. Their chief claim now was that the project would prevent access to their property. In the manner of most governing boards, the council decided to settle the matter temporarily by dodging it, and voted to have the city Planning Board look into it. But the Planning Board sent it right back to the council, saying that it had no jurisdiction over the case. The council disliked to make a decision that could not be popular but finally, on November 22, upheld the Housing Authority.

Early this month, however, the real-estate men were at it again, this time in Superior Court, appealing from the Utilities Commission's first ruling. Judge John J. Burney added another rebuff to those they had already met when he turned their appeal down. But even that was not enough. Noting that two new justices had recently been named to the state Supreme Court and apparently hoping for a new era in state law, the real-estate men immediately appealed Judge Burney's decision to the higher court. There the case rests at present.

The opponents of the housing project have hoped to make it a test case, possibly even to roll back time with it. In their oratory before court and council the road-to-socialism theme has been emphasized too frequently, too hotly and even obsessively, to be wholly insincere. Of all economic groups the real-estate dealers seem to have been most disgruntled by the public-housing laws, the slum-clearance projects, the home loans, the rent controls. Their motives are plain. Some of the affidavits are so frankly selfish as to be almost disarming. These men had property, they planned to make money on it; then the city came along and tried to spoil it for them. They are not going to let the city ruin their plans if they can stop it.

Of course hardly anybody goes to court without a clear selfish reason for it. But a look at the sagging porches in the poorer districts of Wilmington, at the windows stuffed with newspapers, at the toilet bowls standing in the open in the middle of the back yards is enough to show why in this case selfishness should not prevail.

JOHN POWELL

AN AMBASSADOR TO THE VATICAN?

PRESIDENT TRUMAN has announced that as soon as Congress reconvenes he will again submit to the Senate the name of General Mark Clark as ambassador to the Holy See. Would sending an ambassador to the principle of separation of church and state? What would it have on American prestige abroad and on internal Italian politics? In an early issue The Nation will analyze the constitutionality and political implications of the proposed move. Among other contributors Mark de Wolfe Howe of Harvard Law School will discuss the constitutional issue, Joseph Blau of the Department of Philosophy of Columbia University will review the interesting relations of United States-Vatican diplomatic relations. An editorial will sum up the issues and state The Nation's position.

NOWADAYS MANY CALIFORNIANS REFER TO Senator William Knowland as "the Senator from Formosa." Scarcely a week passes without some new Knowland intervention on behalf of the Chiang Kai-shek regime. The Senator's carefully timed charges against the Chinese Communists—that they are unlawfully detaining Americans in China, that they seek to extort funds from Chinese Americans with relatives in China—keep the spotlight on Peking and envelop Formosa in a charitable obscurity. In the meantime one hears very little about Senator Wayne Morse's resolution calling for an investigation of the China lobby, the need for which has been emphasized by Robert S. Allen's account of the mysterious purchasing agencies, commissions, and offices maintained in New York and Washington by Chiang Kai-shek. The list includes, among many others: Allied Syndicate, Inc., headed by Dr. R. H. Kung, brother-in-law of Chiang; Yangtze Trading Corporation, headed by Dr. H. H. Kung, son of R. H. Kung; Fu Chung Corporation, headed by T. V. Soong, another of Chiang's brothers-in-law; Ho Chong Company, headed by Dr. P. W. Taou; Wah Chang Corporation; Chinese Petroleum Corporation; and Central Trust Company of China. In fact, the Chinese Nationalists are said to maintain more agencies and purchasing commissions in this country than either Britain or France. It is time that this far-flung network of agencies was thoroughly investigated. An investigation might even explain why Senator Knowland continues to defend the Formosa regime with the passion of an advocate. *

AN EXPLOSION OF METHANE GAS IN A COAL mine at West Frankfort, Illinois, on December 21, cost 119 lives, the heaviest toll in any mine disaster since 1928. Only after detailed investigation will it be possible to learn exactly what happened and whose was the responsibility, but there is reason to believe that once again tragedy has struck at a mining community because profits were placed above safety. According to James Westfield, Regional Accident Prevention and Health Director of the Bureau of Mines, this was an "absolutely preventable disaster" due to "somebody's carelessness." The gassy condition of the pit appears to have been known for some time. Last July two federal inspectors recommended that abandoned workings, where gas tends to collect, should be sealed or, alternatively, that air used to ventilate them should not be circulated through other parts of the mine. These recommendations were ignored by Mine Superintendent John R. Foster who has declared that they were "controversial" and that anyway he was under no legal obligation to follow them. This recalls the terrible explosion at the Centralia Number 5 mine, also in southern Illinois, in March, 1947. In that case repeated warnings of the dangerously dusty condition of the pit were given by both state and federal inspectors and by United Mine Workers local officers. But the Centralia management was unwilling to interrupt profitable coal-getting to clean up the pit and adopt safeguards against dust explosions, and the State Department of Mines, which had the power to crack down, failed through carelessness or connivance to do so. In view of the inadequacy of state mining codes and their frequently lax enforcement, John L. Lewis is thoroughly justified in pressing for a federal inspection law with teeth in it. We hope that the West Frankfort tragedy will move Congress to action before more blood is smeared on our coal. *

BROADCASTING TO THE BRITISH PEOPLE ON December 22, Prime Minister Churchill warned against attaching "any exaggerated hopes or importance to my visit to Washington." Nevertheless, the composition of the large party accompanying him indicates that he himself attaches the greatest possible importance to his talks with President Truman and that he expects to cover the whole range of Anglo-American relations. In addition to Foreign Secretary Eden, he will have at his side Lord Ismay, Secretary for Commonwealth Relations, Lord Cherwell, his chief adviser on scientific matters and supervisor of Britain's atomic research, Field Marshal Sir William Slim, Chief of the Imperial General Staff, and a number of high-ranking military and civilian experts. Doubts have been expressed that Mr. Churchill will request further specific economic aid, despite Britain's mounting economic difficulties, but there can hardly be any realistic discussion of rearmament problems and military policy without reference to these difficulties. And if he intends to talk frankly, Mr. Churchill can hardly refrain from pointing out to the President and his colleagues the dangers of overstraining the economies of the European members of NATO. Moreover, his recent statements suggest that he is less fearful of Russian aggression than most Washington officials and still clings to the belief that relations with Moscow can be improved by top-level negotiations. With this in view he may urge greater efforts to bring the Korean truce talks to a speedy and successful conclusion—a necessary preliminary to a new approach to Russia. Will he also urge reconsideration of the American belief that the German problem is non-negotiable? It is difficult to see how he can avoid doing so since it is clear that German rearmament is the most formidable obstacle blocking the road to mitigation of the cold war.

AS AMERICANS FOR DEMOCRATIC ACTION approaches its fifth birthday, a salute is due this liberal organization for the way in which it has developed an increasingly affirmative program. As an avowedly anti-Communist group, A. D. A. faced the danger that its leaders might fritter away their energies in sterile declarations of antagonism to the Soviet system. But A. D. A. has not allowed its dislike of communism to blind it to serious threats to liberty at home. Last year Congressmen close to A. D. A. were among the few who opposed the McCarran "anti-subversive" act when dozens of "liberals" voted for a measure they privately despised. Now A. D. A. has issued a timely pamphlet demanding repeal of the Smith act. Emphasizing "action" as it does, A. D. A. can be relied upon to follow up this verbal broadside by filing amicus curiae briefs in pending prosecutions and by organizing a movement for repeal of the act. A. D. A. has reason for pride in the stand it has taken, and we wish it a continuing useful future.

IN HIS ANNUAL CHRISTMAS MESSAGE THE Pope indirectly answered those who would send an American ambassador to the Vatican in order to establish close links between the two major anti-Communist forces in the West. He emphasized again the church's neutrality in the conflict between East and West and its unwillingness to enter into an alliance with any temporal power. This position has of course been repeatedly stressed in the Vatican, especially by Count Della Torre, editor of L'Osservatore Romano. But never so far as we remember has the Pope himself given it such explicit approval. Echoing previous Christmas messages which attacked communism and denounced the governments of Eastern Europe, the speech also indicated the Vatican's lack of confidence in American world policy as well as its disapproval of the "widespread weakness of a world which loves emphatically to call itself 'the free world'." The Holy See believes that communism cannot be destroyed by war; as a doctrine with a super-national appeal it can be defeated only by another super-national doctrine, that is, Catholicism. It follows that the Catholic church rather than the United States is equipped to lead the fight against communism and that Washington should recognize this fact. All of which has—or should have—an important bearing on Mr. Truman's announced intention to force the issue of Vatican recognition in the reconvened Congress.

No Day of Triumph

ON Christmas night Harry T. Moore, who had led a long and brave fight for Negro rights, was bombed to death in Mims, Florida. He died as he was being rushed to the hospital by his brother-in-law, Master Sergeant George Simms, just returned from fourteen months in Korea. It was Simms who, in the middle of the night, found the bleeding and dying Moore in the shambles of his home after it had been bombed, not with dynamite but with nitro-glycerine, or TNT. Even the "white folks" of Brevard County concede that Harry Moore was "a good law-abiding citizen." The day he died was, indeed, no day of triumph for American democracy.

The Nation does not need to indulge in any post facto expressions of outrage over this latest act of Florida violence. Two fine pieces by Stetson Kennedy (November 24, December 22), and two editorial comments (December 15) called the attention of Nation readers to the increase of violence in Florida and the meaning of this violence. When on November 6, Samuel Shepard, one of the Groveland defendants, was murdered by a Florida sheriff, we wired President Truman, then vacationing in Key West, urging him to speak out against the rule of terror in Florida and suggesting that he demand action from his Attorney General. Sending the wire required no special insight. In a sense Harry T. Moore was murdered because the rising tide of violence was ignored.

But what is truly tragic about the death of Moore is that even now those who should know better refuse to acknowledge the harsh meaning of his death. For example, the editorials in the New York Times and the Herald Tribune of December 28, with their phrases about this "creeping sickness" and "faceless menace" and about a "wave of crimes . . . arising from racial bias," were not only irritatingly irrelevant but clearly evasive.

The bombing murder of Harry T. Moore was part of a clear pattern of open force directed against the struggle of racial minorities to win full rights as citizens. Moore was a symbol of this struggle. So was John Lester Mitchell, one of three Negro plaintiffs in a suit to win voting rights in Louisiana, who was shot by a deputy sheriff on November 19. So was the Reverend J. A. Delaine, chairman of the parents' committee in the Clarendon, South Carolina, school case, whose home was recently burned to the ground by way of reprisal. These crimes cannot be understood as senseless acts of depraved or prejudiced individuals. On the contrary, they were essentially political crimes, crimes deliberately committed for a purpose.

The struggle for full civil rights for Negroes, as we have pointed out, entered upon a new phase with the filing of the suit which sought to end segregation in the public schools of Clarendon, South Carolina. Coming in the wake of a series of important civil-rights victories in the Supreme Court, this suit threatened the entire edifice of segregation and white supremacy, since it involved, not a few individual Negroes, but all Negroes of school age in almost every Southern state. The Dixiecrats were quick to see that if the trend of which this suit was part was not reversed, the existing social pattern in the South would be seriously undermined. It was not the crackpots but the Bourbon leaders who voiced the first threats and thereby revived the always present danger of mass violence.

Governor James Byrnes of South Carolina, remembered as a not too successful former Secretary of State, sounded the first alarm. "In Reconstruction days," he said, "a carpetbag government tried to do it [force the South to abandon segregated schools] and failed. A Democratic Administration cannot now do what a Republican Administration could not then do." In Georgia, Governor Herman Talmadge introduced a constitutional amendment that would turn the school system over to private individuals should the courts ever order integration of Negro and white schools. A major political aide, Roy Harris, threatened that if segregation should be outlawed, Negroes would be driven forcibly from fifty Georgia counties, and Talmadge himself said that integration "would create more confusion, disorder, riots, and bloodshed than anything since the War Between the States. . . . There are not enough troops or police in the United States to enforce such an order." Governor Fielding Wright announced that Mississippi would enforce segregation "regardless of the costs or consequences." The Alabama legislature warned: "We will not submit to the intermingling of races in the public schools."

No clearer declaration of defiance of law and provocation to violence could be possible than these statements. What they mean, and were intended to mean, is that the South will never voluntarily abandon the system which has kept Negroes "in their place" these many decades. Segregation is part of a strategy of dominance, the ultimate sanction of which is force. It is absurd, therefore, to condemn the unknown and perhaps demented individual who placed the bomb under Harry Moore's home without condemning the pattern of "force and violence" upon which the structure of white supremacy rests. It is equally absurd to inveigh against "racial prejudice" or KKK hoodlums without condemning the elected public officials who incited the violence which, for special reasons, has broken out in Florida but may soon spread throughout the South. This is the same phenomena that came with the organization of the KKK in the Reconstruction period: it is political terror, instigated by Bourbons and applied by Kluxers, to prevent the real emancipation of Negroes in the South. Once before a "deal" robbed Negroes of the full fruits of the victory of the Union forces in the Civil War. Today the "coalition" between Dixiecrats and Taft Republicans being engineered by Senator Karl Mundt and others threatens to repeat in 1952 the famous bargain of 1876. If this coalition becomes a reality, it will rob Negroes of the civil-rights gains of the New Deal and the last six years as surely as the bargain of 1876 robbed them of the protection of the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments.

Not to recognize this is also to miss the clear meaning of contemporary events of major historical importance. For the murder of Harry T. Moore is likely to bring about an imponderable change in the political thinking of American Negroes. It was not the Negro leadership that proposed a huge meeting in Birmingham, Alabama, to protest the murder of Moore; the idea came from rank-and-file Negroes whose patience is utterly exhausted not merely with Dixiecrat provocation but with the relaxed middle-class attitudes of some of their leaders, who have been quite willing to issue further political bills of credit to Mr. Truman on the basis of his stale civil-rights speeches of 1948 and the lesser-evil premise. If these leaders show reluctance to challenge the threatened forfeiture of gains made in the last decade, the Negro people see the danger and will no longer be put off with feeble promises and slippery phrases. The bells that tolled for Harry Moore may thus have sounded the political death knell of Harry Truman. The Moore bombing was not another "incident"; it was a date in history.

Murder by Bombing

Jacksonville, December 28

THE murder by bombing of Harry T. Moore, Florida secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, brought to a new peak the wave of terrorism which has engulfed the state in recent weeks. It was, perhaps, the inevitable result of official impotence in the face of the vicious onslaughts that have been directed against Negroes, Jews, and Catholics.

Moore was killed by the blast from a bomb planted under the bedroom of his home; his wife was so seriously injured that she has but a fifty-fifty chance to live. The couple had celebrated their twenty-fifth wedding anniversary on Christmas day.

"I don't care much if I live," Mrs. Moore has said from her hospital bed in Sanford. "My home is wrecked, my children are all grown, others can carry on." Moore was apparently not unaware of danger to himself and family; talking with his mother recently, he had said, "Every advancement comes by way of sacrifice."

The forty-six-year-old Moore was a fighter for democratic progress. Eight years ago he was fired from his post as superintendent of the Brevard County Negro High School for prosecuting to the state Supreme Court a suit for the abolition of racial differentials in teachers' salaries. More recently he served as head of the Progressive Voters' League of Florida—not an affiliate of the Progressive Party—which has been instrumental in qualifying and mobilizing Florida Negroes as voters. In last year's Senatorial contest Moore unseated and replaced a leader of the league who had come out for George Smathers, campaigning on a "Southern traditions" platform against Claude Pepper. At a recent convention of the Florida N. A. A. C. P. an effort was made to unseat Moore as secretary on the ground that he was involving the organization in politics, but Moore insisted on the necessity for political action, and a majority of the delegates rallied to his support.

As in the case of the Miami bombings, attempts have been made to explain the murder of Moore as a "Communist plot," but Mrs. Moore for one puts no stock in the suggestion. William Hendrix, Grand Dragon of the Florida Ku Klux Klan and a money-spending candidate for the governorship, has issued the customary Klan disclaimer and offer to assist investigators, adding, "Moore was a good fellow who was trying to help his race, but he just found out he was going about it wrong." In an exceedingly rare move two Negroes have been included in the six-man coroner's jury—perhaps as a result of The Nation's pointing out the farcical aspects of the lily-white jury which whitewashed Willis McCall, "the shooting sheriff," in adjoining Lake County. As in the Lake County and Miami affairs, both Governor Fuller Warren and Attorney General J. Howard McGrath have sent in "investigators," but thus far neither state nor federal agencies have preferred charges or even summoned grand juries. Governor Warren, by the way, has gone to great pains to claim that all his actions were taken prior to, or at least without regard to, demands made upon him by the N. A. A. C. P. and other civil-rights groups. Public and private groups have offered rewards in the several cases totaling nearly $20,000—to no avail. If local, state, and federal authorities are, indeed, doing their utmost to apprehend the Florida terrorists, it is a sad commentary on the proficiency of our law-enforcement agencies. It might help, perhaps, if J. Edgar Hoover were to send a team of non-Southern FBI investigators to Florida.

STETSON KENNEDY

The NATION

Britain's Middle Course

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Paris, December 20 (delayed)

ON EVERY major question that has come before the present U. N. Assembly the British delegation has voted with the American. This has surprised no one who understands the dependence imposed by the Atlantic alliance. Whenever there has been any sign of a split which might be exploited by the Russians, the United States has demanded that its allies form a common front, and American-British-French solidarity has at once been reestablished.

Nevertheless, the British have made it plain, as far as they could without imperiling Anglo-American collaboration, that their views often differ, if not fundamentally at least by several shades, from those of the Americans. The unwarlike tone used by Mr. Eden in his opening speech in the general debate was maintained by Selwyn Lloyd in the Political Committee during the debate on disarmament. Mr. Lloyd's efforts to have a commission set up which would at least assure a continuation of the discussions and the exploration of all possible paths to eventual agreement clearly revealed the desire of the British government not to push the containment policy to the limit. In his speech of December 11 Mr. Lloyd proposed that this commission, "in deference to Russian wishes," be called the "atomic-energy and conventional-armaments commission," and showed in other ways that he was searching for a middle road between the American and Soviet positions.

The same moderation was displayed by the British in the debate on whether the U. N. should supervise German elections. In everything they said it was apparent that they would not agree lightly to German rearmament as long as there remained any hope of a settlement with Moscow. With their innate political realism they understand that of all the issues dividing East and West, German rearmament is perhaps the only one on which the Russians cannot logically be expected to retreat. The British know that they are dealing with an adversary who is not swayed by emotion; so they base their hope of avoiding war on the Kremlin's reluctance to start something it could not stop. At the same time they know that for Russia, German rearmament is a special case and that the Western powers would be taking a terribly risky gamble in insisting on it.

On less important questions, such as the election of a new member to the Security Council, the British did break with the Americans, voting for Byelorussia and against Greece until the last ballot. They would undoubtedly have pushed their mediation efforts more vigorously outside the Assembly if the Russians had not indicated that they felt concessions would be futile in view of the American determination to rearm West Germany. The British delegation was also inhibited by Churchill's impending visit to the United States.

One gets the impression that the British do not consider war inevitable. They subscribe to some extent to the American theory about positions of strength, but while the United States is unwilling to enter into negotiations with the Russians until these positions have been attained, the British want to negotiate along the way. In fact, they show a disposition to seize any opportunity for serious discussion. Churchill declared openly that he would like to talk with Stalin, and the U. N. British delegation tried hard to have the sessions of the current Assembly utilized to diminish the tension. Above all, the British have been anxious to take no steps in any direction that might make the situation worse. If it had been less critical they would surely have been tougher with the Egyptians. They believe moderation more indicated than bluster, and they are even considering facilitating new arrangements in Libya if they can remain on the Suez only at the risk of war.

It is a bad sign when the work of the United Nations has less weight than international decisions taken outside; the influence of the League of Nations declined as soon as a similar development took place. Western European governments are placing much hope on the Truman-Churchill conversations. They believe public opinion in America will be affected by the personality of the British Premier, who for all his imperialist and reactionary views has more imagination and intellectual boldness than most of the Labor Party leaders. And people here remember his speech in the Mansion House, when he said that "Great Britain has every need and every right to seek and receive the fullest consideration from the Americans for our point of view." Both he and Mr. Eden, moreover, have shown that they agree with Aneurin Bevan that the tempo of rearmament demanded by the Americans would force the country into bankruptcy. Yesterday the talk in the corridors of the Palais de Chaillot was less about what happened in this committee or that than about the energetic stand of the Belgian government—not a "red" or Socialist government but one much admired by the Americans—against the demand of the Atlantic Council that Belgium spend more money on rearmament.

The reservations of the British in the North Atlantic Council meeting at Rome and in the European Council at Strasbourg showed that if they were free they would adopt an armament program much closer to the Bevan conception of what is possible than to the requests issuing from General Eisenhower's headquarters. As to the European army, they would prefer to have no part in it, since they view it as the first step toward the sort of European federation—with a common Parliament and common finances—they have steadfastly opposed. But on his recent visit to Paris Mr. Churchill apparently felt he must edge toward the American position on the question of a European army.

In United Nations circles it is feared that when Mr. Churchill asks President Truman for a new loan and other dollar aid, he will find America in an unfavorable mood—official Washington is against his proposed visit to Stalin, and the people think Europe should prepare its own defense by rearming at any cost. Yet there can be no doubt that Great Britain's acute economic difficulties are caused principally by the Atlantic coalition's rearmament demands.

Uncomfortable Prosperity

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

THE year just ended may be best described as a period of uncomfortable prosperity; that now beginning promises more of the same—a very high rate of economic activity and larger money incomes combined with strains, stresses, shortages, and fears for the future which will give prosperity a rather sour taste.

Many economic records were broken in 1951. According to Secretary of Labor Maurice J. Tobin, the total output of goods and services was 10 per cent higher than in 1950 and 5 per cent above 1944, the previous all-time peak. But this addition to the nation's gross income was absorbed by arms expenditure or by new investment mainly of a defense-supporting nature. And although personal income reached a new high in terms of dollars, the purchasing power of the average American was little greater owing to a 7 per cent rise in the cost-of-living index and a bigger tax bill.

Employment figures reached an all-time high in August, when 62,600,000 men and women had jobs and less than 3 per cent of the labor force was unemployed. Many trades in many areas have been complaining about labor shortages. Nevertheless, there is also unemployment or underemployment in some industries adversely affected by the diversion of raw materials to defense. Workers in other industries, notably textiles, clothing, and shoes, suffered from substantial layoffs when consumer demand for such goods fell sharply after inventories had been built up in anticipation of continued "panic" buying. As a result we have such paradoxical situations as that in New England, where textiles, shoes, rubber, and paper plants are providing 18,000 fewer jobs than a year ago, while employment in metal-working industries is up by 101,000.

The impetus of the boom which began with the outbreak of the Korean war has been provided by government expenditure and private investment, with the second of these factors of major importance. Up to last June the federal government was not contributing directly to inflationary pressures since revenue exceeded expenditure. Since then it has been accumulating a deficit, but because of surplus social-security and other non-budgetary receipts actual cash income has been only slightly smaller than cash outlay. On the other hand, private investment in houses, plant, equipment, and inventories, financed to a considerable extent on credit, has been expanding more rapidly than at any other time in our history. Such investment has an inflationary force, since it adds to the stream of income but not immediately to the available supply of consumable goods.

The chief unknown quantity in the 1952 economic equation is the total of private investment. Government expenditure is bound to increase, and assuming no further changes in taxes, a cash deficit for the year of some $7,000,000,000 seems probable. However, some observers believe that the effects of this deficit will be largely offset by a contraction in private investment. House-building, they point out, is being curtailed by credit restrictions, so that total "starts" in 1952 may be no more than 800,000 compared with the 1950 record of 1,400,000. Industrial and commercial construction and public works also seem likely to decline. All forms of commercial building are now subject to government licensing and control, and the National Production Authority has indicated that all applications made during the next six months will be turned down unless "defense necessity" can be proved. This means that few new stores, theaters, office buildings, or hotels will be started; lack of structural steel and other materials is expected to cut construction of schools, highways, and hospitals.

Expenditure on producers' equipment may also decline moderately in the next twelve months. The defense industries have already undertaken much of their "tooling-up," and purchases of new equipment by civilian industries seem likely to lag in view of the fact that material shortages and increased taxes are dimming profit prospects. But the form of private investment most likely to be curtailed during 1952 is that in inventories. In the twelve months after the beginning of the Korean war the threat of shortages—although not the immediate reality—persuaded consumers to buy everything in sight. Anticipation of continuance of this demand encouraged a reckless scramble to build up inventories.

of $15,900,000,000 per annum, according to Department of Commerce estimates, which compares with an actual increase of $4,300,000,000 in 1950. Then there was a sudden change in the public mood, sparked by the New York "price war," which indicated that the fear of shortages had been much exaggerated, followed by a noticeable decline in consumer demand for automobiles, household appliances, furnishings, and clothes. Weekly department-store sales figures began to compare unfavorably with those of a year earlier. As a result many business men sought to cut back their swollen inventories, and in the third quarter of 1951 the annual rate of increase fell back to $6,100,000,000.

However, overstocking and consumer resistance have not yet led to serious price-cutting. The retail-price index has, in fact, continued to creep up to a new high and has not reflected the moderate fall in wholesale prices from their peak last March. Since Christmas sales failed to fulfil the hopes of most retailers, a good many bargains may appear in the stores during the next few weeks. The midwinter catalogues of the big mail-order houses list impressive mark-downs on hundreds of items, including clothes, furniture, tires, television sets, refrigerators, and shoes. Price reductions in these and other consumer goods, if they prove general and stick, may offset the still rising tendency of rents and food and serve to stabilize the cost-of-living index.

On the other hand, we have to remember that production of all kinds of consumer goods containing metals is likely to be sharply reduced in the coming months. For instance, allotments of aluminum for civilian industries have been set at only 20 per cent of their pre-Korean consumption, and the use of steel, copper, zinc, and other metals by non-essential industries is also to be greatly restricted. Thus while supplies of soft goods may remain fairly plentiful, stocks of "durables" will tend to decline.

Looking at the whole economic picture, my own view is that, more by luck than cunning, we have reached a stage of rather precarious equilibrium. If the cold war is intensified, or if the military are permitted by the Administration and Congress to plan for a still greater expansion of armaments, or if our long record of good harvests is broken, then we may expect the forces making for inflation to regather their strength. On the other hand, if the government listens to the economists and business men who are urging a moderate check to the pace of rearmament, and if wage increases are restricted to amounts that can be paid without increases in prices, we may be able to keep our economy in balance during the next twelve months.

That would make prosperity a little easier to live with, although it is bound to remain an uncomfortable roommate as long as it is based fundamentally on the production of weapons which we must pray are ultimately destined for the junk pile. While we devote ourselves to making guns we worry about what will happen if they go off and also about what will happen if they don't. Two or three years hence the defense blueprints will have been fulfilled, and we shall find ourselves with an immense stock of weapons and an industrial capacity expanded out of proportion to the normal growth of civilian demand. Shall we then suddenly discover that instead of a plethora of money and a shortage of goods we have to cope with a plethora of goods and a shortage of money? Are we destined once again to fall from the frying pan of inflation into the fire of deflation? These are questions that farsighted economists are beginning to ask, and we ought at least to begin thinking about the answers.

Anaconda's Big Steal

BY WILLARD SHELTON

Washington, December 28

BY DECISION of Manly Fleischmann, administrator of defense production, and Mobilization Director Charles E. Wilson the powerful Anaconda Copper Mining Company has been given a lift into the aluminum business. The Department of the Interior doesn't like it, the Anti-Trust Division of the Justice Department doesn't like it, but Anaconda gets what it wants—a sure supply of cheap public power from the Hungry Horse Dam, now being built. Thus the one important Montana interest that consistently opposed construction of this $120,000,000 project will, it now appears, fall heir to a substantial part of Montana's share of the power to be generated.

How Anaconda became Wilson's and Fleischmann's favored corporation is a complicated story. Last summer Secretary of the Interior Oscar Chapman thought it would be a good idea to stimulate competition in aluminum by putting relatively small independents into the business. Chapman wrote to Wilson on July 12 urging that special financial arrangements be worked out, if necessary, to aid companies which might compete with the existing Big Three—Alcoa, Reynolds, and Kaiser. Chapman also awarded a contract for power from Hungry Horse to an aluminum subsidiary organized by the Harvey Machine Company of California. Harvey's aluminum plant was to be located at Kalispell, Montana, and Chapman recommended a $45,000,000 RFC loan for construction purposes.

At this point the columnist Drew Pearson called public attention to the fact that the Harvey Company had been accused of using improper testing gauges on some of its World War II military production, and Chapman asked Fleischmann to hold up completion of the contract pending an investigation. Anaconda now suddenly entered the picture as a company anxious to produce aluminum and ready to take over Harvey's power contract. Pearson then examined Anaconda's war performance. The Harvey Company was never indicted or prosecuted; in fact, it was exonerated, whereas the Anaconda Wire and Cable Company, a subsidiary of Anaconda Copper, paid $1,626,000 in damages to the government for shipping untested wire to the British and American armed forces. But by the time Pearson got around to discussing this, things had happened.

Harvey had offered to put up $7,000,000 of its own money, but the $45,000,000 RFC loan recommended by Chapman was not approved, the recommendation having been stopped dead in Fleischmann's office. Harvey was unable to arrange private financing as a substitute for the RFC loan, and there are dark suggestions—none of them provable—that promising deals were blocked. Finally, without advance notice to Chapman, a new company in which Anaconda held 95 per cent of the stock was organized to take over Harvey's power contract. In addition to 5 per cent of the stock of the new company, Harvey will be given a contract which is supposed to assure it a supply of aluminum—up to 25 per cent of the total output—for its Los Angeles factories. Despite sharp protests from Chapman and the Justice Department, Fleischmann gave his approval and directed Chapman to confirm the assignment of Hungry Horse power.

Anaconda already uses about 30 per cent of all the electric power consumed in Montana. The power itself is almost all produced by the Anaconda-controlled Montana Power Company. Now, by order of Fleischmann, Anaconda is to become dominant in a new field, aluminum, with the benefit of the cheap public power produced at Hungry Horse with public money.

THE propriety of putting a copper company into the aluminum business is one dubious aspect of the deal. Aluminum is rapidly becoming a competitor in fields where copper has long been supreme. It can be used in transmission lines, for example, as efficiently as copper and is much cheaper—and the Interior Department is now building 12,000 miles of transmission lines.

Anaconda, a major company in the highly integrated copper industry, is being allowed in on the ground floor in the competitive aluminum industry and will thus be in a position to monopolize bidding on construction work as well as to protect its traditional interests.

An Administration interested in obtaining the maximum social benefits from Hungry Horse power would have awarded the contract for this power to an independent concern, with guaranties that once the present emergency was over aluminum would be fairly allocated to all small-plant fabricators. But as things now stand, it is a foregone conclusion that Anaconda will use the output of the new plant for its own operations and that the plant will be of little benefit to other fabricators, small or large. That the contract ended up with Anaconda rather than with Harvey would be a blow to small businesses under any circumstances; it appears even more significant in the light of the post-emergency implications for small businesses dependent on aluminum.

Fleischmann issued a statement justifying his Anaconda decision on two grounds: that Anaconda could produce aluminum at Kalispell more quickly than any other company, and that it could build its plants without use of public money. He brushed aside the argument that copper and aluminum are competitive metals by saying that copper has a sure market for at least ten years.

It was not necessary for Fleischmann to wait until Anaconda had swallowed Harvey before taking some action on Harvey's application for a loan. During World War II the government stimulated competition in the aluminum industry by huge loans to the Kaiser and Reynolds interests. Government funds financed a substantial part of our industrial expansion during the war, and their use to spread competition was considered healthy. It was one of the few ways of counteracting the tendency of existing large corporations to attract most of the prime war contracts.

In 1950 and 1951 Congress refused to authorize government construction of new industrial facilities, but it approved RFC loans and price incentives. Chapman and the Department of Justice called Fleischmann's attention to a Congressional declaration on the disposition of public power and an executive order covering mobilization contracts both of which aim to decentralize economic strength. To help Anaconda into the aluminum business and allot it a big part of Hungry Horse power merely because it is already big enough to devour a competitor and can do so without borrowing government money is a grotesque contradiction of the spirit if not the letter of the law and the executive order.

In a final effort to block Fleischmann's directive, Brigadier General Telford Taylor, as head of the Small Defense Plants Administration, urged President Truman to intervene. But the President, doubtless influenced by the embarrassing position in which Representative Mike Mansfield and Senator James Murray find themselves on this matter, decided to uphold Fleischmann and Wilson. It is no secret that Murray and Mansfield would rather see Hungry Horse power go to almost any company other than Anaconda, but unfortunately their constituents fear that unless the power goes to Anaconda, it may be allocated to the West Coast plants of Reynolds and Kaiser. Should Secretary Chapman decide not to approve a long-term contract for the power—it is understood that Anaconda is insisting on a twenty-year contract—the deal might still be upset. But Mr. Chapman is not likely to take this action in view of the fact that the President has already upheld Fleischmann and Wilson. However, if General Taylor and Secretary Chapman, with Senator Murray and Representative Mansfield, were to go to the President and insist on a reversal of the decision, the deal might still be blocked.

In all conscience this final effort should be made. Anaconda is reaping huge profits from the production and fabrication of copper. By being able to state that it owns 95 per cent of the stock of the new aluminum subsidiary, Anaconda will be able to plow back its copper profits into the new plant and then write off almost the entire cost under the extravagantly generous provisions of the accelerated tax-amortization program, which allows concerns holding "certificates of necessity" to amortize most of the cost of new defense plants over a five-year period. To put it plainly, Anaconda now stands a chance to end up with a new aluminum plant presented by the government along with a twenty-year contract for 60 per cent of the power from a public project which the company strenuously opposed. A succession of Republican Administrations were never this generous with Anaconda.

Spanish Journey: Land in Decay

BY ROBERT FROMM

Madrid, December 21

YOU drive southward from Bilbao, cross the verdant slopes of the Pyrenees, and descend on to the great Castile plateau. This is the old heart of Spain, the home of proud grandee families, the site of ancient cathedrals, and the fountainhead of Spanish culture and nationalism. You soon discover that it is also a dreary and exhausted country, a land in decay.

Starved for fertilizer, parched by a dry spell, worn out by primitive tillage, the land looks like an aged hag. If trees ever grew here, they were long ago chopped down for fuel. The rivers are dry. The villages, built of yellow mud bricks, merge with the barren countryside. Their narrow streets are covered with a carpet of dry manure and filled with ragged children, who rush to the car to beg for food. The shops are few and have little to sell.

At the entrance to each village there is a large Falange sign of five crossed arrows. These freshly painted emblems of the ruling party are as out of key with the sordid background as is the one big building, which is never the school but the barracks of the Civil Guard, bearing its motto, Todo por la Patria. The Civil Guard is the rural arm of the Secret Police, and its two-man patrols stand at each end of every Castilian village, peering intently into vehicles and questioning the passers-by. They look tough and competent in their green uniforms, black-lacquer hats, and business-like arms—one man with a rifle, the other with a tommy gun.

ROBERT FROMM is an American newspaperman who has been living in Europe for several years. A second article from Spain will appear in an early issue.

You break your journey at Burgos, the old capital of Castile. Here are dust, clatter, and bustle, crowded streets, ten-story office buildings going up, and stores beyond whose grimy fronts fancy goods are for sale. Ten minutes out of Burgos you are again in rural Spain—where too many people produce far too little food, where a village is lucky to have a public fountain in which the women can wash clothes.

Suddenly the narrow, pitted road widens into a four-lane highway. At its end, like a technicolored panorama, spreads Madrid, with its villas, palaces, parks, and skyscrapers (the newest is twenty-eight stories high, and one wonders how many joint stock companies will have to be added to Madrid's 2,100 to fill its offices). In fifteen minutes you are on the Gran Via, Europe's closest approximation to Fifth Avenue. The shops here sell luxury goods the match of any in Paris or London; the traffic, despite an army of policemen in English Bobby uniforms, keeps jamming up; the women are handsomely dressed and bejeweled; and in the sidewalk cafes every seat is taken by seven in the evening.

Standing on the Alcala one day, I counted sixteen banks. On the shady streets off Prado Boulevard are scores of handsome apartment buildings. Of the estimated 150,000 housing units which Spain will need each year in the next decade, it is building about 17,000, and the bulk of these—by official admission—are for upper-bracket incomes. At eleven at night fleets of limousines unload their occupants at the fashionable "revue" theaters.

After a week here you begin to think of this handsome city as a leech, growing fat on the blood of the exhausted country. The great landlords live here. So do the industrialists of Bilbao. Half the nation's trade and industry is run from here; profits, instead of enriching the localities where they are earned, are channeled to Madrid. Yet they go only into the pockets of the few, despite the Falange's constant talk of social justice. On the Gran Via the well-fed are besieged by the ragged and hungry peddling American cigarettes, offering to shine shoes, or selling lottery tickets—one of Spain's great industries. No other capital in Europe has so many beggars. The bread ration at the controlled low price is a third of a pound a day, but you can buy a loaf of beautiful white bread at any of the luxurious delicatessen stores for what is half a day's pay for most Spaniards. A semi-skilled worker earns 50 to 60 cents a day; the constant pressure from the over-peopled countryside keeps wages down. The white-collar class is relatively even worse off. A postal inspector makes $30 a month after thirty years of service. A teacher can barely keep his family alive on $20 a month. Many people hold two jobs. I know of a General Staff colonel who takes off his uniform at night and goes to work as a typist. But not everyone can find—or survive—two jobs, and there is bitter, and growing, discontent.

The distress cannot be ignored. A Western diplomat tells me that many worried employers asked for permission to raise the wages of their workers last year but were turned down by the government, fearful of more inflation. The same diplomat believes, as do many informed Spaniards, that the wave of strikes last spring was started by the Falange syndicates, which felt that some of the steam must be allowed to blow off—though they did not reckon on the explosion they got. "What could you expect," said a Spaniard to me, "when a kilo of sardines was selling in Barcelona for 27 pesetas, or just about a day's pay?" Each time I talked of the strikes, I suggested the Communists had started them. Each time the people laughed and said, "That's what the government would like us to believe, but we know better." Violent anti-Communists told me they had taken part in the strikes, if only by refusing to board a streetcar. "We had to do something. One can no longer live like a human being."

It is easy, but wrong, to blame it all on Franco, or the Falange. When the Caudillo won the war in 1939, he inherited a mess of problems. The impoverished soil, primitive agriculture, inefficient industry, oversized bureaucracy, centralized controls—all these existed in the days of the republic, in the thirties, and during Primo de Rivera's dictatorship in the late twenties. If you study the economic statistics, you see that the graph started skidding twenty years ago and more. Moreover, many of the things for which Franco is blamed today are imposed on him by harsh necessity. It is true that in this major olive-oil producing nation the worker's oil ration is tragically inadequate. But olive oil is one of the few commodities Spain can sell in the world market; it must sell oil if it is to buy flour, fertilizer, or machinery. Wages must remain low as long as the productivity of the Spanish worker is one of the lowest in Europe. At the same time, productivity must remain low as long as people do not get enough to eat. To buy fertilizer or to build hydroelectric-power projects, Spain needs foreign credits, but it received none until some American banks extended credit in 1949. Every country in Western Europe, including Germany and Italy, has been given American aid for reconstruction, but Spain has had to repair the damage of the civil war by its own effort.

THIS much must be said to avoid distortion. But when it is said, the bill of indictment against the Franco regime remains long. The smell of decay rises heavy from the entire scene—land, culture, politics, and public life. The charge against Franco is that he has done nothing to arrest this decay, and often, in fact, speeded it up behind a screen of high-sounding phrases unmatched this side of the Communist world.

The core of the Spanish problem is the village. Here the decay is at its worst. While Spain's population has been growing at the rate of 1 per cent a year, its agricultural yield has been dropping steadily. With 1929 (Primo de Rivera) taken as 100, the output in 1935 (Republic) stood at a good 97.3, skidded to 71.4 in 1947 (Franco), and in the dry year of 1949 slipped farther to 64.3. This year the crop has been fair, but the trend continues. According to the regime's own figures, the annual yield in 1940-49 was nearly a third below the level achieved before the civil war.

To arrest the decline, the land needs water, fertilizer, draft animals, and some improvement in the medieval method of agriculture. But the amount allotted to agriculture in the budget—the same budget which gives the Ministry of the Interior 14 per cent—is less than 1 per cent. Less than 6 per cent of all the cultivated land is irrigated today, and most of this predates Franco. The first fertilizer plant was completed only this year. A system of supplying low-cost mules to the farmer has proved woefully inadequate, and it is a rare farmer who has the $1,400 with which to buy a pair of mules in the open market. As for the modernization of methods, it exists almost wholly in glossy government pamphlets. What the tired land needs is rotation of crops. What it gets at best is a bit of rest; so that a quarter of all wheatfields lie fallow each year. No wheatfields in Europe give such a pathetic yield—well below ten metric quintals a hectare.

Spain does have small and profitable farms, mostly in the lush and narrow strip along the Mediterranean. But this is a tiny part of the broad canvas. Only in Asia can one find such extreme conditions of landlordism and peonage as here. According to one estimate, 28.7 per cent of the persons engaged in agriculture own their land, 16.3 per cent are share-croppers, 8.3 per cent are farm workers holding regular jobs, and 46.7 per cent are seasonal workers. California's Okies were rural aristocracy compared with the hungry men and women I have seen on the roads of Andalusia and the eastern provinces, carrying their belongings on their backs and their infants in their arms. They trudge over high mountain passes in search of a job that will pay them 30 to 40 cents a day for a week and then turn them off until another season.

The Falange has a land reform on its books. ("We don't like to use the words 'land reform,'" one Falangist told me. "It smacks too much of the stuff the reds used to peddle, and it alarms the landowners.") The National Land Settlement Institute has been organized to purchase the estates of the great landowners and resell them to the share-croppers. In October, the institute announced that by January 1, 1950, it had settled 23,000 people on 274 estates—"1,168 people in 1949 alone." No one obviously need be alarmed at the pace.

The figures help to explain the government's overriding interest in industrialization as the solution for Spain's ills. Western experts here disagree strongly with this view. The dropping agricultural yield, they argue, has cut into Spain's earnings, compelled it to buy food abroad, and put most Spaniards on a hunger ration. And even if Franco were right, most Western experts here still insist that he has no coherent industrial plan. ("This is not a plan," one expert told me. "It's just a lot of figures on paper, plus a few projects that can be shown to visiting firemen.")

THE industrial index today is about a quarter above the 1929 figure, but the progress is deceptive. While the land cries for tractors, factories produce one of the plushiest and most extravagant jobs displayed at the Paris Automobile Show. A much-publicized achievement this year was a penicillin plant. But, as an economist put it, "no one seems to have given serious thought about where they're going to sell this penicillin"; at the corner drugstore where I go the penicillin of course is Danish.

Spain's economy is dominated by the Big Five of its 140 private banks. This is speculative capital, with an eye on quick returns. While heavy industry lacks funds, the consumer industry booms. The whole economic structure is lopsided, with the basic industries—coal, iron, power—unable to cope with the demand and unable to expand. When the government proposed a great new steel works, the steelmakers of Bilbao refused to subscribe a peseta. They had other uses for their huge profits. A lot of money goes into the black market, or is invested in Madrid real estate, or is smuggled to Tangier. Only a small portion goes into the public till. When, a few years back, the government decided to introduce a new tax on incomes exceeding $1,200 a year, only 9,000 people in all Spain confessed to earning that much.

Despite bitter complaints against government interference, this is still a paradise of free enterprise. Juan March, who financed Franco's revolt, is now making fabulous sums in ways so well concealed no Western diplomat can trace them. And a Spaniard tells me of a man named Vila who "can buy or sell anything you want." Vila had a contract to feed Spain's armed services and the prison population—his allotment per prisoner was three cents a day. Eventually, he ran afoul of the authorities, was fined $4,000, and put in prison. He promptly installed telephones in his cell and ran his business from there: "Hello, hello, I will buy 10,000 liters of olive oil." Now he is free again and doing well. Wealth is not confined to Madrid. Andalusia's landowners and Catalonia's textile manufacturers are also prospering. A few years ago a Catalan married a woman in San Sebastian. He flew the Barcelona Philharmonic to San Sebastian to play at the wedding, brought a bishop to officiate, and gave a two-day feast to his guests. The bride wore jewelry worth $400,000.

But nowhere else in Europe are the masses so badly off. An adult's ration permits 150 grams of bread a day, 100 grams of Spanish beans a week (for cocido, a stew which is the mainstay of his diet), 100 grams of lentils a week, and half a pint of olive oil every ten days. No one, of course, can survive on this diet. So everyone goes to the black market, where a 100-gram bun costs 4 cents, a quart of olive oil 70 cents to $1, and a kilo of rice, lentils, or Spanish beans around 20 cents. These are staggering prices to a man earning 50 to 60 cents a day. "Meat?" said a mechanic to me. "What's that?"

There are just a few more strokes to add to the story of the little man. Franco's system of social welfare—which includes no unemployment insurance—applies only to incomes below $360 a year. And Franco's own Institute of Statistics reports that in 1948 a worker earned, in real wages, only two-thirds as much as he did in 1936. The tragic inflation, brought on by the red adventure in Korea, was still ahead.

The other day a rich Spaniard I know took a lady to a restaurant run by Hitler's former chef. When I asked him the next day how much the meal cost him, he replied cheerfully, "Oh, half a month's income." It was no joke. His dinner for two cost him exactly a fortnight's pay for most Spanish workers.

Schuman's Pool of Troubles

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

Paris, December 29

ON DECEMBER 8 the French National Assembly embarked on a debate in the grand style—one which clearly revealed the various trends of thought in France. The question was the ratification of the Schuman Plan, and discussion went on for several days. Some French papers have expressed astonishment at the extraordinary lack of interest in this debate shown in Britain—as distinct from the United States, where the interest seems to have been almost excessive. At one moment the Plevin government found itself in serious difficulties, so urgent was the demand from the right to postpone a final decision and give the Schuman Plan a few more months' study, but soon all was well again, and by 377 votes to 235 the Assembly took "the plunge into the unknown"—a phrase, surprisingly enough, used by that worthy European gentleman M. Van Zeeland of Belgium.

There is no doubt that the offensive conducted against the plan by the Gaullists and Communists was joined by a large number of right-wing deputies representing the French employers, particularly the steel magnates of Lorraine, as well as by deputies whom the strongly "anti-Boche" speeches of General Aumeran and others had left with the uncomfortable feeling that conditions today were radically different from what they were in May, 1950, when the Schuman Plan was launched. As one speaker put it, "It may have sounded revolutionary then, but one has to choose the right moment for revolutions." Today, many felt, the Schuman Plan was mixed up with too many other things, and was inseparable from the problem of German rearmament. In the course of the debate 101 objections to the plan under present conditions were offered, but the Plevin government was determined to have it ratified, and when there was danger that it might not be, American influence made itself felt in all sorts of direct and indirect ways. Finally the wobblers decided it was better not to make Uncle Sam and Uncle Ike angry. As for the industrialists, they appear to have received some private assurances from the United States that their interests would be defended.

One need not dwell too much on the Communist tirades against the plan; Duclos and others went out of their way to make France's flesh creep with visions of millions of French "slaves" being deported to Germany after the supra-national authority and the United States had developed the Ruhr into something so gigantic that the French coal and steel industries were completely ruined. The government insisted that the High Authority, the Assembly, and the Court constituted sufficient safeguards. The plan, it maintained, had three major advantages: it would supply France with badly needed coal and coke and perhaps even turn Lorraine into a "second Ruhr"; it would add to "the glory and prestige" of France; and it would make the Ruhr, instead of an arsenal of Germany imperialism, "an organ of European vitality."

A lot was said about Briand, the "pilgrim of peace"; M. Gouin, for the Socialists, became so lyrical about the prospect that he even quoted Victor Hugo, and said that the Schuman Plan was like the first rays of dawn over those United States of Europe of which Hugo had dreamed more than a hundred years ago. But this was a little too simple, and the government was rather on edge throughout the debate. After all, even if the Foreign Affairs Committee had approved of the Schuman Plan, the Defense Committee had not, and its spokesman, M. Loutanau-Lacau, declared: "Are we to put our key industries at the mercy of a High Authority in which France is in a minority? By ratifying the Schuman Plan you also automatically agree to the creation of a European army. The Defense Committee is opposed to scrapping our national army."

There were other more precise objections. One was that the Adenauer government could not be expected to last long and was therefore not qualified to commit Germany to observe a particularly inelastic fifty-year treaty. Moreover, German governments of the future, like those of the past, would observe a treaty only as long as it suited them. Grave doubts were also expressed about the High Authority. To what extent would it and could it defend France's interests? If its guiding principle was to be "the most rational distribution of production at the highest level of productivity," was it not only too likely that the Germans would always secure priority in new capital investments and France be left high and dry?

Several speakers quoted from a recent statement by High Commissioner McCloy in which, emphasizing the benefits that would accrue to Germany from the Schuman Plan, he said, "With German efficiency all uneconomic concerns in other Schuman Plan countries will be eliminated in a short time." M. Pierre André (rightist) quoted Mr. Churchill as saying in June, 1950, that without Britain taking part in the pool it would "naturally come under German domination."

ALEXANDER WERTH is The Nation's correspondent in France.

To the argument that France would at least be assured a supply of cheap coal and coke, it was replied that there was absolutely no guaranty of this in periods of shortage. And who knew how much France would get if Germany were to go on expanding its own steel production indefinitely? (Point is lent to this argument by the news that the Schuman Plan may not be ratified by the Bonn Parliament unless West Germany is authorized to increase its steel production to nineteen million tons immediately.) Other objections referred to the Saar. What if the Saar broke away from France and thus reduced the French vote in the Assembly from eighteen to fifteen and increased the German vote from eighteen to twenty-one? Could anybody say that might not happen in 2,000 A. D.?

RENE MAYER, Pleven, and Schuman himself—in order of effectiveness, if one may say so—disposed of these criticisms as best they could. They admitted there were risks, but what great new venture did not involve risks? At the same time they stressed the obvious economic benefits to France, and the psychological effect that the laying of “this cornerstone of a United Europe” would have on world opinion. But somehow it did not sound quite right. As many speakers observed, there was no United Europe. The Germans, unfortunately, even some people in Adenauer’s Cabinet, could think of a United Europe only in terms of “unifying all the German lands, including Austria and Alsace-Lorraine,” while the Americans looked upon the Schuman Plan as being, above all, a first step toward the formation of a more or less German-dominated European army. This point was clearly stressed by Mr. McCloy in a recent speech, which was also extensively quoted. And the European army (German version) might well mean, as speakers of different parties pointed out, that France would be dragged into a war against Russia. The government was careful to state that the ratification of the Schuman Plan did not mean the ratification of the European army—M. Schuman himself had often observed that the two were not interdependent—but many were unconvinced.

While the Gaullists also contended that “the Germans would cheat,” they attacked the plan chiefly as anti-national, saying that it handed over to a “stateless technocracy” the fate of French industry. They were in favor of federation, but putting economic federation before political federation made no sense. Political federation should be achieved in Western Europe by means of a referendum in all the prospective member countries; after a federal parliament was set up, there could be economic federation. But each member state should keep its own national army.

The concluding phase of the discussion summed up the main arguments. The government spoke in terms of France’s prestige (“You mean your prestige; France’s prestige is not involved,” one speaker interjected). M. Chaban-Delmas (Gaullist) said he hoped the Schuman Plan would be a success but did not believe it could be. M. Duclos (Communist) said that before long Krupp and other war criminals would set up new torture chambers for French slave labor; he also revealed, rather to the embarrassment of the Socialists, that the Federal Mineworkers’ Committee of the Socialist Force Ouvrière trade unions had passed a resolution against the Schuman Plan. M. Pierre André (right), reflecting the views of certain industrialists, said he had still failed to receive a satisfactory reply to what was to him the chief question: “What would happen if the High Authority were to decide to concentrate its capital investments in the Ruhr?”

Finally, Paul Reynaud sharply warned the Assembly that if it did not ratify the Schuman Plan, the United States, which with the Presidential election impending was in a very tricky mood, might give up the defense of Continental Europe and adopt Taft’s strategy of peripheral defense. This really amounted to saying that the Schuman Plan was the prelude to the European army—and to German rearmament. Even so, the reference to Taft scared many deputies.

The sequel of the story is in Germany. As mentioned above, the Germans now wish to raise their steel output to nineteen million tons a year, and Adenauer, in his determination to get the Schuman Plan through his Parliament, is said to be willing to make far-reaching concessions to the rightist parties, who would above all like to be told, if only off the record, that the pool will in the end be their pool and the European army predominantly their army.

What, it is asked, will the German Socialists do to counteract these dangerous trends? The French Socialists are a little mystified by the behavior of their German colleagues. At the latest meeting of their National Council there was a marked movement in favor of keeping Germany disarmed and against ratifying the European army. Despite the implication of M. Reynaud’s speech, they voted for the Schuman Plan—M. Gouin had not quoted Victor Hugo in vain—but the army is different. This was made plain at Strasbourg when M. Spaak failed to “sell” it as a “lesser evil” to the French and Belgian Socialists.

Leader of the Revolution

GEORGE WASHINGTON: A BIOGRAPHY. By Douglas Southall Freeman. Volume III, Planter and Patriot. Volume IV, Leader of the Revolution. Charles Scribner's Sons. $15.

GEORGE WASHINGTON AND AMERICAN INDEPENDENCE. By Curtis P. Nettels. Little, Brown and Company. $5.

THE PRIVATE LIFE OF GEORGE WASHINGTON. By Francis Rufus Bellamy. Thomas Y. Crowell Company. $5.

AS MR. FREEMAN is the most admired of our living biographers, and as Volumes I and II of his life of Washington were published three years ago, few readers need to be reminded at this date that in fulness, authority, and interest his work is superseding all others. There will be other biographies of Washington, of course, and they will be welcome, for it is dangerous in principle to leave any great man in the custody of a single literary guardian; but additional investigation, as far ahead as can be seen, is more likely to take the form of commentary or supplement, and the correction of minor shortcomings, than of an entirely new undertaking on a comparable scale.

Until recently a Washington biography of such breadth and solidity could not have been projected, for it has taken more than one generation of archivists and editors to assemble the materials in usable order. With all requisite sources at hand, the right biographer might not have been easy to find. Mr. Freeman was not the inevitable choice that he now seems, for his experience had all been in a later period. It is good to remember that it was that clear-sighted poetic interpreter of the American spirit, Stephen Benét, who first suggested him. Not since Monday, May 16, 1763, when a young Scotch visitor in London was drinking tea "in Mr. Davies's back-parlour" has there been any happier bringing together of subject and biographer. To be sure, the returns are not all in; but with these volumes the biography reaches its halfway mark, and although the most difficult years are yet to come, prediction seems safe.

The present instalment resumes the story at the close of 1758, when the twenty-seven-year-old Virginian, having resigned his military commission, returned home to marry and to take up the relatively humdrum life of a planter on the Northern Neck. It ends on a note of drama that Mr. Freeman, with his delicate feeling for effect, intentionally subdues. On April 30, 1778—a year that "thus far had been a nightmare of cabal and intrigue in command, and of pallor, hunger, tatters, and foul odors at Valley Forge"—a messenger arrives at headquarters in Morristown with news from France. It is great news. Spring has come to America.

The 1,200 pages in between give the reader the twofold pleasure of hearing a great story told with classic precision and economy of language and of watching the biographer at work, in the footnotes, marshaling and examining evidence, weighing problems, determining degrees of probability, formulating his conclusions, or perhaps adding some additional information that would retard the movement of the narrative and yet is too precious to discard. There are many uses for footnotes besides the ones listed in the manuals of historical method, and Mr. Freeman knows them.

In an introductory essay the author comments at length on several matters of importance such as the growth or transformation, "beyond documentary explanation," of Washington's character and the nature of his work as Commander-in-Chief: "he was one-tenth field commander and nine-tenths administrator." On the first he might have quoted William Ernest Hocking's observation that "the important facts [of history] are never verifiable, for they take place in the mind." Actually, he is not disturbed by the absence of paper-and-ink confirmation of the fact; he is merely stating what every experienced biographer knows.

The attentive reader of a work as detailed and complex as this needs every mechanical help that the book designer can give. It is a serious defect in the design of this work that it lacks an analytical table of contents, preferably with the additional convenience of corresponding running-heads, and a chronology. The analytical table of contents appears to have gone out of style except in technical books. It is time to bring it back. The index is admirably full and accurate, but all too many of the longer entries consist of line upon line of page references unrelieved by any word to indicate their importance, and the huge composite entry, occupying thirteen pages, under Washington's own name is so badly arranged as largely to defeat its purpose.

The other two books here under review require less notice. In "George Washington and American Independence" Professor Nettels has traversed once more the fifteen months that led from Lexington and Concord to the Declaration of Independence in order to determine Washington's part in hastening the great decision. That part, as his vividly and vigorously written book makes clear, was larger than has always been supposed. The excitements, enmities, and uncertainties of the time live again in his pages as we see Washington emerge as the leader of the Revolution. Mr. Nettels combines a highly competent technique of investigation with a partisan, patriotic, and even moralistic point of view that seems rather old-fashioned. His is not the most philosophical kind of history, but it makes lively reading, and bias so forthright and aboveboard is less objectionable than a bogus objectivity.

I wish I might say as much for Mr. Bellamy's queerly proportioned "Private Life of George Washington." He writes with so pleasant a mixture of shrewdness and sentiment, and with such winning friendliness toward both his subject and his readers, as to make criticism sound ungracious, but this latest attempt to disclose the "real Washington" beneath the trappings of war and state is seriously deficient in historical and literary craftsmanship.

GEORGE GENZMER

The Hemingway School

SCIROCCO. By Romualdo Romano. Translated from the Italian by William Jay Smith. Farrar, Straus and Young. $2.75.

LITERARY prizes have a way of offering deceptive guaranties of merit; the latest prize novel to reach us from Italy, Romualdo's "Scirocco," which won the newly instituted Hemingway Prize in 1949, is a case in point.

The novel, plotless and moody in the best "American school" tradition of the '20's, chronicles a few days in the life of a Sicilian school teacher who has been assigned classes in a remote mountain hamlet where the conditions of poverty, apathy, ignorance, and sordid interests fill the narrator with "exasperated irritation." Irritation and a related impotence not only to act but to formulate projects of action seem the key to the author's as well as the narrator's state of mind.

Though the action takes place in the second year of the war, as little reference is made to the world beyond the village as if the young school teacher, like his illiterate charges, were bound exclusively by parochial interests. Nor does the interplay of moral forces between the Fascist satraps and the lone suspected anti-Fascist ever come sharply into focus. The narrator's comment on a night excursion headed by the local party secretary, in which he takes a reluctant and passive part, is: "I was sad and bored; and did what the others did with no enthusiasm whatever." The party secretary himself, a character who presents two contrasting facets to the reader with no attempt on Romualdo's part to integrate these complexities, is shown as "one of those who believe inevitably in their own laws." And the young, bored narrator sums up, "As such I hated him." He does not explain why the man who believed in his own laws could at the same time be the executor of a remote but despotic absolutism. Nor why, throughout, this party secretary, the only man of action in the hamlet, is given such loving, three-dimensional, albeit confusing, characterization.

If Romualdo's intent has been to present in all its moral inconclusiveness the personality of a drifting, observant but morally inert young man, he has succeeded at least partially. Yet the narrator's very quality of drifting makes him before long uninteresting in the extreme. After he has observed seven times in three pages that the world he lives in is "filthy," the reader is bound to take his word for it: the postmaster's teeth are filthy; the fellow school teacher's socks, which he throws in the bread basket but puts on again when he goes to bed, are filthy; and of course the bedraggled children in their underfed, half-naked pullulating life are filthy too. The point is, does the drabness of the narrative and its poor, monotonous preoccupations make for realism, or a form which convincingly communicates the tenebrous view into the Sicilian rural world young Romualdo seeks to offer us? Or does it just imbue us with the boredom and indifference which so patently characterize the hero-narrator?

Except for a disproportionately detailed scene of heron hunting, the "realism" is a poor imitation, by an eager student of American literature, of the early novels of Caldwell and Faulkner (both writers have long been more familiar to the least alert civil servant in the provincial cities of Italy than to our equivalent readers, who still prefer the Satevepost). Romualdo does not paint in depth but only in surface grime, which can prove pretty unsatisfying even in a book of only 182 small pages.

The translation is very good indeed, except for the one slip Mr. Smith makes when he translates continentale as continental: here the perversity of the Sicilian nature breaks through with insular force, for anyone who comes from the Italian mainland is, of course, called in Sicily a continentale.

The evident derivation of the hunting scene—a genuine experience in locally unique surroundings worthy of the best Hemingway hunting scenes—and the open worship of what the author considers the American realistic school seem to me the only possible reasons, however wrong-headed, for "Scirocco's" having been awarded a prize except for sustained monotony.

The New Canada

CANADA'S CENTURY. By D. M. Lebourdais. The British Book Center. $4.

THE place names in Canada are moving north. Names like Yellowknife, Leduc, Steeprock, Knob Lake, and Hamilton River will be the familiar names of tomorrow. It was not so long ago that Canada to the average American, and to many Canadians as well, meant that ribbon of tilled and settled land, with its tourist byways, that lay just north of the border—the Maritime

EARLY in life, Abraham Lincoln was tremendously influenced by the writings of Thomas Paine—particularly by his essay advocating the abolition of slavery. Lincoln constantly sought inspiration in Paine's works. He said: "I never tire of reading Paine". Thomas A. Edison under the influence of Paine and fully acknowledged his indebtedness to this profound thinker. He said: "Paine educated me . . ." Men like Benjamin Franklin and Thomas Jefferson loved and honored this great genius.

Why not let Thomas Paine do for you what he did for Lincoln, Edison and countless others? Start one of life's most rewarding experiences by reading Paine's masterwork, "The Age of Reason". Provinces, the valley of the St. Lawrence, the western peninsula of Ontario, the north shore of Lake Superior, the wheat-growing plains of the Western provinces, the Canadian Pacific Rockies, and the fertile valleys on the West Coast. Even today the highways and the railroads take you through this part of Canada and seldom beyond. This book takes the reader into the new Canada, a vast territory extending from Labrador to the MacKenzie and reaching up into the islands of the Arctic Sea—the two and a half million square miles of pre-Cambrian rock and muskeg, the oil lands of Alberta and Saskatchewan, the iron mountains of Ungava, the great northern rivers awaiting hydroelectric installations, the spruce forests, and untapped bodies of ore. Today the new railroads, the new air routes, the new investments are all pointing north.

D. M. Lebourdais has done a competent reporter's job on the geography and geology of this new Canada. Fifty years ago, in a moment of exuberance, Sir Wilfrid Laurier predicted that the twentieth would be Canada's century. Now, Lebourdais thinks, there is a good chance that this prediction will come true. A railroad is under construction to the great iron-ore deposits of Labrador. A pipe line already brings Alberta oil to the Great Lakes. The St. Lawrence seaway will soon be constructed by Canada with or without the cooperation of the United States. The North is bursting with energy. The last great geographic and industrial frontier on the continent is under assault.

There is one disturbing note in the Lebourdais survey. Apparently in the development of Canada's newly found resources the all too familiar pattern of exploitation is being followed. It is the big companies that are in it up to the neck: the big oil companies and the big mining companies are pouring in their millions and will soon be drawing out their multi-millions. True, as the author suggests, the workers in the new wilderness will not have to rough it as their forefathers did. They will have all the modern facilities—the neat stucco houses with hot and cold running water, the recreation center, the modern company store, and the new movie twice a week, all the comforts of the well-run company town. But perhaps ordinary Canadians may want more than that. They may even advance the modest plea that if the next half-century is to be labeled Canada's, a little more of it should belong to them and not merely to some very solid and reputable names on the New York Stock Exchange. I am a little surprised that Mr. Lebourdais made no special mention of the province of Saskatchewan, where it appears that the public authorities persist in the heresy that the natural resources which are being uncovered in the North are the people's birthright and should be developed primarily in the interest of their better life.

Paris, London, and Washington. In addition to the commanding figures, lesser masters like Savoldo, Moroni, and Lorenzo Lotto are fortunately included, but I could wish for something better than a couple of portraits to represent such original artists as Bronzino and particularly Pontormo. There are special reproductions of some of the Correggio frescoes at Parma, and some of the Raphaels in the Vatican, and a truly remarkable group of seventeen details from the Sistine ceiling. The latter,—due allowance made for translation from plaster to slick paper—are so accurate as to be unexpectedly disconcerting: Michelangelo's work has been considerably patched up through the centuries by restorers, and all previous color reproductions gave a very false impression of a homogeneous surface. The actual state of disrepair is clear in the detail of Daniel, but none the less Michelangelo's power surmounts even these obstacles. Two of the nudes, in a relatively good state, come through magnificently.

The accompanying text is rather perfunctory. Lionello Venturi's fifteen-page introduction accents the importance of judging these artists on their own merits and not from Vasari's assumption that the masters who preceded these heroes of his day were merely preparing the way. He also points to the paradox between the high condition of the arts and the disintegration that marked other aspects of Italian life in the sixteenth century. Venturi's daughter has written the many biographical summaries. While they are satisfactory enough, they contain nothing new to a reader familiar with the history of Italian painting.

I return therefore to the color plates. Modern reproduction on shiny paper works reasonably well for bright-hued pictures, especially those of the past sixty years and of the early Renaissance. But the rich echoes of Leonardo's shadow or of Giorgione's color, not to mention the subtleties of late Titian and Tintoretto, are not caught so easily. There are serious discrepancies within this volume: the bleached detail of the nude woman in Giorgione's "Tempest," as against the over-dark illustration of the whole picture. And there are worse discrepancies between reproductions of the same picture in this book and in the ITALIAN PAINTING: THE RENAISSANCE (from Leonardo da Vinci to Veronese). Text by Lionello Venturi and Rosabianca Skira-Venturi. Translated by Stuart Gilbert. Albert Skira. $17.50.

THE second volume of the Skira history of Italian painting covers the sixteenth century in Florence, Rome, Venice, and northern Italy. As in the Skira series on modern painting, all the illustrations are in color. The 105 plates included in the present volume give a fair idea of many of the finest possessions of the galleries of Rome, Florence, Venice, Naples, Milan, Madrid, new Abrams volume on the Art Treasures of the Louvre. In this book the "Mona Lisa" has a red splotch on the near landscape and bright green mountains; in the other, the larger plate is almost monochromatic. Here Paul Veronese's "Calvary" is too dark; in the Louvre album it is properly blond. In both, Giorgione's "Concert" is gravely misrepresented, and the detail included in the present volume is shockingly bad. In general, however, the details of the Venetians are very successful; it is the ensembles which disappoint through an inevitable loss of texture in the small scale of the plate.

Giorgione's "Venus," so long at Dresden, now euphemistically described as "inaccessible," is reproduced from a color reproduction. The decision to do so cannot even be classed, I am afraid, as a noble experiment.

ARISTOTLE'S THEORY OF POETRY AND FINE ART. With a Critical Text and Translation of the Poetics by S. H. Butcher. With a Prefatory Essay on Aristotelian Literary Criticism by John Gassner. Dover Publications. $4.50. This is a welcome and handsomely printed reissue of a standard translation made more than half a century ago. Butcher's exposition and interpretation—twice as long as the "Poetics" itself—has become something of a classic in its own right, and John Gassner contributes an intelligent discussion of the relation of Aristotle's ideas to some recent attitudes toward tragedy. Romantic critics who stressed literature as an expression of a writer's personality rather than an "imitation of life" discounted and misconstrued Aristotle's meaning, and to many he came to seem irrelevant. Probably most critics today are closer to him than critics were half a century ago, and there is still no better approach to a discussion of, say, "The Death of a Salesman" than via some of the generalizations he made. The Butcher text affords the best way of finding out what Aristotle actually said.

STORY. The Magazine of the Short Story in Book Form. Number One. Edited by Whit Burnett and Hallie

Burnett. David McKay. $3. Those who remember with some affection the old Story Magazine, which introduced a number of gifted American writers to the reading public, will be pleased to learn that its editors have decided to bring it out twice a year in book form. Number One presents twenty moderately entertaining stories, ranging in locale from China to the Bronx to Ireland, by an international group of young writers. Although a few of the stories are banal and some are merely slick, the general level is one of unexciting competence, with the exception of one or two that are sharply executed (such as James Wyckoff's "The Door Between" and William D. Magnes's "The Vise"). Perhaps the prospect of appearing between book covers will encourage new writers to enliven future issues with more stimulating and original writing.

KRUTCH

IT WAS in connection with "Caesar and Cleopatra" that Bernard Shaw asked his famous question "Better than Shakespeare?" Up to the end of his life he was still explaining that he had never meant "better in all respects," and the question does not need to be answered in that expanded form. What is really important is the fact that the Vivien Leigh-Laurence Olivier production at the Ziegfeld Theater demonstrates that "Caesar and Cleopatra" is brilliant and engrossing simply as a play, without reference to Shakespeare, and, what is more surprising, without any undue emphasis upon its paradoxes or its lessons.

What time and familiarity with the Shavian point of view has done is to put audiences at their ease. They are no longer either puzzled by his point of view or nervously anxious to demonstrate that they understand what he is getting at. Taking his drama as drama and his comedy as comedy, they can enjoy both. Perhaps no work can really become a classic until something like that is true, and if—I apologize for the phrase—the "audience acceptance" of Shaw has reached a new high during the last few years, what that means is simply that Shaw has by now educated these audiences to the point where they enter his special world almost as easily as they do that of any other popular writer. One may even go one step farther and say that just as his own contention that the premises of Shakespeare's "Antony and Cleopatra" are foolish and immoral is fundamentally irrelevant to the drama as drama, so the alleged superiority of his own is irrelevant to our judgment of him. In both cases all that is really necessary is that the premises should be temporarily acceptable and that an interesting story resting upon them should be told.

I must add that "Caesar and Cleopatra" has never before seemed to me so interesting a play as it did at the Ziegfeld and that this is of course at least as much the result of what the present production does for Shaw as of what time had previously done for him. The day may come when his reputation will tend to oppress his interpreters as much as Shakespeare's often does now and in its own way interfere with effective interpretation as much as another kind of self-consciousness has interfered with some productions of Shaw. But Miss Leigh and Mr. Olivier are quite properly at ease in a play which is, for them, neither merely impudent on the one hand nor sacred on the other. Mr. Olivier's Caesar is the disillusioned idealist humorously resigned to doing the best he can in a world he did not make and with human material of very disappointing quality. Miss Leigh is an exasperatingly attractive Cleopatra who learns only half the lesson that Caesar would teach her—how to assume power but not how to use it. The support is uniformly first-rate, the mise-en-scène sufficiently imposing without being overwhelming, and the action moves with admirable swiftness. It is not often that those who go to the theater in the line of duty feel moved to say as I am now: it seemed short and it was too soon over.

None of this is meant to imply that what Shaw has to say is of no importance to him or to us; only that the intellectual implications have been, with the aid of time, put in their proper place. Of course Shaw himself did mean a kind of retort to Shakespeare. The play is no play unless one realizes that when he tells us that the real significance of the story of Cleopatra emerges when the drama does not center around an amorous episode but around what happens when a great man grown old meets a queen who has not yet grown up, he is thereby returning to his puritan insistence that life is real and life is earnest. But neither could it become the kind of play it now is until we had learned to be at home with this idea in a sense that its earlier audiences were not.

It is no news that Shaw, to a degree extraordinary for an artist, was concerned with the idea of government, its importance and its difficulty. Almost at the end, when Caesar is reminded that Rome produces no art he replies by asking if peace or even war is not an art, and by dismissing what the subject peoples have to give as mere ornaments. If this is not necessarily all that Shaw himself would have to say on the subject it is an attitude not wholly incomprehensible to him, and it suggests again the obvious fact that he sees in Caesar a hint of both the superman and the philosopher-king. Curiously, despite all his contempt for that Elizabethan man in the street with whom he identifies Shakespeare, the two have something in common. Shakespeare, as historians are fond of asserting, had a sense of the primary importance of social stability which renders the historical plays, perhaps even "Hamlet," incomprehensible to those who do not share it.

Among the many Shavianisms scattered through the text of the present play two widely separated ones, certainly not intended to be taken as comments one on the other, may nevertheless be confronted. Near the end Caesar, rebuking Cleopatra for her wilfulness, says: "I do not do what I want to do; I do what must be done. That is not happiness but it is greatness." Much earlier he had said: "When a stupid man is doing something of which he is thoroughly ashamed he is sure to tell you that it is his duty." Now Caesar was not a stupid man, but is not the fatal defect in the idea of the philosopher-king here exposed? It is terribly difficult for even a benevolent dictator to distinguish between "what has to be done" and that "duty" which is only an apologetic name for something of which anybody ought to feel thoroughly ashamed. There was a great English writer between Shakespeare and Shaw who spoke wisely of "necessity, the tyrant's plea."

MANNY

LET Stevens or Kazan win their Oscars; The Nation's Emanuel—a life-size drip-celluloid statue of Kirk Douglas ranting and disintegrating in the vengeful throes of death—goes to the man or men responsible for each of the following unheralded productions of 1951.

"Little Big Horn." A low-budget Western, produced by Lippert, starring John Ireland and Lloyd Bridges. This tough-minded, unconventional, persuasive look-in on a Seventh Cavalry patrol riding inexorably through hostile territory to warn Custer about the trap Sitting Bull had set for him was almost as good in its unpolished handling of the regular-army soldier as James Jones's big novel. For once, the men appear as individuals rather than types—grousing, ornery, uprooted, complicated individuals, riding off to glory against their will and better judgment, working together as a team (for all their individualism) in a genuinely loose, efficient, unfriendly American style. The only naturalistic photography of the year; perhaps the best acting of the year in Ireland's graceful, somber portrait of a warm-hearted but completely disillusioned lieutenant who may or may not have philandered with his captain's wife.

"Fixed Bayonets." Sam Fuller's jagged, suspenseful, off-beat variant of the Mauldin cartoon, expanded into a full-length Korean battle movie without benefit of the usual newsreel clips. Funny, morbid; the best war film since "Bataan." I wouldn't mind seeing it seven times.

"His Kind of Woman." Good coarse romantic-adventure nonsense, exploiting the expressive dead pans of Robert Mitchum and Jane Russell, a young man and a young woman who would probably enjoy doing in real life what they have to do here for RKO. Vincent Price superb in his one right role—that of a ham actor thrown suddenly into a situation calling for high melodramatic courage. Russell's petulant, toneless rendition of "Five Little Miles from San Berdoo" is high art of a sort.

"The Thing." Howard Hawks's science-fiction quickie, fast, crisp, and cheap, without any progressive-minded gospel-reading about neighborliness in the atom age; good airplane take-offs and landings; wonderful shock effects (the plants that cry for human blood as human babies cry for milk); Kenneth Tobey's fine unpolished performance of a nice, clean, lecherous American air-force officer; well-cast story, as raw and ferocious as Hawks's "Scarface," about a battle of wits near the North Pole between a screaming banshee of a vegetable and an air-force crew that jabbers away as sharply and sporadically as Jimmy Cagney moves.

"The Prowler." A tabloid melodrama of sex and avarice in suburbia, strictly from James M. Cain, featuring almost perfect acting by Evelyn Keyes as a hot, dumb average American babe who, finding the attentions of her middle-aged disc-jockey husband beginning to pall, takes up with an amoral rookie cop (nicely hammed up by Van Heflin). Sociologically sharp on stray and hitherto untouched items like motels, athletic nostalgia, the impact of nouveau-riche furnishings on an ambitious ne'er-do-well, the potentially explosive boredom of the childless, uneducated, well-to-do housewife with too much time on her hands.

"The People Against O'Hara." An adroit, scholarly example of sound story-telling that every Message Boy should be made to study as an example of how good you can get when you neither slant nor oversimplify. Also highly enjoyable for its concern about a "static" subject—the legal profession, as such—and the complete authority with which it handles soft-pedaled insights into things like the structure and routine of law offices; the politics of conviviality between cops, D. A.'s, judges, attorneys; the influence of bar associations; the solemn manner of memorializing the wrench caused by the death of a colleague; the painful "homework" of committing to memory the endless ramifications of your case as well as the words you are going to feed the jury in the morning.

"The Day the Earth Stood Still." Science-fiction again, this time with ideals; a buoyant, imaginative filtering around in Washington, D. C., upon the arrival of a high-minded interplanetary federalist from Mars, or somewhere; matter-of-fact statements about white-collar shabby gentility in boarding-houses, offices, and the like; imaginative interpretation of a rocket ship and its robot crew; good fun, for a minute, when the visitor turns off all the electricity in the world; Pat Neal good, as usual, as a young mother who believes in progressive education.

"The Man Who Cheated Himself." A lightweight O. Henry-type story about a cop who hoists himself on his own petard; heavyweight acting by Jane Wyatt and Lee Cobb; as a consequence, the only film this year to take a moderate, morally fair stand on moderately suave and immoral Americans, aged about forty. An effortlessly paced story, impressionistically coated with San Francisco's oatmeal-gray atmosphere; at the end it wanders into an abandoned fort or prison and shows Hitchcock and Carol Reed how to sidestep hokum in a corny architectural monstrosity. Cobb packs more psychological truths about joyless American promiscuity into one ironic stare, one drag on a cigarette, or one uninterested kiss than all the Man-kiewicz heroes put together.

"Background to Danger." Tough, perceptive, commercial job glorifying the P-men (Post Office sleuths), set in an authentically desolate wasteland around Gary, Indiana, crawling with pessimistic mail-robbers who act as though they'd seen too many movies like "Asphalt Jungle." Tight plotting, good casting, and sinuously droopy acting by Jan Sterling as an easily-had broad who only really gets excited about—and really understands—waxed bop. Interesting for such sidelights as the semi-demi-hemi-quaver of romantic attachment between the head P-man and a beautiful nun.

And, for want of further space, six-inch Emanuels to the following also-rans: "The Tall Target," "Against the Gun," "No Highway in the Sky," "Happiest Days of Your Life," "Rawhide," Skelton's "Excuse My Dust," "The Enforcer," "Force of Arms," "The Wooden Horse," "Night into Morning," "Payment on Demand," "Cry Danger," and an animated cartoon—the title escapes me—about a crass, earnest, herky-jerky dog that knocks its brains out trying to win a job in a Pisa pizza joint.

Records

B. H.
HAGGIN

THE shift of the N. B. C. Symphony broadcasts from Studio 8H to Carnegie Hall has improved the over-all quality of the sound that comes out of our radios, giving it a warmth and naturalness which the sound from 8H did not have. But whereas C. B. S.'s method of picking up the New York Philharmonic in Carnegie Hall brings us an orchestra which is at a sufficient distance for the components of the sound to be spaced out, N. B. C. transmits a sound whose components are tightly crowded in on us as though we were placed right in the middle of the orchestra.

In Carnegie Hall the N. B. C. Symphony plays and sounds, under Toscanini's and Cantelli's direction, like the great orchestra it became the year of the transcontinental tour—with the unanimity, precision, finish, and sensitivity, the blending, refinement, and beauty of tone that were carried to breath-taking incandescence in the performance of Debussy's "La Mer" at the final concert of the tour in Philadelphia. A week or two later "La Mer" was recorded—but not in the Academy of Music or Carnegie Hall; and the newly issued RCA Victor LP record gives us the performance with the altered sound it had in Studio 8H—some of the most agreeable sound we have ever had from that accursed place, but not what I heard in Philadelphia. And not with the warmth and distinctness of the sound of the New York Philharmonic on the Columbia LP record of the performance of "La Mer" conducted by Mitropoulos. The Mitropoulos violence produces nothing worse than an excessive acceleration here and retardation there; so that on the whole the performance is an acceptable and effective one, though not what Toscanini's has become—the definitive performance of our time. Coupled with Toscanini's "La Mer" is a transference of his older recording of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music—quite satisfactory with treble stepped up; coupled with Mitropoulos's is Debussy's "Iberia" played by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Ormandy—one of Ormandy's better performances, and the first Columbia recording to reproduce the orchestra's playing not only with distinctness but with the warmth and sheen of its sound.

Of the Bach Harpsichord Concertos Nos. 3 and 4 recorded for the Bach Guild (Vanguard) by Kurt Rapf and a small Viennese orchestra, No. 3 is an alternate version of the E major Violin Concerto, with a superb slow movement whose long-breathed melodic flow is more effective with the sustained tone of the violin, and No. 4 has only a moderately engaging first movement. The performances are good.

Some of the works of Vivaldi that we know well are very beautiful; but the unfamiliar Concertos in E minor and F and Violin Concertos in C and B flat recorded for the first time by Polymusic I find mostly uninteresting. Elliot Magaziner's violin tone is a little veiled; the playing of the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris under Charles Bruck is good; surfaces are a little gritty.

Beecham's often graceless and ponderous performances of Haydn's

Symphonies Nos. 94 ("Surprise") and 103 ("Drum Roll") with his Royal Philharmonic (Columbia) provide further evidence of the recent deterioration in his work; and their recorded sound becomes coarse, dull, and enveloped in distortion as the pickup moves toward the center of the record. His performance of Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" Overture, on another record, is also over-deliberate; that of the "Ruy Blas" Overture is good; surfaces are a little gritty. Still another record offers his excellent performances of the Suite from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Le Coq d'or," some of Rimsky's best music, and Franck's "Le Chasseur maudit," a poor work.

Considered by itself Monteux's new performance of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre du printemps" with the Boston Symphony (RCA Victor) is competent and effective; but it lacks the force of Stravinsky's own dynamic performance with the New York Philharmonic, or even of Ansermet's more stolid performance with L'Orchestre de la Suisse romande. The recorded sound of Stravinsky's performance is clear and cold; that of Ansermet's has the spatial depth and roundness of London orchestral recording; that of Monteux's has Victor's warmth and radiance. My choice would be the Stravinsky.

And I would choose Ansermet's somewhat stolid performance of the complete score of Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" in preference to the violent one by Mitropoulos and the New York Philharmonic (Columbia) and the frenetic one by Stokowski and an assembled orchestra (Victor). But best of all, again, is Stravinsky's own, inadequately reproduced performance of excerpts with the New York Philharmonic; and one wishes he would make a new recording of the entire score.

As for Milhaud's "La Création du monde" and Copland's "El Salón Mexicano," excellently performed by orchestras under Leonard Bernstein (Columbia): the idea behind Milhaud's use of jazz in his piece—that because jazz is the music of the American Negro it is the right material for a ballet about "the creation of the world as it might be imagined by an aboriginal mind"—seems to me fallacious; but a couple of the passages in which Milhaud uses jazz material are effective, and indeed the only good things in the piece. That is more than I can say for Copland's work, into which he says he hoped to have put something of the spirit of the Mexican people that he felt in the popular tunes he heard. With his treatment of the languorous tunes—which I would again describe as putting them into a rhythmic straitjacket and pouring harmonic acid on them—I would say he put into the work the spirit not of the Mexican people but of Aaron Copland.

SEPARATION OF CHURCH AND STATE

—POAU—

THE CRISIS precipitated by President Truman's appointment of an Ambassador to the papal head of the Roman Catholic Church must arouse every patriotic American to a sense of his personal responsibility in preventing the consummation of this threat to religious liberty in the United States. Our Constitution guarantees religious liberty by maintaining the separation of Church and State. An Ambassador to the Pope is a clear violation of this constitutional principle. It gives a single church a secret and official access to the ear of our government which no other church would accept. It is a defiant violation of the First Amendment and will place all non-Roman churches in a subordinate status in American society.

A vigorous and expensive campaign lies ahead to prevent the consummation of this un-American and unconstitutional project. The P O A U is spearheading a national campaign to alert the nation to the danger. It will extend into many weeks while the Senate debates the issue. If the appointment is confirmed by the Senate, the campaign will extend into an indefinite future.

P O A U will carry the banner of opposition until this high-handed invasion of religious liberty is triumphantly defeated. It has already held 50 of a projected 100 mass meetings in cities and towns across the nation to arouse public opinion and focus it upon the Senate. It needs money for every form of publicity — newspaper, radio, television, direct mailing, and legal action in case this becomes necessary.

The campaign which P O A U foresees will require a great increase of its present budget. Many large gifts and thousands and thousands of smaller gifts must be forthcoming.

In this battle for religious liberty and equality of all churches before the law, P O A U is the nationally recognized spearhead of militant patriotic action. It is the agency through which this present peril to American freedom may be averted.

The Shape of Things

FRANCO, IT SEEMS, IS ALL BUT IN THE family. At first, when Paul A. Porter, acting Mutual Security Administrator, announced that the United States and Spain were about to negotiate an economic-aid agreement, the State Department made sounds of surprise and protested that major decisions had yet to be made with respect to the "basic military relationship" between the two nations. It looked, too, as if objections might be raised in the Pentagon unless the issue of bases for dollars were settled in advance on more favorable terms than Franco is known to have agreed to. But apparently these reactions were sparked by crossed wires rather than by any basic doubts. Mr. Porter is reported as saying that talks would begin by the middle of the month and an agreement would be concluded within ten days thereafter. If this schedule is held to, objectors will have to move fast. But no one seriously doubts that a Security Agency and permanent military mission will soon be established in Madrid and a deal made granting Spain—to begin with—$100,000,000 in military and other aid and formally converting Franco into an ally of this country. More funds will certainly follow, for Mr. Porter's decision was based in large measure on the recent report made by Professor Sidney C. Suffrin of Syracuse University, who recommended an annual United States subsidy of $150,000,000 to bolster up Spain's economy at its weakest points and make it a military asset instead of a burden.

ONE POINT MR. PORTER STRESSED SEVERAL times. Franco is not to be pressed to reform his regime. "I look upon it [American aid] from the standpoint of an economic investment." This cold bargaining position does not shock us as it seems to shock some of our liberal contemporaries. We have never liked the look of political strings attached to American dollars; and if we did, we would know in this particular case that they would have no meaning. Franco cannot liberalize his regime. To do so would be to invite its overthrow. Not even American dollars could save him if he allowed the Spanish people to speak or vote or strike freely. If we are to join hands with a fascist dictator, better to do so without camouflage, on Porter's formula. The sickening fact is not that we exact no political concessions from Franco but that we should ally ourselves with him on any terms. Those who read the remarkable articles by Robert Fromm in the two last issues of The Nation will realize with new acuteness what sort of ally we are buying. What most Americans may not yet realize is that our decision to support the Franco regime with money and military missions will inevitably have the effect of converting Franco's internal enemies—the oppressed people of Spain—into enemies of the United States. How can it be otherwise, since we are committed to the survival and strengthening of his rule? And if this is true, how secure can we feel even in the bases and airfields we get for our dollars?

RECENT DEVELOPMENTS IN THE UNITED Nations secretariat indicate that relations between Trygve Lie and his staff continue to deteriorate. Another leading official of the Staff Association (see editorial comment in The Nation of July 28, 1951), H. Lukin Robinson of Canada, has been dismissed with no reason assigned; and now Mr. Lie proposes to ask the General Assembly for practically dictatorial power to set aside staff regulations and the findings of the Administrative Tribunal, all as part of a campaign to drive from the secretariat persons whom he regards as "bad international civil servants." As bearing on Mr. Lie's conception of a "good international civil servant," it is reported that he informed the chairman of the Staff Committee recently in Paris that the staff would have to decide whether "it is loyal to me or loyal to Lukin Robinson." Mr. Robinson, it will be recalled, was assigned by the Staff Association to defend, before the Appeals Board, fellow staff officers who had been dismissed early in 1951. It is to be hoped that a widely representative group of delegations will call a halt to this program of intimidation and reprisal.

centration camps should the United States be invaded or should war be declared or an insurrection take place. No slum-clearance features will be part of these singular housing projects, which will accommodate when completed about 3,000 dissenters. News stories refer to their construction as "a big-scale operation, providing for a possible roundup of many thousand potential spies and saboteurs." It was Mr. McGrath's predecessor, Tom Clark, who as an Assistant Attorney General laid the constitutional groundwork for these ominous institutions. Mr. Clark was in charge of rounding up 100,000 Japanese Americans during World War II and placing them in so-called "relocation centers," one of which, that at Tule Lake, will be used as an additional future concentration camp. Unfortunately, the Supreme Court, in the Korematsu case, upheld the executive order under which the Japanese were removed from the West Coast and placed in detention centers. And this decision will be cited as the precedent for upholding the provisions of the McCarran act under which any person who, "there is reasonable grounds to believe," might conspire with others to commit acts of sabotage or espionage in an emergency may be arrested and detained in the concentration camps now being constructed.

THE STATE DEPARTMENT HAS DENOUNCED as false the Russian charge that American forces are transporting Chinese Nationalist troops to Southeast Asia for possible action against Communist China. Washington stories state that the charge may be a "cover" for aggressive action planned by the Communists in Indo-China or elsewhere, but items appearing in the American press with Taipei and Hongkong date-lines lend some support if not to this then to another recent Soviet accusation, made in the United Nations—namely, that the United States is plotting subversive activities in Communist-controlled countries. For example, on December 4, Jim G. Lucas, in the New York World-Telegram and Sun, reported from Taipei that Major General William C. Chase does not regard Formosa as "an isolated area" and that he would soon pay a visit to Major General John Cole, who heads our military mission in Thailand. An A. P. dispatch from Taipei on December 26 said that a Nationalist officer and twelve soldiers had been killed in an attack on an island off Fukien held by the Chinese Communists. Although not previously announced, the attack took place on December 7. On December 27 a U. P. dispatch from Hongkong announced that six unidentified planes had attacked the Communist-held island of Taichan. And on December 31, General Chase, in an interview at Taipei, stated that the United States and Nationalist China might work as "a team in action outside Formosa." The same dispatch quoted Chiang Kai-shek as saying that Formosa was being prepared as a model province "for the recovery of all China." All this may fall under the heading of psychological warfare designed to deter possible Chinese aggression in Southeast Asia, but it points to the danger that Chiang's continued occupation of Formosa with a large force, armed and trained by Americans, may involve us in further difficulties with Communist China. Formosa is a time-bomb ticking off the coast of Asia.

WHEN A YOUNG AMERICAN OF INDIAN descent, slain in Korea, was refused burial last summer in a Nebraska cemetery because his heritage was something less than pure white, President Truman rightly denounced this most un-American outrage. Now the President may be forced to repeat his denunciation. Another Korean veteran, this time a nineteen-year-old Negro from Phoenix, Arizona, has been denied burial in a veterans' plot in Greenwood Memorial Park. A policy of the park—owned and operated by Arizona Lodge Number 2 of the Free and Accepted Masons—has been to bury Negro veterans only after three notarized letters of request have been received from veterans' organizations. The father of the dead soldier has refused to ask for such a humiliating "clearance." He believes his dead son should be buried in a democratic manner beside his fallen comrades—just as his life was taken from him—without regard to his race or color or creed. But efforts to lift the cemetery's bar have been blocked on the ground that they would constitute "undue interference in the cemetery's affairs," and consequently the soldier's body has been lying in the morgue for more than five weeks. Thus a new twist has been given to racist practice, which now follows its victims to their very graves. An official of Greenwood Memorial Park has said: "... we got a place for all races and creeds out here. The soil is the same in one part . . . as it is in another."

POOLS OF UNEMPLOYMENT ARE BEGINNING to appear in industries where new defense orders are insufficient to compensate for cuts in production due to sharply reduced allocations of materials. In the Detroit district, for example, the number of jobless has risen to 120,000—80 per cent more than twelve months ago—largely owing to layoffs in the automobile industry. It will rise still farther if the Defense Production Authority abides by its plan to restrict the output of private cars to 800,000 units in the second quarter of this year. Labor and management alike are protesting on the ground that the proposed cut is discriminatory, but DPA spokesmen claim that the automobile industry is actually being given special consideration. The contemplated cut will bring it down to 52 per cent of pre-Korean output, while some other consumer-goods industries are being restricted to 35 per cent of that level. On the other hand, the social impact of sharply reduced production is especially serious in the case of automobiles because of the immense size and geographical concentration of the industry. Moreover, it seems that it may be many months before arms contracts take up the slack. The Ford Company, for instance, expects to fill only $400,000,000 worth of defense orders this year while losing $1,300,000,000 worth of civilian output. Such a hiatus suggests faulty planning in Washington. But it may be that some responsibility also attaches to managements which have been reluctant to turn to defense production so long as the demand for cars was high and materials could be scraped together.

THE WEST AGAINST ITSELF IS AN OLD THEME.

Nearly half a century ago, Western Senators and Representatives, obedient to the timber interests, put up the major opposition to the creation of federal forest reserves in the Western states. Similar disregard of the people's interests is now exhibited by Idaho's solidly Republican delegation on Capitol Hill, which is trying to block the construction of Hell's Canyon Dam across the Snake River. The Idaho politicians are supporting, instead, a proposal of the Idaho Power Company to erect five low dams on the Snake. Idaho is without any important home industry, and low-cost electric power is the state's principal need. The five Idaho Power Company dams would generate 487,000 kilowatts of prime power. The dam in Hell's Canyon would produce 688,000 kilowatts at the site, and by storing water for release during the dry season, would add 742,000 kilowatts to the output of Bonneville and McNary Dams, downstream on the Columbia River system. Thus the elected representatives of the people of Idaho are willing to settle for only one-third of the energy which might ultimately be made available to them in order to protect the preferential position of a private power monopoly. The Hell's Canyon Dam would also provide flood-control benefits all the way to the sea, while the Idaho Power Company dams would be useless for that purpose. The Idaho Power Company, moreover, charges a substantially higher rate for industrial power than that offered by the Bonneville-Grand Coulee grid, and Hell's Canyon's kilowatts would flow into this system. A bill authorizing construction of the Hell's Canyon project is now before the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

SENATOR ALLEN J. ELLENDER, RETURNING from a trip to Europe, has discovered that while the United States is assisting Austria with ECA money, France, Russia, and Britain are demanding from Austria some 150,000,000 shillings a year for occupation costs. To the Senator this seems so sensational that he wants to call the Austrian Chancellor Figl as a witness before a Senate investigating committee. The Chancellor's response was somewhat embarrassed—about the way a Nobel Prize winner might react when called to testify on the validity of the multiplication table. Senator Ellender seems to have overlooked the fact that the United States has been paying its way in Austria for the past four years and assisting the Austrian government, first with army funds, later under the Marshall Plan. The British, while obtaining Austrian shillings for occupation costs, have contributed substantial relief funds to Austria. The problem is thus essentially one of inducing France and the Soviet Union to forego their demands upon Austria. If the Senator intends to do this, we wish him the best of luck. But does he really think this purpose would be served by his opposing further assistance to Austria? Moscow can hardly be expected to change its foreign policy under the threat of a lowered living standard—in Vienna.

Mr. Truman Versus A. M. A.

THE President's appointment of a Commission on the Health Needs of the Nation is in one sense a confession of failure, since it means that he has abandoned hope of early passage by Congress of his national health-insurance bill. However, the move shows that Mr. Truman is not prepared to surrender to the American Medical Association, whose expensive and unprincipled propaganda against "socialized medicine" has been a prime factor in blocking action for a national health service. The new commission should at least keep public interest in the problem alive, and if it performs a thorough job of fact-finding, it may provide us with a really authoritative up-to-date picture of our health set-up.

No one can say that the commission has been "packed." Its chairman is Dr. Paul B. Magnuson, distinguished Chicago surgeon and former chief medical director of the Veterans' Administration, who even if he does not share the A. M. A.'s complacency is on record as opposing compulsory health insurance. A number of highly qualified physicians and medical educators have also consented to serve, together with a group of prominent laymen representing labor, farmers, and consumers.

Nevertheless, the appointment of the commission has been violently attacked by Dr. John W. Cline, president of the A. M. A., who charges that President Truman's action is "a brazen misuse of defense-emergency funds for a program of political propaganda designed to influence legislation and the outcome of the 1952 elections." According to Dr. Cline, "there is no health emergency in this country to require such an investigation," since "the health of the American people never has been better."

This onslaught, with its undertone of self-satisfaction, was easily predictable from the record of the A. M. A., which has a Candide-like faith that, medically speaking, this is the best of all possible worlds. Last June, in a speech at the dedication of the National Institutes of Health Clinical Center, President Truman said that in advocating health insurance he was not wedded to any particular plan. "What I want," he continued, "is a good workable plan that will enable all Americans to pay for the medical care that they need. And I will say here and now that if the people who have been blocking health insurance for five years will come up with a better proposal—or even with one that is almost as good—I will go along with them." Replying to this challenge, Dr. Cline declared: "A better program already is available and is functioning admirably—the American medical system, which has made this the healthiest great nation in the world."

Such ineradicable smugness itself proves the need for an objective survey of the medical facilities available to the American people. Possibly this country is the healthiest in the world—the Swedes might challenge that—but certainly good health is not available in equal measure to all the people. In the country as a whole, for instance, there is 1 physician for every 741 persons, but in Mississippi the ratio is 1 to 1,449 and in South Dakota 1 to 1,316. For the United States the infant-mortality rate has been brought down to 32 per 1,000 live births (1948) compared with 47 ten years earlier. But in New Mexico 70 out of every 1,000 babies die in their first year, which may have some connection with the fact that 34.4 per cent of the births in that state were unattended by physicians. (Incidentally, both maternal and infant-mortality rates are lower in socialized Britain than in the United States.)

Even the A. M. A. admits that more doctors are needed and that medical educational facilities are inadequate. It has started a fund for their improvement but apparently has not been as successful in raising money for this purpose as in passing the hat to fight national health insurance. As a result, the rush of medical students to Europe is so great that Dr. Morris Fishbein, a veteran opponent of public medicine, has been led to declare that some means must be found to utilize government funds for medical schools.

But the training of more doctors, important as that is, will not by itself solve the problem of the high cost of medical care, which puts it beyond the reach of millions and in cases of serious illness not infrequently swallows up the life savings of comparatively well-to-do people. Blue Cross and other prepaid voluntary-insurance plans have modified the problem to some extent, but they have not proved an answer to those groups most in need of better health services. Possibly some compromise between the wholly voluntary system and compulsory national insurance may provide a feasible solution, and any recommendations that the President's commission may make on this score will deserve careful consideration. But until some other plan is adumbrated, "socialized medicine" holds the field as the best means of raising health standards to the high level which the wealth of this country and progress of the healing arts make possible.

The Vatican Appointment: A Second Look

DESPITE the many puzzling and contradictory aspects, it is now possible to trace at least the main outline of the story behind President Truman's extraordinary announcement of October 20 that he had nominated General Mark W. Clark as ambassador to the Vatican.

Although the President acted suddenly, it is now clear that he had had the appointment under consideration for a long time. In a press conference on October 26 he said that he had been studying the question ever since the retirement of Myron C. Taylor in 1949 as his personal representative at the Vatican. The abruptness with which the Taylor mission was terminated had come as a shock to the Holy See, and a marked change had been noted in Vatican protocol in dealing with American visitors and related matters. President Truman had been urged at the time, by Representative John McCormack and others, to meet the issue by sending a minister to the Vatican; but apparently neither a minister nor a "personal representative" was what the Vatican wanted.

There the matter rested for some time, although the debate within the Administration continued. Then, in January, 1951, the President privately offered the ambassadorship to Charles P. Taft, formerly president of the Federal Council of Churches. Mr. Taft declined it.

In May and again early in the summer Mr. Truman assured Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam that the appointment would not be made, but before long the goings and comings between Rome and Washington indicated that the issue was once again receiving top-level consideration. On October 12 Representative Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., announced from Rome that no action was likely to be taken before the 1952 Presidential election; in the double-talk of politics this implied that an appointment was in the cards.

It is evident, therefore, that although the President's decision to send the name of General Clark to the Senate may have been abrupt and dictated by purely tactical political reasons, the idea of resuming diplomatic relations with the Vatican was part of a carefully thought-out strategy. Several Washington columnists have recently reported that Mr. Truman is entirely serious about the matter; one of them has said he intends to send a representative to the Vatican "no matter what happens to delay or block confirmation" of the Clark appointment. It can be taken for granted, therefore, that Mr. Truman intends to have his way on this issue.

The timing and method of the announcement, however, appear to have been influenced by short-range political considerations. Clark was named on October 20. Two days later, when Philip Jessup was given his interim appointment as United States delegate to the U. N., the opposition of McCarthy and McCarran was noisy but ineffective. General Clark's name was sent to the Senate a few hours before it adjourned and with no advance notice. Since unanimous consent would have been required to consider the appointment, the President cannot have expected it to be confirmed. Also Mr. Truman named a general of the active army who had already assured him that he did not intend to resign. Unanimous consent would also have been necessary for consideration of legislation required to exempt General Clark from the provisions of the 1870 statute barring such appointments. Obviously, therefore, the proposal was made in a way that insured postponement of ratification until January, with no interim appointment possible. These facts justify the conclusion that the President intended to put Congress "on the spot," to embarrass Senator Taft in particular, and to create an issue out of which he could win political advantage. The more strenuously the Protestants attacked the appointment, the more strenuously—by inference—the Catholics would have to rally to the defense of the Administration, McCarthy and McCarran to the contrary notwithstanding. But politics are not always as simple as the blueprints of politicians. In this case there is reason to believe that the President's handling of the entire affair was a diplomatic and political blunder.

In the first place, Mr. Truman announced that General Clark was being named as ambassador "to the State of Vatican City." That even this would be unacceptable to the Pope was made crystal-clear in a column by Anne O'Hare McCormick in the New York Times of December 24. Writing from Rome, Mrs. McCormick said:

Advocates who argue that the appointment is not to a religious leader but to the ruler of the scrap of real estate called Vatican City do not get much support here. The mission is either to the Pope as the head of a world-wide church or it is nothing . . . to pretend anything else is to make the appointment useless or reduce it to absurdity. All other countries sending representatives to the Vatican accredit them to the Holy See, and

If the United States decides to send one at all it will follow the regular formula.

Reports from Rome in the wake of the announcement were eloquent of Papal dissatisfaction. Naming a military man as ambassador was itself a source of annoyance, for it emphasized the strategic aspects of the appointment. "If I go," said General Clark, "I will go as a military man in much the same status as General Walter Bedell Smith when he went to Moscow." A similar diplomatic faux pas was implicit in Mrs. Roosevelt's comment that the appointment would have "tremendous value in our fight against Communist Russia" and would "broaden the base of our intelligence," since the Vatican had "many good men behind the Iron Curtain." Dispatches from Rome quickly pointed out that this careless reference would constitute "excellent justification for the jailing and expulsion" of priests in Iron Curtain countries. Referring to Vatican sources, they also emphasized that the whole idea of "blocs and groupings" was repugnant to the church, that the announcement of the President's decision had been greeted with "marked reserve," and that even confirmation of an ambassador would not be construed as meaning that the "Holy See has become a member of the North Atlantic Military Alliance." These rather frosty comments seemed intended as a rebuke to those who had presumed to address the church as though it were merely another European state.

But the larger issue relates, of course, to the question of strategy: did the President strengthen the forces "combating communism" by appointing an ambassador to the State of Vatican City? The Pope's Christmas Eve message, which emphasized again the church's neutrality in the conflict between East and West and its unwillingness to enter into an alliance with any temporal power, arouses serious doubt that the appointment has improved relations between the Vatican and the United States. At the same time, confirmation of the appointment is more likely to undermine than to strengthen those "center" political groups which, both in Italy and France, contain important anti-clerical elements (see William Murray's article elsewhere in this issue). Nor did the President's move contribute to the improvement of Anglo-American relations. It has been suggested that one reason for British coolness toward the European federation planned at Strasbourg is that such a federation would be dominated by Catholics. This would lend credence to the theory lately advanced in the European press that the appointment of an American ambassador was intended to win Vatican support for the idea of a "little federation," should the larger European federation not be achieved. The "little federation" would be composed of France, Italy, and perhaps Luxembourg, and would, of course, be almost exclusively Catholic.

In the United States the effect of the appointment, on the eve of a Presidential election, was not only to increase disunity and tension but to embarrass an important minority among the Catholics themselves. Religious differences have been given greater political significance than they have had in many years. It is already clear that parties and candidates will attempt to use the Vatican issue to their own advantage. Already, too, Protestant groups are displaying a new political unity of action. In this sense, the appointment subverts the civic unity which we have always managed to maintain as a people, with a few lapses, despite our manifold racial, ethnic, and religious differences.

But apart from its political impact, both abroad and at home, there is no reason to think that the sending of an ambassador to the Vatican will be of assistance in the effort to contain communism. The notion that the Vatican is an invaluable "listening post" has been pretty thoroughly demolished. Dr. Henry P. Van Dusen, president of the Union Theological Seminary, has pointed out that on three recent occasions of the highest importance to the Papacy—the agreement of the Polish government with the Roman Catholic bishops, the banishment of Archbishop Beran from Prague, and the trial and conviction of Archbishop Grosz in Hungary—the Vatican received its first information from secular sources. Time magazine said: "The efficiency of the Vatican's 'world-wide information service' has probably been exaggerated for many years." The Pope, of course, has frequently and vigorously condemned communism, but he continues to insist that the church cannot be an ally in a struggle for power. Even if this statement is to be taken with serious reservations, the presence of strong Communist parties in Catholic France and Italy would indicate that Catholicism is not always an effective anti-toxin against communism.

We have discussed the appointment as a political matter, since that is apparently its chief strategic significance. In the blind struggle for power now being waged throughout the world it seems almost irrelevant to raise an issue of principle. But that issue cannot be pushed aside. Does the appointment violate the principle of the separation of church and state? Speaking as "a life-long Baptist," Mr. Truman has said "certainly not," but the Baptists, including his own pastor, strenuously disagree. In our view, the appointment violates the principle not only in the narrow sense that it might be ruled unconstitutional if a test could be devised but in the much broader sense of undermining the tradition, the experience, the meaning of the principle itself. As Bishop Oxnam has pointed out, an ambassador in Rome means an ambassador here. The presence of a papal nuncio in Washington would surely give a privileged status to one religious faith not enjoyed by any others. It would also support the contentions of those who have stressed the political orientation of the church and the implications of its hierarchical structure to a democracy. The question, indeed, would arise, whether the members of the Roman hierarchy should be required to register as agents of a foreign power. More important, perhaps, is the fact that the appointment represents a regression to an outmoded, European form of church-state relationship. If it stands—whether General Clark or another is confirmed—it will be only the first step in a process that will reverse the historical American position on church and state. To most of us this would be far too high a price to pay for even a brilliant diplomatic success; it is incontestably too high a price to pay for a diplomatic blunder which has annoyed those it was supposed to please and confirmed the suspicions of those it was certain to annoy.

The Passing of Litvinov

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Paris, January 4

IT WAS one of my greatest privileges to work closely with Maxim Litvinov in the Council of the League of Nations. In a volume of German documents on Spain seized by the Allied armies and published by the State Department at the beginning of last year there is more than one reference to that period and that association. Hitler's ambassadors were uneasy when they saw the case of Spain taken to heart by a man of such tremendous powers of persuasion and such penetrating insight.

Litvinov, of course, realized that the question of whether or not there would be a second world war would be decided in Spain, and I had his full support in the Council from the day I predicted that if Hitler were not stopped in Spain, general war was unavoidable. But I prefer to think of Litvinov's role in another great hour, when Spain was not a direct issue—the period preceding the Munich disaster. He had always been convinced that the only hope of keeping the peace was to confront Germany with an irresistible security bloc; and in spite of so many previous failures in the League, he tried with all his strength to inject the will to resist into the weak chorus of the Chamberlains and Bonnets. I saw him constantly during those days and I am a witness to his determination, and Russia's determination, to back the League to the limit if the League stood up to its duty.

He had many advantages over most of his colleagues, and one of them was his knowledge of the essence of fascism and his hatred of it. I am sure that until the day of his death he felt the same.

He knew the West quite well; especially he knew its leaders. His unique experience of having worked for years, and successfully, to break the cordon sanitaire around the Soviet state made him a realist in his approach to Western policy. From the moment that Czechoslovakia became the issue in the Assembly of 1938, he clearly foresaw how events would unfold. For he realized that hatred and fear of communism would prevail even over the instinct of national patriotism and self-defense. He anticipated Munich, and Munich took place. His formula for dispelling the apparent obscurity of an international situation would today lead inevitably to the conclusion that the main goal of the policy of containment is to rule out the possibility of negotiation with Russia.

By an ironical coincidence Litvinov was buried in the Novo-dyevichi cemetery the day the Political Committee in the Palais de Chaillot started debate on the work of the Collective Measures Committee. It was Litvinov who, not in theory but in practice, concluded the most exemplary non-aggression pacts with Russia's border states, who negotiated the French-Russian pact, who presented the League with a definition of aggression that has never been improved upon, and who not only declared peace "indivisible" but knew how to combine strengthening the defensive position of his own country with strengthening peace throughout the world.

Hoping against hope, I continued to believe that improvement in his health and changed circumstances might permit Litvinov's reappearance on the world scene at a moment when Germany, in defiance of the dictates of reason, was being transformed into the cornerstone of Western policy. He knew Germany as no one else did.

But now Litvinov is gone. In years to come historians and commentators on foreign affairs will appreciate much better than they do today the real stature of this remarkable man.

The Voice of Science

BY LEONARD ENGEL

THE biggest annual event for American scientists is the Christmas-week meeting of the 103-year-old American Association for the Advancement of Science. While important discoveries are seldom announced at the meeting—most scientists prefer to publish them in professional journals as soon as they are made—its symposia and invited addresses, plus corridor gossip, accurately reflect the main trends in American science.

This year's meeting in Philadelphia was the most "political" I can remember. No fewer than eight symposia, some extending through two or three sessions, were largely concerned with the difficulties of science in the contemporary political world. (Many other sessions were devoted to the help science can offer in solving the world's problems, such as food resources and social change, but science has always had a lot to say about that; I am talking about the problems the world has created for science.) The views expressed were not always welcome to liberal humanists, but many sharp, useful things were said, and the association's Executive Council wound up with a stiff resolution condemning the McCarran act. Dr. Edward U. Condon, target of the House Un-American Activities Committee two years ago, was elected president for 1954—I am told unanimously.

An all-day session on Soviet science was extremely provocative. Dr. Theodosius Dobzhinsky, the Russian-born Columbia University geneticist, unsparingly denounced Russian suppression of Mendelian genetics but pointed out that genetics and other sciences are also subjected to heavy political pressure in the United States. Dr. Russell L. Ackoff, of the Case Institute of Technology, said that there had been no new ideas in the social sciences in Russia since Lenin, but that neither had there been any in the United States in decades. In both countries, he declared, the primary activity of social scientists has been justification of the status quo. (I understand that the meeting of the American Historical Association of New York the same week was a perfect example of what Dr. Ackoff was talking about; the program was devoted almost entirely to a tedious rationalization of current official American policy.)

Two symposia at the scientists' convention took up the question of anti-scientific trends and urged wider public dissemination of the rational scientific approach to social and political problems. The suggestion was made that American science needs a voice to speak for it, continuously and authoritatively, on questions of the day as they come up. I am not sure that this idea is feasible—the voice could represent only the lowest common denominator of the scientific community's opinion—but it is good to see scientists recognize their obligation to speak out as citizens.

Diplomacy, Religion, and the Constitution

BY MARK DE WOLFE HOWE

IT IS a sacred political tradition of the United States that questions of public policy are to be discussed as problems of constitutional law. It was inevitable, therefore, that when President Truman announced his decision to send an ambassador to the Vatican, discussion of the matter should, sooner or later, be directed to the issue whether the President's action violated the provision of the First Amendment that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion." Those who assert that the Presidential proposal is unconstitutional have, quite naturally, turned to passages in recent opinions of the Supreme Court in which the justices, speaking either for themselves or for the court, have made broad pronouncements with respect to the meaning of the American principle of separation embodied in the First Amendment. Perhaps no pronouncement has been more comforting to the President's critics than that of Justice Black in the Everson case: "The 'establishment of religion' clause of the First Amendment means at least this: Neither a state nor the federal government can set up a church. Neither can pass laws which aid one religion, aid all religions, or prefer one religion over another. . . . Neither a state nor the federal government can, openly or secretly, participate in the affairs of any religious organizations or groups and vice versa." It can scarcely be necessary to elaborate upon the application which such pronouncements as this have been given by those who oppose the President's decision. Emphasizing the tenuous character of the Papal claim that Vatican City is a "state" in the sense that international law has used that concept, the critics of President Truman have been insistently asking how the head of one church can constitutionally be granted a status which no other church has sought or secured. Certainly there is grave doubt whether the President's proposal does not violate the principle of separation as formulated by Justice Black.

So far as I know, the most careful effort to answer the President's critics in constitutional terms is that which Professor Edward S. Corwin made in the New York Times on November 12. That answer, if I understand it correctly, involves three basic points. First, it argues that the Executive's diplomatic powers are unlimited and that the President, accordingly, possesses virtually complete discretion to establish diplomatic relations which he believes promise national advantage. Second, the answer of Professor Corwin maintains that the letter of the First Amendment merely prohibits the Congressional enactment of laws respecting an establishment of religion and does not forbid non-legislative action by the President, even if that action, if taken by Congress, would be a violation of the First Amendment. Finally, Professor Corwin emphasizes his belief that there is no procedure by which Presidential action, even if its constitutional validity is doubtful, could be brought in question before the Supreme Court of the United States.

Persuasive and cool-headed as is Professor Corwin's argument, a few questions concerning its validity may properly be raised. It is well to remember, in the first place, that Professor Corwin has been a vigorous critic of recent decisions and dicta of the Supreme Court respecting the purposes and meaning of the First Amendment. His conviction that the court erred when it accepted such broad pronouncements as those of Justice Black which I have quoted leads Professor Corwin to disregard them and to look only to the language and the circumstances surrounding the birth of the First Amendment. It is true, of course, that the text of the amendment limits Congressional action only; yet the court has said that the prohibition applies not simply to Congress but to the federal government. It is difficult to understand, I submit, how in this respect the court could have given the amendment a narrower reading. Those who framed the amendment were surely concerned with imposing limitation upon all branches of the national government, and not simply with providing a safeguard against Congressional action. To accept Professor Corwin's suggestion would seem, furthermore, logically to mean that when other problems of the First Amendment, such, for instance, as those concerning freedom of speech, are dealt with by executive rather than legislative action there are no constitutional barriers to Presidential suppression, at least if that suppression does not involve the imposition of a "rule of conduct" by executive order or decree. Perhaps Jefferson and Madison gave an absurdly extensive interpretation to the First Amendment when they contended that its provisions made a Presidential proclamation of Thanksgiving Day unconstitutional, but they were surely right in believing that the amendment limited executive power to the same extent that it confined legislative authority.

PROFESSOR CORWIN does not make it entirely clear whether in his opinion sending an ambassador to the Vatican would, under recent decisions of the Supreme Court, be unconstitutional. In urging that the Executive's discretion in establishing diplomatic relations is virtually unlimited he seems to accept the principle that no provisions of the Bill of Rights limit Presidential authority in that area. Yet his concluding argument that no procedure exists assuring judicial review either of executive action in making an appointment or of Congressional action in appropriating funds for the purposes of an embassy at the Vatican, seems to assume that serious questions of constitutional law are involved.

Quite possibly Professor Corwin did not intend to leave in his reader's mind the impression that action may be characterized as unconstitutional only when the Supreme Court is empowered to condemn it. It is, however, dangerously easy to read his argument as if it supported that proposition. If "unconstitutional" is so defined for purposes of the current debate, and if Professor Corwin's argument that there is no means by which judicial review could be assured is also accepted, then the Presidential appointment and legislative appropriations in aid of it would be constitutional. Any such narrow definition of terms, however, would have most unfortunate consequences, for it would go far to justify the President and Congress in abdicating their responsibility to observe constitutional limits on their power. If it is important that those limits be seriously considered by the Congress and the President in normal circumstances, when the safeguard of judicial review is at hand, it is doubly important that the responsibility be thoroughly recognized when no procedure exists whereby the issue of constitutional law may be brought to the judiciary for final solution.

In facing the constitutional problem there are, of course, many questions which the President and the Congress must consider. Not the least important of them is the question which Professor Corwin has raised concerning the authority of the President, in handling the nation's diplomatic relations, to follow a discretion leading him in directions which the Supreme Court has said he may not take while dealing with domestic problems. That question is doubtless serious and debatable, and I, for one, should be unwilling to say that Professor Corwin's answer to the problem is not acceptable. In facing that issue, however, the President and the Congress are not as morally free as Professor Corwin seems to think they are to disregard recent decisions of the court concerning the separation of church and state. Whether or not one believes with Professor Corwin that those decisions have distorted the original meaning of the First Amendment, they remain, until reversed, the constitutional law of the land. Certainly those who disagree with the decisions are free to urge their reversal and to marshal the reasons why such decisions, right or wrong, are inapplicable to the problem in hand. What is objectionable, in my eyes, is Professor Corwin's pronouncement that when President Truman nominated an ambassador to the Vatican he "performed an act of state of the most commonplace kind." Surely it was not that. At the very least it was a determination that recent constitutional opinions of the Supreme Court on permissible domestic relations between the national government and churches have slight if any international relevance.

ONE further element in the present controversy deserves emphasis. History is normally the most helpful of instruments in the solution of constitutional questions. Things often done are likely to be classified as constitutionally done. The Supreme Court went surprisingly far in transforming the separation of church and state into a divorce of government and religion. The fact that this transformation has so recently occurred means that the history of relations between the United States and the Vatican, although it is relevant the question of policy, has little constitutional significance. It also means, I suggest, that there is little relevance in the fact, often emphasized by those who support the President's action, that other nations committed to the principle of separation have found no constitutional difficulties in maintaining diplomatic relations with the Vatican. Until another nation committed to separation has gone as far on the road to divorce as the Supreme Court went in the McCollum case it is hard to treat the policies of other nations as having substantial bearing on our constitutional issue. The seas of separation to which the court so recently committed us are more turbulent than the President's supporters are willing to admit. It will be unfortunate if the public is led to believe that the tempest is occurring in a teapot. To evade the storm by seeking refuge in a formula which says that the judiciary has no authority to consider the problem or to control executive discretion is to encourage irresponsibility in government. Discretion is only to be respected when it is conscious of the traditions which surround it and of the limits which an informed conscience sets to its exercise.

The Lesson of the Past

BY JOSEPH L. BLAU

VATICAN CITY is a token of the former temporal power of the Pope. About a thousand people live in its 109 acres. For nearly sixty years before 1929 the secular power of the papacy was non-existent, but through a concordat signed in that year this tiny domain was restored to the ruler of the Roman Catholic church by the Fascist authorities. It is to the Pope as "governor of Vatican City" that President Truman proposes to send an ambassador. The issue will undoubtedly be thoroughly aired before Congress acts. Here I shall explain only that it is not a new one, although it is posed in an unprecedented form.

In the mid-nineteenth century the Papal States formed a significant political entity. Their area was about 16,000 square miles and their population more than 3,000,000. They were no mere "token" of temporal power but a real force in the political life of Italy and Europe. Only the ruler of the Papal States—which included the city of Rome—could hope to become ruler of a unified Italy. Had the democratic forces under Mazzini been able to hold the city, whence the Pope had fled, the course of Italian history might have been changed and with it the history of Europe and America.

As early as 1779 wise John Adams, out of his experience as the representative of his country in France, wrote that he thought the Continental Congress would never "send a Minister to His Holiness, who can do them no service, upon condition of receiving a Catholic legate or nuncio; or, in other words, an ecclesiastical tyrant which, it is hoped, the United States will be too wise ever to admit into their territories." Adams's words were specifically directed against the exchange of representatives. In 1797, during his Administration, the United States established consular offices in the Papal States, but formal diplomatic relations were instituted only after the lapse of half a century.

Pius IX was elevated to the Papacy in June, 1846. Within the limits set by his combination of secular and ecclesiastical authority, he was progressive in his political views. At the beginning of his reign he had a box placed at the Vatican in which citizens might deposit suggestions and complaints. He introduced many long-overdue reforms into the social and political structure of the Papal States and inaugurated a program for improving the material condition of his subjects. In his demand for withdrawal of Austrian troops from Ferrara the long dream of Italian unification was revived under the slogan "Italy, one country, one ruler, and that ruler Pius IX." Even Nicholas Browne, United States consul at Rome, who made no effort to conceal his lack of sympathy with the Papacy, reported to Washington that "many long years have elapsed since the Chair of Peter was filled by a pontiff as amiable and worthy as Pius IX."

In the United States, newspaper editorials, mass-meetings, and legislative resolutions urged the government to make some tangible demonstration of the sympathy of the American people for the new regime. This enthusiasm, culminating in the demand that formal diplomatic relations with the Papal States should be established, was generated by a libertarian political spirit which welcomed Pius IX to the group of enlightened rulers and the Papal dominions to the list of modern states. Scattered signs of aloofness from this general sympathy could not be called opposition. Objections were more concerned with terminology than with ideology. Protestant journals decried the use of such titles as "Reverend Father" and "His Holiness." A Philadelphia paper insisted on using the inexact terms "Italy" and "Italian government" instead of "Pope" and "Papal government." Only a handful of journals, like the Episcopal Churchman of New York, raised the basic question whether political government by religious authorities could at any time be considered desirable.

The Papal authorities had always extended the privileges of the diplomatic corps to the American consuls in Rome. Now they suggested to the American government that they would not be averse to receiving a fully accredited diplomatic representative. Secretary of State Buchanan thereupon recommended to President Polk that an appropriation be sought for opening formal diplomatic relations with the Papal States. Polk's message to Congress of December 7, 1847, transmitted Buchanan's recommendation with this comment: "The interesting political events now in progress in these States, as well as a just regard to our commercial interests, have in my opinion rendered such a measure highly expedient."

The proposal was vehemently debated in the House of Representatives. Lewis C. Levin of Pennsylvania, a leader of the Native American Party, was the spearhead of the opposition. In a long speech on the issue he said that "sympathy with Pope Pius IX appears to be the hobby-horse of political leaders," and "sympathy for the Pope has grown almost into a fashion." The measure was dictated, he asserted, by a desire to attract the votes of Catholic Americans; no public benefit would come from this embassy. Much of his speech, however, was mere Native American vituperation, and his opponents had no difficulty in pointing out his falsifications and misstatements, thus drawing attention away from the real problem to a host of secondary matters. When the question was put to the House, the appropriation for an embassy was approved, 137 to 15. One of the two Roman Catholic members of the House voted for the measure, the other against it. After equally prolonged but far less acrimonious debate, the Senate approved by a vote of 36 to 7.

THE first chargé, Jacob L. Martin, secretary of the American legation at Paris and a Catholic convert, died suddenly soon after reporting to Rome. His successor, Lewis Cass, Jr., was raised to the rank of resident minister in 1854. Other ministers were John P. Stockton (1858-61), Alexander W. Randall (1861-62), Richard M. Blatchford (1862-63), and Rufus King (1863-68). The instructions issued to them by the incumbent Secretaries of State stressed the civil nature of the representation. Each Secretary recognized and tried to convey to the minister certain difficulties in the situation caused by the Pope's dual position. Buchanan's instructions to Martin were more explicit, partly because the embassy was a new departure and these instructions were its foundation, and partly perhaps because the Secretary had some feeling that the distinction between civil and ecclesiastical should be drawn with special care for the benefit of this Catholic appointee.

Buchanan's letter of instruction makes it plain that he regarded the naming of an envoy as a reward to the Pope for his adherence to the cause of freedom. It was the hope of the American government that the reforms instituted by Pius might facilitate profitable commercial relations. This hope remained unfulfilled while the Pope retained the secular sovereignty. Not until the Papal States had been incorporated in a unified Italy was the antiquated system of monopolies which restricted trade eliminated. Buchanan feared too that a situation might arise in which it would be difficult for the American envoy to take a stand because of the interweaving of religious and civil issues. In his reply to these instructions Martin indicated that he understood their purpose and the delicacy of his mission.

Both personal and official relations between the Papal government and the American ministers were very good. Each side made the utmost effort to understand the viewpoint of the other and to present its own case in disputed matters sincerely and in full detail. The development of a number of misunderstandings during the two decades of the mission, despite the good intentions of both parties, lends plausibility to the belief that the difficulties were inherent in the attempt to maintain diplomatic relations between a freedom-loving nation for which governmental non-interference with religion was a central principle and a sovereign in whom secular and ecclesiastical power were united.

The liberalism of Pius IX was before long revealed as but temporary and prudential. As soon as he could Pius broke with the liberal forces of Mazzini and his "Young Italy" movement. In the struggle between the Papacy and Mazzini for domination, the American minister was placed in the middle. When the triumph of Mazzini's forces drove the Pope out of Rome and into retirement at Gaeta, other members of the diplomatic corps accompanied Pius in his flight. Cass, who had not yet presented his credentials, asked the Secretary of State whether he was to present them to the Pope or to the authorities of the new Roman Republic. True, no other nation had recognized the Roman Republic, but it had been till then the policy of the United States to recognize de facto governments without inquiring into their legitimacy.

Mazzini and other officials of the Roman Republic pressed Cass to present his credentials to them and thus implicitly extend to them the recognition they craved from a sister democracy. The anti-Papist Nicholas Browne, who was in charge of the American legation pending Cass's arrival, had gone as far as his authority extended and perhaps even exceeded his warrant by warmly congratulating the new government as soon as it was set up and assuring it that the American government would be sure to recognize it. Cass, with more perception than Browne, realized that the other European powers would do all they could to prevent the provisional republican government from establishing itself, and for this reason did not present his credentials. Now both the Papal and the Republican party felt that the American minister had acted improperly.

When Pius IX returned to Rome—after the French had intervened and the forces of Louis Napoleon had defeated the Republicans—he shifted completely from his earlier reformist program. It had been possible before for his partisans to say that he was prevented by the cardinals from implementing his liberal program; now it was evident that he had renounced liberalism. Both theologically and politically the rest of his long pontificate was to be marked by an extreme conservatism. Yet it was not true, Cass pointed out in a dispatch of April 21, 1849, that the anti-Papal group was merely a radical and ultra-democratic rabble; much of the opposition was to government by the "ecclesiastical oligarchy" of the cardinals.

From this time, less than two years after the establishment of the American embassy, there could be no fundamental sympathy between the two governments. The very reason for the inauguration of relations, the liberal program of Pius IX, had been abandoned by its author. The sentiment of the American people changed rapidly. No longer could Congressman Levin have claimed that sympathy for the Pope was a reigning fashion. When Monsignor Bedini, a Papal representative, visited the United States in 1853, he was of course received with official courtesy in Washington, but in many of the cities he visited there were popular demonstrations against him as the supporter and representative of a despotic government.

AFTER 1849, then, there was a surface patina of cordiality between the American government and that of the Papal States, but underneath was a deep-rooted distrust which bred minor incident after minor incident. In 1852 the Washington Monument Association refused a block of Italian marble sent by the Pope for use in the construction of the monument. During the Civil War American public opinion and official sentiment were offended by the report, unsubstantiated but widely believed, that the Pope had extended "virtual recognition" to the Confederacy. Finally, in 1867, without formal rupture, diplomatic relations were halted when Congress refused to appropriate funds for the embassy.

One basic reason for the distrust, a reason which has today fully as much force as it had in the middle of the nineteenth century, is that even the secular mind in America is deeply influenced by the Protestant heritage. When, in 1850, Cass saved two thousand Italian Protestant Bibles from burning, his stock rose in the public mind and that of the Papal government declined. From the very earliest days of the embassy in Rome, Americans at home doubted that the Papal authorities, in accordance with international custom, were permitting the embassy staff to hold Protestant services. Official documents make it clear, however, that Protestant services were held regularly, with the full knowledge and consent of the authorities. Some difficulties were occasioned by the fact that there were frequently as many as three hundred American visitors in Rome and the chapel in the embassy was not large enough to accommodate all of them; when another building was used, the police withheld approval until the embassy insignia was placed on it as well as on the building used for official purposes. To list all the incidents of two decades would be irrelevant here; it is both relevant and important to point out that rumors of the denial of the right of Protestant worship were frequent in America in this time and that some writers have explained the failure to continue the embassy after 1867 entirely on that ground.

Today, when the question of an ambassador to Vatican City is before us, it is well for us to keep in mind this earlier experiment and to learn what we can from its failure. It is expressly important to remember that the establishment of diplomatic relations had two explicit purposes: to strengthen Pius IX in what looked like a liberal program and to open a new field for American commerce. In neither of these aims was the embassy successful; the Pope reverted to conservatism, and commercial advantages did not come until after the termination of Papal dominion. Finally, we should remember that a move expected to bring about better understanding and unity among nations became entangled in perennial religious controversy and brought, instead, misunderstandings and disharmony.

The Rise of Italian Secularism

BY WILLIAM MURRAY

A VIGOROUS attempt is being made in Italy to unify the minority center political parties into a powerful "secular third force." Recently in Rome, Ugo La Malfa, Minister of Foreign Trade, made a public appeal for unity. Of course creation of a third force between the Communist left and the Demo-Christian right has long been the ambition of Italian moderates, and La Malfa's appeal was unusual only in coming from a member of De Gasperi's Cabinet. It was preceded by another expression of national discontent. In late October thirty-eight non-Communist Senators and Deputies signed a manifesto also calling for formation of a third force and voicing concern that Western Europe, and Italy in particular, was losing control over its destiny. (American domination has caused one Italian writer and teacher to refer to Italy as "East Florida.")

Both La Malfa's speech and the earlier manifesto mentioned the growing dissatisfaction with the influence of the Roman Catholic church in Italian affairs. La Malfa, who is a Republican, was very specific. He called for "an agreement among the democratic secular parties," presumably excluding the Christian Democrats. The political purpose of such a move is either to take the government away from De Gasperi's party or at least to force it to make important concessions to the center parties. The past and present power of the Demo-Christians to formulate policies without considering the center has been entirely due to the inability of the bickering Republicans, Liberals, and Social Democrats to agree on even the most trivial issues.

But the Demo-Christians are at last worried about the possibility of secular unification. This was evidenced by the irritated declaration of their secretary general, Guido Gonella, on the day after La Malfa's appeal: "Today's problem is social, not political. An accord with Christian Democracy would satisfy this exigency. This is no time for discussions on 'secularism' or 'confessionalism.'" Spokesmen for the Liberals and Social Democrats, however, hastened to assure La Malfa that now was certainly the time. Bruno Villabruna of the Liberals and Giuseppe Saragat of the Social Democrats said that they favored a united program but that the Republicans would have to quit the government before this could be achieved. If the center did unite to form a secular bloc, the prospect of losing the 1953 elections would force the Demo-Christians to cooperate with it in order to defeat the Communist-dominated "Popular Front," still the largest vote-getter in Italy. It is even conceivable that a secular bloc could obtain a slim majority in 1953. A fresh political wind blowing through the peninsula could capture the votes of people veering away from Christian Democracy in search of a positive political philosophy.

La Malfa, one of the ablest economists in Italy, was a member of the now defunct Action Party, the "party of the intellectuals," before joining the Republican Party, which claims Mazzini and Garibaldi as its spiritual founders. The Republican Party is the only minority party now participating in De Gasperi's seventh government coalition. The Social Democrats walked out last April, causing a minor crisis which the confident De Gasperi overcame simply by resigning and resuming power within the space of three days. The Demo-Christians, whose political strength rests squarely on the negative issue of anti-communism and the positive prospect of continued American aid, have long realized that if any unification of Italy's discontented, anti-clerical center parties is to be accomplished, the initiative must come from the Republicans, who command few votes but much respect. Politically the Republicans could bridge the gap between the conservative but anti-clerical Liberals and the Social Democrats. The present Cabinet's ablest members are Republicans: Randolfo Pacciardi, Minister of Defense; Carlo Sforza, ex-Foreign Minister, now without portfolio; and La Malfa himself, the youngest and most outspoken of the group. These men have lent their considerable talents and the prestige of their party to De Gasperi's otherwise colorless and uninspired government.

As La Malfa made his appeal during a session of the Republican Central Committee, there is no doubt that he speaks officially as a member of his party. By calling for more social reforms and by laying the emphasis on anticlericalism he struck at the core of the national discontent. Internal Italian politics have always revolved around the issue of state versus church, and the Republicans have fought on the side of the state since the days of Mazzini and Cavour, and even before Garibaldi marched up the peninsula to chase the foreigner out and smash the temporal power of the Pope. Clerical rule has never been popular in Italy, and we must not forget that Christian Democracy was founded by an Italian priest in 1919 and that De Gasperi emerged from the Vatican library after World War II to step into a job for which the church had carefully prepared him. This makes powerful propaganda for a secular political coalition with the drive and the means to bid for power.

On a practical political level, however, there are many obstacles to unification. At present only the Republicans seem to be capable of formulating a program and carrying it out. The Social Democrats, a party only in name, are floundering about in a morass of pedantic hair-splitting. Their leaders call for party unity and refuse to yield a political inch. The ablest man among them, Silone, has refused to accept any official post and now devotes his considerable talents to backstage cynicism. (I recently heard him refer to United States Ambassador James C. Dunn as the "Vice-King of Italy.") The Liberals, who have been trying to agree on a platform for months, came up with a seven-point "unification program" a week after La Malfa's appeal. In point six they proclaim their "respect for the church, as long as it remains within its proper sphere of action." The Liberal platform, however, as laid down in the seven points, differs widely from the moderate socialism of the Social Democrats, calling as it does for the "reestablishment of a free, competitive economy"—"reestablishment" is hardly the right word, since such an economy has never existed in Italy.

The Republican problem is to strike a balance between the Liberal program of freedom for business interests and the state-control formula of the Social Democrats. All three parties feel strongly about the necessity of destroying the temporal power of the church. As a matter of fact, the Liberals, whose internal policies otherwise closely resemble those of the Christian Democrats, have long fought the government program of regional autonomy, which has enabled Catholic Action, the temporal arm of the church in Italy, to gain actual political control over communities in many parts of the country. If the secular democratic parties could agree temporarily to set aside their differences concerning the administration of the national economy, they could offer the underfed, underpaid, poorly housed Italian voter a strong incentive to go to the polls and recapture his self-respect.

The Vatican's Global Strategy

BY MARCUS CATO

PRESIDENT TRUMAN has proposed to establish diplomatic relations with the Vatican at a time when the Catholic church is engaged in one of the greatest organizational efforts in its history. Since the end of the Second World War the Vatican has seen that American diplomacy, now dominant in Western Europe, was content to fight communism without offering an alternative. Its own purpose goes farther: Catholicism, it is determined, shall provide the alternative. Its success can be gauged by looking at Western Europe today—Italy, West Germany, Belgium, Holland, Spain, Portugal, and Ireland are ruled by openly Catholic parties. This achievement is the work of Catholic Action groups in the various countries. Similar groups are now being formed throughout Latin America and in the United States to assure the West's active cooperation in Papal policies. Since the United States is simultaneously trying to build up Europe's military defenses against communism, the Vatican is naturally eager to strengthen its bonds with this country by establishing diplomatic relations.

Once Catholic governments had been installed in Western Europe and Latin America, Rome set about coordinating their activities and using them to further its perennial aim of uniting all peoples under its authority. That is the significance of two recent events, which are more closely related than they appear—the World Congress of the Lay Apostolate held last fall in Rome and the ceremonies closing the extended Holy Year at Fatima in Portugal.

The purpose of both was to produce conditions favorable to world-wide Catholic expansion—conditions, that is, which permit the church complete freedom of action.

MARCUS CATO is the pseudonym of an Italian journalist who has reported on Vatican politics for many years. He is now visiting in this country.

Where this freedom exists, as in the West, it must be exploited fully and made secure against possible attacks; where it does not exist, as in the East, it must be conquered. The pattern varies with the country, but the goal is the same everywhere.

In his address to the World Congress of the Lay Apostolate the Pope stressed that all Catholic Action groups must become, like their prototype in Italy, an instrument to help the clergy further the policies of the church. He ruled out a suggestion that their action should be parallel to but independent of that of the clergy. "It is self-evident," he said, "that the apostolate of the laity is subordinated to the ecclesiastical hierarchy, for the hierarchy is of divine institution: the apostolate, then, cannot be independent with regard to it." And he added: "To think otherwise would be to undermine the very wall of which Christ Himself has built His Church."

Another purpose of the Lay Apostolate Congress was to settle the thorny question of the relation between organized religion and the state. The Catholic church has long maintained that since politics influence the morals of a people, it has a duty to invade the field of politics in order to defend morality. In his address the Pope condemned the "noxious tendency" that would "confine the church to those questions said to be purely religious, to keep the church to the sacristy and sanctuary," and went on to explain: "There is a reciprocal penetration between the religious apostolate and political action . . . in the highest sense of the word, which means nothing other than cooperation for the good of the state." Quoting from a previous address, he added: "It would be blameworthy to leave the political field free to persons unworthy or incapable of directing the affairs of state."

Tactics that apply to Catholic countries do not of course apply to Protestant countries. As the French Catholic leader, Count de Mun, once said, in France the separation of church and state is an impious thing, while in the United States it is pious. Where Catholics are in a minority, separation protects their freedom and must therefore be supported, but should America ever become a predominantly Catholic country, the principle of separation between church and state, upon which this country is founded, would be considered by Rome as "impious" as it is in France. In terms of the organization of Catholic Action, however, this difference does not exist. Even more than in Catholic countries, Catholics here are expected to extend and coordinate their activities to serve the purposes of the church.

ONE of the church's primary aims is the conversion of Russia, which will be accomplished, the Vatican feels certain, when communism is destroyed. This aim partly explains the emphasis on the ceremonies at Fatima, which have been described by Bishop Sheen, who attended as the representative of Cardinal Spellman, as "the greatest religious event in the history of the modern world." One million persons, one-eighth of the population of Portugal, took part.

The Virgin Mary is said to have appeared in 1917 to three Portuguese children in the village of Fatima and to have told them: "The Holy Father will consecrate Russia to me. It will be converted, and an era of peace will be granted to the world." At that time, because Russia had proclaimed the freedom of religion and destroyed the power of the Orthodox church and of its head, the czar, the Vatican hoped that the revolution would lead to a reunion with Rome. A semi-official publication saw in it the hand of Providence, and Benedict XV later referred to Russia as the country where "the announced liberty of religion gave rise to the hope of a better future." The Orthodox church, having been closely bound up with the czarist regime, was left without head or prop and might, it was thought, seek an alliance with Rome in order to survive.

Immediately the Vatican laid its plans for that day. On May 1, 1917, Benedict XV created the Sacred Oriental Congregation and shortly afterward the Pontifical Oriental Institute to train missionaries to go to Russia. The Congregation was given jurisdiction over all countries where the Greek Orthodox Church was predominant—that is, Russia and Bulgaria, the Middle East, and north-eastern Africa. Today, having been excluded from Eastern Europe, its field is necessarily limited to the Middle East. Through that region, especially the Holy Land, the church hopes eventually to reach Russia. That is why the Vatican has in recent years taken an unprecedented interest in the Palestine question. That is also the meaning of the encyclical "Sempiternus Rex" of September 8, in which the Pope urged "heretical" Middle Eastern sects to return to the unity of the church.

The Middle East has additional importance for Rome today because it adjoins the Far East, where the loss of China with its 3,000,000 Catholics was a severe blow to the church. The Vatican hopes that just as the conversion of Greek Orthodoxy in the Middle East may lead to the conversion of Russia, the conversion of the Moslems in the Middle East may help it to reach the Orient. In the two most important Moslem nations in the Far East—Pakistan and Indonesia—Catholic missionary activities have been greatly intensified.

The ceremonies at Fatima were connected also with the Vatican's desire to convert the Moslems. The Virgin appeared in that tiny village, the church declares, because it bore the name of the daughter of Mohammed, of whom the Koran said, "She is the most holy of all the women in paradise, next to Mary." According to Bishop Sheen, "the Blessed Virgin chose to be known as Our Lady of Fatima as a pledge and sign of hope to the Moslem people, and as an assurance that they who show her so much respect will one day accept her Divine Son."

The Vatican hopes to gain American support for its plans for the conversion of Russia and the expansion of missionary activities in the Far East because its freedom of action in both the Middle and Far East is dependent upon political conditions, which in turn depend on American policy in those regions. Thus diplomatic relations with the United States can be a valuable aid to Catholic expansion. For the church the destruction of communism in the Middle East, as in Europe, is only a step toward the achievement of its ultimate purpose. Catholicism hopes eventually to serve as the alternative to communism.

Spanish Journey—Franco's Props

BY ROBERT FROMM

IT IS some months since the day I took Mrs. L—— to town. Yet I remember clearly the ride and what she said. Mrs. L—— was a gray and placid housewife of fifty-five, and I had not paid much attention to her during the week I had known her. Then, on my last day at the village, I offered her a lift. We were exchanging monosyllables, when suddenly, as if the dikes of restraint had burst, she began to talk. In a low, angry voice she spoke of the low rations, the rising prices, the thriving black market, the official corruption, and the general distress.

"Half the people in our street are hungry," she said. "They'll work for ten pesetas a day, or even just for food. But they are afraid to complain. They don't know who might report their words, and then the police come. People who were arrested a year, or two, or three years ago are being let out now, and they are only fit to die. I talk freely with you because you're a foreigner, and you're going away. But if anyone knew I'm talking like this now, I'd be in prison tonight. Our life is black with fear."

Other people in other towns have told me the same story, but somehow it is this gray, stout woman who symbolizes for me Spain in its years of distress. As in the Communist countries, fear here is part of the climate of daily life. People grumble, but very cautiously. Jokes are repeated about Franco, or his Moorish guards, or his wife's visits to the jewelry stores on Gran Via, but only to trusted acquaintances. Spaniards seem to have a curious yearning to share their troubles with a friendly foreigner, but they don't want to be seen talking earnestly to a foreigner in public.

This fear is one reason why there is no large underground here. Police and Falangist informers are everywhere, and the penalties are savage. An underground does exist, but it is small and fragmented. Until about two years ago a strong group, comprising mostly former Anarchists and Republicans, was active in Barcelona, especially in the distribution of illegal newspapers. Their work has now been stopped. Smaller underground groups run by Socialists, Communists, or Basque or Catalan separatists sporadically issue newspapers or handbills but are incapable of any important action. While they probably all took part in the strikes of last spring, no one I met thought they initiated them.

Inefficient and often corrupt as the police are, they have built an enormous web of paid and volunteer informers which misses little. According to the government's own admission, of the 37,000 people in jail, half are political prisoners. Careful Western investigators put the number of political prisoners at 40,000. No one but Franco and General Hierro, his Chief of Security, knows the exact number. A bystander gets occasional glimpses into the workings of a police state. Word is smuggled out of the Guadalajara Prison that Eduardo Villegas, a forty-eight-year-old Socialist, is being fed forcibly, after a six-week hunger strike; he was sentenced to thirty years' imprisonment in 1947 for trying to establish liaison between the Spanish Socialists in France and the clandestine groups in Spain. Some days ago the entire Spanish press carried a statement by the police on the arrest of twenty-seven members of the United Socialist Party of Catalonia. The statement was a pained Falangist reaction to a protest filed with the United Nations by the Socialist International. The arrested men and women, it said, were not Socialists but Communists, and they had been publishing two underground newspapers, Mundo Obrero and Trevall; it was "not expected" that they would be executed.

Arrests are not the only way in which the Falangist state deals with dissidents. The "sanctions" which it imposes can make normal life all but impossible. In July the newspapers front-paged Franco's amnesty for railroad workers "sanctioned" in the fearful aftermath of the civil war, who were now permitted to apply for their old jobs. In October, "at the request of the syndicates," Franco pardoned thousands who had been penalized for striking last spring. This was the first public admission that, on the quiet, there had been mass reprisals.

But there is still another reason for the absence of a strong underground. The civil war is not forgotten. It cost Spain a million lives, and the physical damage still shows naked and ugly at every turn. Most people feel that Franco cannot be overthrown without a sharp fight. That would mean another civil war, and they shy away from the thought. Franco is an abomination, but chaos and bloodshed are worse.

YET the belief of liberals that Franco survives only through terror is a fallacy. No dictator can hold power solely by means of his secret police. Franco stays in power because, in addition to the police, he has strong institutional support, and he uses it adroitly.

By far the most important of Franco's props is the army; the army is the solid base of the Falangist state. Though Spain is threatened by no enemy, Franco has been keeping 300,000 men under arms. It is a pathetic force, ragged, badly equipped, and underpaid, but it has served its purpose as a super-police body.

To make sure the army does not get any odd ideas, Franco jealously weeds out all potential rivals. Such notable figures as General Alfredo Kindelan and the Nationalist war hero Aranda Mata have been purged. Not all the generals are happy. I am told that before last spring's strikes some of the more perceptive officers urged the Generalissimo to take steps to relieve popular distress before it expressed itself in violence. On the whole, however, the army is not socially conscious, and it is Franco's pet. The military have been getting a third of the budget, apart from the sums allotted to the colonial forces and the armed Secret Police. And it is a sure bet that in his talks with Washington, Franco will insist, above all, on funds and equipment for his army. He knows where his power rests.

Next to the army stands the church, which since the defeat of the Axis has come to play a commanding role in social and political life here. Franco himself is of course deeply religious, but his present close affiliation with the church is less piety than a shrewd political contract. Ramon Suñer, Franco's brother-in-law, and formerly his liaison with the Axis, has vanished from the scene which he dominated for so long. His place next to Franco's ear has now been taken by the Cardinal Primate. A clever and able Catalan in his late sixties, the Cardinal helps to mold El Caudillo's mind and policy. It is even suggested that some of his most important speeches were ghost-written by the Cardinal.

There are other links between the church and the Falangist state. Franco's Foreign Minister, Alberto Martin Artago—less famous for his diplomatic talents than for his thirteen well-publicized children—is a former head of Acción Catolica and is still influential in its affairs. The Bishop of Madrid is one of the thirteen members of the Falange's Political Council. The Bishop of Montonedo recently visited a Falangist youth camp and delivered a speech extolling "the glorious Spain made by Franco." "The army bugle and the church bells" he said, "together call the youth of Spain."

In the shift of political power which brought the church to the fore the Falange has lost ground. This has been more than an echo of totalitarian defeat. Like the Kuomintang in its years of decay, the Falange has grown fat with wealth, corrupt, and lethargic. The black shirts are taken out only for the prescribed rallies; the Fascist salute is frowned on officially; the old fervor is gone.

But the Falange cannot be underestimated. It has grown into the political body, and especially in the smaller towns the Falange is the state. Franco himself is its head. Its secretary general sits in the Cabinet—and until the July shake-up served concurrently as Minister of Justice. The new national leader of the syndicates was until this fall a provincial governor and a Falangist chief. (American labor leaders who are said to be willing to accept the Franco regime if it "liberalizes" the trade-union movement should consider whether labor unions in a Fascist-patterned, corporate state can be divorced from the ruling party.)

Even more importantly, the Falange is the dictator's main instrument of mass control. The Falange runs the labor, youth, and women's organizations. It dominates the press, culture, and education. With its 700,000 members, it forms a gigantic web of espionage into private lives. Finally, it provides Franco with a paramilitary force which he could use in case of domestic trouble. El Caudillo is sensitive to criticism of the Falange. The other week, in a typical aside, he noted sharply that "the movement is not outworn, since it represents the destiny of a whole generation."

The man who speaks for Falangist "ideals," if not for the party, is one of Franco's closest aides, Luis Carrero Blanco, a captain in the navy. Still in his early forties, Blanco has had a meteoric career. Since the July reshuffle, which put him in the Cabinet, he has held the post of Minister of the Presidency, a sort of deputy Premier. Two daily news programs which every Spanish radio station is required to carry frequently include a commentary by one Juan de la Cosa, the name of a famous navigator of the age of exploration. Under this pseudonym Blanco extols El Caudillo as the savior of the West from its own folly and communism, attacks the West for its "blockade" of Spain, and praises the "high moral ideals" of the Falangist state. It is widely believed that Franco himself outlines some of his aide's more important broadcasts.

Courtesy Washington Post

Among these three props of the Falangist state—the army, the church, and the Falange—not all is brotherly love. The army, for instance, regards the Falange with no more affection than Hitler's Wehrmacht once showed toward the Storm Troopers. But the friction thus far has been pretty well concealed, and Franco has skilfully kept the factions supporting him fairly well balanced. Together, they form a strong foundation for the regime, for they represent Spain's only mass organizations, control all means of communication and suppression, and know what they want.

AS FOR the people, their reactions range from suspicion of the regime to hatred. The moneyed class is divided. It is grateful to El Caudillo for saving it from Marxism, but it worries about the Falange's syndicalist ideas, borrowed from Italian Fascism. "The ban on strikes," a factory-owner told me, "is a sound development, but why can't I fire my workers if I want to?" On the whole, however, the rich are prosperous and content, and in any leftist revolt would again flock to Franco's banner.

The middle class, caught in the grinder of inflation, is largely anti-Franco. It ranges from bookkeepers, who cannot make ends meet, to intellectuals, who not only starve but also have to make their ideas acceptable to some Falangist overseer. It is symbolic of the fate of the intellectual in Franco's Spain that the chief censor, Dario Fernandez Florez, who decides what is to be published and what suppressed, is the author of a current best-seller—the near-pornographic story of a prostitute.

Industrial labor and the peasantry, ill-paid, undernourished, illiterate—the government admits one in four Spaniards cannot read or write—and unable to protest, are bitterly hostile. It is possible that the accumulated resentment expressed in the strikes of last spring might have forced a change of government, or at least important modifications, if at the critical point friendly American gestures had not saved Franco. I am inclined to doubt it, but it is a view widely held in Spain, and it has to be taken seriously. As once in China, opinion here links us with an unpopular regime.

The official propaganda line has changed a bit since last summer. There are still vigorous, and well-subsidized, efforts to sell the Spanish "mother country" to the Spanish-speaking republics of Latin America. There is still fairly open talk of a "Greater Spain," with the first moves in the direction of Gibraltar and French Morocco, both "stolen from Spain." The Falange even proposed a "Day of Mourning" in August, to be observed annually until Gibraltar is regained. There are sharp anti-British undertones in Captain Blanco's commentaries, reflecting, beyond doubt, Franco's own belief that Britain is responsible for Spain's historical decline. But this attitude is being modified, and the anti-American propaganda, for the moment at least, has been suspended.

The new line seeks to persuade the Spanish people—and perhaps the foreign embassies here—that world events justify Franco's policies and that the West needs Franco's help in its hour of danger. Thus the newspaper Madrid, in an editorial circulated, for emphasis, by the Foreign Ministry, said:

Although it is true that from a military standpoint the Pyrenees are formidable, what Spain is really envied is its moral worth. This moral worth, and Spain's proved anti-communism, gives the Pyrenean summits their real importance. The contrast between the Spanish people, armed with their perfect morale, and other countries, whose morale is shaky and tainted with communism, forces the Tyrians and Trojans to acknowledge that Europe's real bulwark, its best guaranty of resistance, its decisive chance of victory over communism, its garrison of good soldiers, its natural bridgehead for America, is Spain and only Spain.

This, of course, is nonsense. Franco needs the West far more than it needs him. Neither he nor anyone else can be certain what the impoverished and restless Spanish workers and peasants would do in a crisis. But the new propaganda line changes El Caudillo from a supplicant for American help into a powerful figure to whom the free world must turn for aid.

I do not know how people here will react to this line. In general, they are too occupied with the dreary business of keeping alive to pay much attention to Falangist editorials. A few have told me hopefully that "perhaps American aid will mean more bread." A few hope that if any aid is granted, "you'll make sure that it doesn't stick to the hands of the gang in Madrid." But I have heard one remark I shall not forget. With a Spanish friend I was attending a Falangist rally at a Mediterranean port. There were the usual black shirts and involuntary crowds, the usual tributes to Spain's glory, the usual cheers for Franco ("Franco Sí, Comunismo No!"), and the usual gibes at the decaying West. "This," said my friend, "is what you Americans are backing here. And so many of us have thought you friends!"

BOOKS and the ARTS

PERIODICAL FAMINE

By VINCENT BROME

DISTRESSED as it is by the odor of so many deceased and dying journals, British periodical publishing today could hardly be expected to show an air of optimism. Since the end of last year more than twenty-three journals have ceased publication or merged with others, or appear less frequently than they did. They represented an extraordinary diversity of opinion and interest, but most of them were highly specialized small-scale weeklies of not very great significance to the community at large; several catered to, shall we say, esoteric tastes—Pigeon Racing News, Amateur Sport, Childhood and Youth. The real rub is this: in its more bitter reaches Britain's economic struggle seems to penalize the "serious" magazines, literary, cultural, and sometimes political, more effectively than others. Over the last few years literary journals like Horizon and New Writing have dwindled away, while great populars like Illustrated appear at first sight more opulent.

In point of fact, popular magazines are not unaffected. Some survive and flourish only with a radical change of policy, some have been forced to vulgarize their appeal, and a few are now so heavily disguised that no one would suspect their origins. Too frequently, in the present economic mold, whenever trouble threatens and circulations waver, standards are lowered and sometimes discarded. But the majority of popular papers do survive while Horizon and New Writing sicken and die.

The trouble begins once again with the cost of paper—though of course the far more profound question of whether a world rearming for peace can sustain its cultural life intact underlies everything. There are many types of paper, from newsprint to art paper, and the rise in cost varies from 100 to 160 per cent, but the difficulties are due as much to advertising fluctuations as to paper cost. Many trade, technical, and even scholarly periodicals have found that rearmament and the shortage of raw materials seriously inhibit advertising—nobody wants to advertise the greater havoc wrought by his particular brand of shell or the explosive range of his torpedo in the Times Literary Supplement or the Cornhill. Some magazines have lost one-third of their revenue as a result. Soaring costs and falling advertising together call for fierce economies if publication is to be continued.

But post-mortems on defunct, dying, or indisposed journals cannot stop here. A third and equally significant factor has to be taken into account. Before the war there were flocks of magazines in Britain publishing short stories and articles, from the Strand Magazine and the Windsor to the Grand Magazine and Twenty Story. All these have gone. The death struggles of the Strand were long drawn out. Different editors changed its policy and character, adjusted its format, introduced more intricate display and layout, and in the long run accepted diminution to pocket size, but none of these elaborate twists and turns saved it from extinction. The wholesale collapse of magazines like the Strand began long before the current economic difficulties arose and reveal the third influence in the general decline. One of the stock fallacies sustaining the confidence of many publishers over the years has been the belief that a magazine "of character," presenting a strongly defined attitude to life and integrated by a creative idea, can preserve its prosperity indefinitely. Publishers resist the notion that the particular character of a magazine may be "worked out." They insist that timely injections of modernization, to reconcile the paper with a change in current attitudes, will continuously renew its life. Hence the prolonged attempts to stem falling circulation by every device from vulgarization to gift schemes, and the monotonous consistency with which they fail.

Some element of atrophy must be admitted in any post-mortem on more recent magazines. The philosophies for which they stood have crumbled away; their personality has suffered hardening of the arteries. But whereas in the 1930's this was the dominant explanation of decay, today the cause is at least as much economic.

Some highly revered monthlies show this ambivalence very clearly. Scientific materialism has overrun their Old World outlook, and the reluctant attempt to compromise cannot be carried too far without destroying the original identity of the magazine. Compromise might have sufficed without the fierce rise in costs, but sheer economics force some of them, like the Cornhill, to meet the situation by appearing quarterly instead of monthly. (The rumor that the Cornhill is about to close down is false.)

In contrast, the story of the women's magazines remains phenomenal. Woman is said to sell two million copies weekly, and its rival, Woman's Own, presses close on its heels. The production and sale of popular fiction, female advice, romance, and mysterious substitutes for the harsh realities of living continue to flourish, and in some cases make matters worse for the more "significant" magazines.

Not that they have any direct effect on periodicals like New Writing. The troubles of the literary periodical in Britain today are epitomized in the decline and death of New Writing. At its peak, during the war, this magazine was selling 80,000 copies. Torn out of their normal environment, beset by ultimate realities, people then faced up to a deeper consciousness which was to some extent satisfied and was certainly made articulate by New Writing. Thrown back upon their own resources, they found the mind not only a refuge, as John Lehmann puts it, but a fortifying influence, and they eagerly absorbed what one group regarded as their cultural "medicine" and another as profound reading. Today the pressures have relaxed, preoccupation with everyday things has overlaid deeper awareness, and the audience in consequence has dwindled. Before it ceased publication New Writing had fallen to 20,000 or 30,000 copies. But it was not only a matter of numbers. The rise in production costs and the increased selling price played a big part; it is possible that without the fierce upsurge of costs the magazine would have survived, for John Lehmann, its editor, had many ideas for renewing its life. Indeed, he still has.

But much of this happened before the weight of British rearmament became a serious threat. Today, rearmament may inhibit still more the free exchange of ideas, information, and opinion in some sections of the periodical press, although most of the old-established weeklies have the situation in hand.

The New Statesman—dare I mention it?—has compromised by increasing its price from sixpence to ninepence, but the Tribune—does the name mean anything?—has a literary editor who bitterly complains that lack of space has become a Procrustean bed. The Spectator has so far done nothing more drastic than increase its selling price by one penny, and the Economist appears to thrive. Some monthlies are in far worse shape. Wholesale increases in selling prices and advertising rates are one widely accepted solution, but they bring the danger of a proportional fall in advertising. Some weeklies now appear fortnightly, fortnightlies appear monthly, and quarterlies—completing the logic—sometimes fail to appear at all.

It may sound metaphysical to suggest that rearmament will be that much less effective if our periodicals become more inhibited, but critical analysis of ideas and current events has an indisputable part to play, and endless subtleties of the democratic principle are involved.

International democracy does seem to some British writers and editors a rather primitive affair when the most wealthy and powerful member of the United Nations proliferates magazines of every kind from the glossy giant to the learned journal while Britain is forced back on papers so insubstantial in some cases as to be almost incapable of self-support. The whole of a British Sunday newspaper runs to eight to ten pages, perhaps as large as one supplement of the New York Times; Picture Post has 60 pages against Life's 140; Partisan Review survives, Horizon has gone. We have no equivalent of the Saturday Evening Post, Collier's, or Look. Comparatively, the British scene is desolate.

Colette in America

SHORT NOVELS OF COLETTE.

With an Introduction by Glenway Westcott. Dial Press. $5.

THIS reprint of six short novels of Colette is a joy, though the selection might have been better and the translations—"Chéri," beautifully done by Janet Flanner excepted—are sometimes rather feeble English. Yet the choice, considering that Colette has been writing for more than fifty years, is representative, ranging from the giddy and pleasantly school-girlish "The Indulgent Husband" (1902) through "Chéri" (1920), "The Last of Chéri" (1926), and the incomparable "The Other One" (1929), with "The Cat" (1933) and "Duo" (1934) as pendant attractions. The total effect is impressive. In addition, Glenway Westcott has provided a long and informative though somewhat rhapsodical introduction.

Reading and rereading Colette is an amusing and exciting experience. Even without Mr. Westcott's assertion that "she is the greatest living French fiction writer," one becomes aware of gifts enormous in their range though carefully limited in their application. She never attempts more than she can well manage; she knows always exactly what she can do; she is profound, but she never tries for profundity. She is enormously skilful. In the earliest of these tales, "The Indulgent Husband," a situation which might easily have degenerated into a sordid triangle or a wretched farce becomes an occasion for wit, high spirits, and, at the last, deep emotion. The Chéri sequence is more serious throughout, a relentless analysis of the brief and sad career of a monied gigolo, a young man incapable of real feeling or of real expression who is at once civilized, so far as he ever becomes a human being, and ruined by an elderly courtesan. For when he marries—Colette's moral insight is infallible—it is he and not his temporarily broken-hearted mistress who suffers disaster. "The Other One" is the best story in the collection, quiet, almost uneventful, with, as a background, all the eventfulness of a successful play going into production. Here again there is a triangle, this time husband, wife, and secretary, which is brought to a certain resolution when the wife realizes that her relationship, woman to woman, with the secretary is as necessary as the loving complaisance she has expended on her spoiled husband. "Duo" and "The Cat" are only less good because the experiences they re-create are more limited. All, with the possible exception of "The Indulgent Husband," have a wonderful variety in their unity, which goes, by way of "Adolphe" and "La Princesse de Clèves," back to Marie de France so far as French fiction is concerned. Historically Colette is in the grand French tradition.

About her art in general, however, there are three further comments to be made, and the two last cause me to wonder somewhat at her popularity here and in England. Everywhere in her writing are passages which reveal her joy in nature, whether she is observing the weather or describing the various beauties of cats, country landscapes, or the tamed foliage of Paris streets. Sometimes her scenery becomes a symbol, as when the aging Léa, whom Chéri has deserted for a suitable marriage, observes the dying beauties of his mother's garden. Most frequently, however, nature is an enchanting phenomenon to be carefully observed and fully enjoyed.

So far, given our school-day training in the nature poetry of the nineteenth century, so good. But other matters can make us uneasy. Even if she makes fun of it, the world of every one of these tales is bourgeois. Its mores are rigid. Respectability and order, founded on a solid cash basis, triumph over love. The retired courtesans in the Chéri sequence ape the bourgeois life, and, after much hard work, achieve it for themselves and their children. To us, with our belief in romantic love, in our good hearts, and in our disinterestedness, this attitude can be shocking. It is Colette's triumph that we never fall out of sympathy with even her most unpleasant characters.

More likely to be disturbing to the average reader is the fact that love and the arts of love, although they must always give way to other considerations, are so important. In America or in England the kind of plot Colette uses results in the lowest fiction, because, in America and in England—Jane Austen and Henry James are exceptions—love has never been taken entirely seriously as matter for fiction. Nor, except for Lawrence, has sensual love. In one of these novels a woman recognizes in her husband's conduct and appearance "the utter grace" that bathes him all over after love-making; in "The Last of Chéri" Léa loses her lover because, one morning, she is careless enough to let him see her double chin, her ruined throat. The fault is hers, quite as much as the bourgeois code which restores Chéri to his girl wife. His disgust may be heartless and ungentlemanly; it is also an actuality. For if love and love-making must give way to marriages of convenience, they are still the central facts of life and must be taken seriously. They are more important than simple sexuality, of which there is very little in these stories. The average reader, then, must adjust to values alien to those he is likely to have come on in American or English fiction, where sex is employed regularly to make best-sellers titillating or, more honestly, reduced to pornography. Not even "Sons and Lovers" and "Women in Love" have made it artistically respectable.

Essay on American Fear

THE FEAR OF FREEDOM. By Francis Biddle. Doubleday and Company. $3.50.

HOW far American fear of Russian communism has gone in destroying American liberties is thoughtfully set forth in this book by our former Attorney General, who was in a position to observe the beginning of the process at first hand and who has studied it carefully since he left office.

His main theses are that fear is necessarily incompatible with freedom and that the pursuit of "loyalty" leads to the grave of conformity rather than to the promised land of security. Although he exhibits well-tempered scorn for the careless political fanatics, such as McCarthy and McCarran, who would turn everyone into their own images, Mr. Biddle blames in some measure the public, which, he says, demands repressions out of fear of an imagined peril. I would have thought the word "accepts" better than "demands," but the results are just as tragic in either case.

Mr. Biddle points out that the obsessive fear of communism has led to the rise of hysteria not only among the ordinary run of bigots, who have been with us throughout our history, but among college professors, lawyers, and, with some notable exceptions, public officials. Scientists have shown more resistance than lawyers, whose fear of the threat of communism exceeds their concern for the preservation of liberty—and even law. It is thirty-one years since Charles Evans Hughes actively protested the ousting of five Socialists from the New York State Assembly. No one of his stature in the law has dared to protest effectively the deprivations of liberty which are becoming an every-week occurrence in our trembling land.

One of the many lessons Mr. Biddle points is the frequency with which we abandon liberties for all when some of us get scared. He gives useful accounts of the red scare following World War I. He goes to England for a parallel, where fear of the spread of the French Revolution led the governing and owning classes to act with even greater physical cruelty against nonconformists than we have done so far out of fear of communism. In the years immediately after World War I, Mr. Biddle points out, "tendency" became a test of criminality, and it has become so again today. On February 19, 1880, during another period of fear, this time in France, Flaubert wrote to Maupassant, who was being accused in a public trial of indecency: "With the theory of tendencies, you can execute a sheep for dreaming of meat." Fish, Dies, Thomas, Wood, McCarthy, and McCarran have been doing just that for too many years, and they have had the support of the worst elements in both political parties.

Mr. Biddle has had access to hearings before loyalty boards, and if the results were not so tragic, some of the questions he cites would be ludicrous enough to blow up in a burst of laughter stimulated by common sense the whole apparatus of fear and oppression under which we live. Again, if our press were not also afraid, satire might regain us our liberties. Mr. Biddle rather neglects the negative role of the press; he likewise neglects the positive role of the Roman Catholic church in the spread of hysteria that has led to so much loss of freedom. He does point out how Roman Catholics themselves suffered in earlier periods of our history from an unreasonable fear of rule by the Pope. The Alien and Sedition Laws were passed out of fear of the effects of the French Revolution; our fear of Bolshevism kept the rigorous Espionage Act of 1917 in force long after it had served its purpose as a weapon against Germany; the McCarran act of 1950 is our latest legislative expression of hysteria.

Freedom, Mr. Biddle points out, requires maturity. Perhaps the American people are still suffering from growing pains—or is it that, worse still, they are suffering from hardening of the arteries? The enthronement of "guilt by association"—which Mr. Biddle describes in detail—not only as government policy but almost as a principle of law seems to indicate that we are at best in second childhood.

In his account of the loyalty program in operation Mr. Biddle gives instances to illustrate that the inquisitors are more interested in remaking the investigated in their own image than in intelligent inquiry. One member asked a victim whether he thought it was right to mix white and colored blood plasma and whether whites and Negroes should intermarry; another wanted to know whether the victim had read any bad books lately, such as Howard Fast's novels—the man admitted fearfully that he had once read articles in the New York Times on Karl Marx. It becomes clearer and clearer as one reads "The Fear of Freedom" that Communists are not the target but liberals, New Dealers, and Socialists, all of whom the Communists despise. And the effort is not to produce loyalty but conformity. It is also clear that the $21,500,000 spent on loyalty investigations from 1948 to 1950—and this figure covers only the direct cost—has not revealed one actual case of espionage or evidence, Mr. Biddle writes, pointing to espionage.

Mr. Biddle's suggested remedies for the current hysteria are that inquiries should be concerned with a man's behavior rather than his beliefs; that we should cease using "loyalty," a misnomer for conformity, as a yardstick for security; that we should stop choking our own progress by secrecy; and that we should have faith in ourselves. He contends that the remedy for espionage is counter-espionage and investigation by qualified federal, not state or municipal, agents, and that competition for publicity by politicians, misnamed statesmen, produces inquisition, not security. Courage to combat those in both parties who are now doing their utmost for personal political advantage to debase our fundamental liberties is another requisite. Otherwise we are in danger of losing what freedom we still have, for giving in to bigots, like giving in to blackmailers, inevitably makes them all the more greedy and bold.

M. R. WERNER

Freud or Zilboorg?

SIGMUND FREUD: HIS INTERPRETATION OF THE MIND OF MAN. By Gregory Zilboorg. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

NO AUTHOR in the Twentieth Century Library, which aims to give the intelligent layman a basic understanding of the thinkers of the last hundred years, has a harder task than Dr. Zilboorg. Each of these authors is faced with problems of translation. Understanding of Einstein or of Henri Poincaré demands translation of mathematical symbols into words. In the case of Karl Marx and of Freud the translation of technical concepts into everyday speech is complicated by the polemic, half-understanding, -misunderstanding, and emotional distortion which surround their names. With Freud there is the additional difficulty that many of his terms have now become part of the language, so that there is constant need to differentiate their technical from their colloquial meanings.

Dr. Zilboorg is well qualified to give an exposition of Freud's thought, but he fails in precisely those areas where the layman is usually found at fault; he gives an emotionally colored rather than a scientific appraisal of his material, and he makes constant use of imprecise language. Freud's stature derives from the originality of his thought, his close observation of clinical data, and his use of these observations to correct and enlarge his theories. These qualities do not emerge in this book. It gives neither a clear exposition of Freud's major concepts nor a chronological account of the development of his thinking. Instead it consists of somewhat random discussions of various things connected with Freud and of people in some way associated with him.

The emphasis on the lack of appreciation of Freud and on society's unreadiness to accept his thinking gives the book an oddly dated quality; battles of half a century ago are fought passionately as if they were current. On the other hand, there is almost no treatment of actual current attempts to modify or extend Freud's theories in the context of historical and comparative cultural studies.

To a reader who attempted to form a conception of Freud solely on the basis of this book Freud would appear, I think, primarily as a man in great need of defense, to whom detractors constantly "do an injustice," of whom it is necessary insistently to point out things that "do him credit," or are "to his honor," who must be defended as human in his "quasi-Olympian austerity." In the midst of almost any discussion on any particular subject. Dr. Zilboorg breaks off to champion Freud yet again against charges of "pan-sexualism," "narcissistic pride," and "actual misrepresentation." Freud had a group of "loyal and arduous disciples" who were also under attack, and these are singled out for praise by Dr. Zilboorg if they "understand and oppose . . . most of the opponents of Freud." There would seem to be only two kinds of people in the Freudian world, "anti-sexualist opponents of Freud" and "pro-Freudian partisans." Dr. Zilboorg's facts are presented in terms of moral judgments: he does not say that Janet differed from Freud but that he had an "inability" to accept Freud's version of the facts; Galton was "unable" to admit his own evidence. Freud "dared" to extend earlier methods; he was "bold" in contrast to the "prudist formalism" and "reckless irresponsibility" of the medical profession.

Freud appears, further, as a person who believed that there is no freedom without "free functioning of reason," but who thought that problems connected with the conscious, reasoning mind require "no special hypothesis" and are "obvious" and "easily dealt with"—a judgment which itself does not do justice to the rigorous quality of Freud's thinking. The reader would gather that somewhere along the way Freud talked about the unconscious, id, ego, super-ego, narcissism, and sex "in the broad Freudian sense," but these terms are usually introduced casually with little or no explanation of the meaning Freud gave to them, apparently on the assumption that the reader either understands what they mean or that this is not the place for him to acquire that understanding. In some parts of the book there is oversimplification to the point of inaccuracy apparent to anyone who has read carefully Freud's "Collected Papers" or even "The Interpretation of Dreams" and "The Three Contributions to the Theory of Sex." In others there is detailed discussion of engagements in the wars among various Freudian sects which can be of interest only to those who have intimate knowledge of these orthodoxies and heresies.

The picture of Freud that Dr. Zilboorg presents to the layman is probably related to his view of the intelligent layman. It would appear that the layman to Dr. Zilboorg is a person who, in place of any attempt at scientific precision, prefers such vague terms as "well-nigh identical," "almost with anxiety," "one would almost say," "more often than not," "major ingredients," "simple and self-evident." This layman for whom Dr. Zilboorg writes does not mind being put off with vague generalizations: "clinically and sociologically speaking, this theoretical basis of Freud did not matter"; "we had never known [the whole dark continent that is man] until Freud offered us a glance at him"; "never mind the reasons."

There are stimulating passages in this book, such as the discussions of Galton and of Freud's view that there must be irreconcilable conflict between the individual and society. And there are some clear sentences, such as "It is this intuition [the ebb and flow of affect] that Freud brought from obscurity and scientific disrepute, . . . and he tried to make a scientific tool of it."

The seven chapters have no titles, and it is not clear how most of the chapters could appropriately be differentiated by title. The layman reading a book of 132 pages on Freud is assumed to be more interested in polemics about Freud and in long quotations from Catholic journals on the relations of Catholicism to psychoanalysis than in Freud's thought.

Freud's last work, "An Outline of Psychoanalysis," is a book of 127 pages. This, too, is a difficult book for the layman. But it is written seriously, in Freud's remarkably lucid style, and its difficulties arise not from confusion but from the complexity inherent in the problems dealt with. With this compact volume available, in addition to Freud's "Autobiography" and his other earlier work, it is hard to avoid the question: Why Zilboorg?

Books in Brief

THE SERPENT-WREATHED STAFF.

By Alice Tisdale Hobart. Bobbs-Merrill. $3.50. The problem of making available to all Americans the benefits of modern medical science is here seen principally through the eyes of two brothers—the older a highly skilled but reactionary surgeon, the younger a crusading orthopedist pioneering in group and preventive medicine. Despite the primitive simplicity of the characters, and a prose style which can only be described as abominable (p. 318: "Jo thought, Sally is becoming more mother than wife"; p. 364: "He was worried. Sally had become more child than wife"), the rare sincerity and honesty of purpose of the author of "Oil for the Lamps of China" shine through every page of her long novel.

EUROPEAN visitors have been known to complain that we Americans do not spend enough time talking about love. In my country, they sometimes explain happily, a mixed company will often spend a whole evening discussing only one fine point in the casuistry of that infinite subject. At such a symposium Jean Anouilh must be a star performer who can talk all fellow aficionados under the table before he even reaches the ultimate subtleties. But as a playwright for American audiences he is much better when, as in "Antigone," he does not really let himself go, and I cannot predict much success for "Legend for Lovers" now at the Plymouth Theater. It is always possible, of course, to blame everything on a mistake in the translation, and it may possibly be that this adaptation by Kitty Black is worse than the original. But it is difficult to imagine how this original could have been good.

Called "Eurydice" in the French, it is a version of the ancient story so ingenious that any residual resemblance is difficult to detect, and the moral seems to be that since love is sure to turn out less well than young lovers hope, Eurydices are fortunate when they get themselves killed in a bus accident and Orpheuses are wise to commit suicide without waiting for wild women, Greek or otherwise, to tear them to pieces. In Anouilh's version the scene is moved from Greece to a provincial railroad station in France. A minor actress happens to look into the eyes of a street musician and after a brief philosophical conversation they rush off to bed in a Marseilles hotel. As soon as things there have quieted down sufficiently to permit the curtain to be raised again the symposium resumes. Eurydice trembles to think how easy it would have been for them never to have met. Orpheus hopes that she will love him always and that she has not loved too many other fellows before. But since, through no fault of her own, she has been about quite a bit she decides that she had better run away and in so doing she catches her bus—in a sense she had not intended.

Then a mysterious stranger who has been hovering expectantly in the background explains to Orpheus that things would never have been the same again, that, as a matter of fact, things never are what one had expected them to be, and that, in general, anyone who has ever spent one perfect night in a Marseilles hotel had best call it quits. Death is kind. Indeed, even dying would not be bad if it were not for the struggle which life perversely puts up. Orpheus then accepts this logic, and the final tableau shows him and his Eurydice reunited in some future whose reality or lack of reality is in no way defined.

All this solemn nonsense is very carefully staged, and in some sense it is well acted. Dorothy McGuire seems to believe in what she is doing, and Richard Burton, as the young lover, at least acts with that combination of nobility and pettishness which is the traditional formula for making a romantic hero. In fact, there is one part, that of the young man's aging father whose unsuccessful efforts to make a conquest of the bar maid are intended to show what happens to great lovers who live too long, which Hugh Griffith acts superbly well in every sense, thus contributing the only moments of reality in the whole play. But no acting could possibly save a work which is neither consistent in itself nor recognizable as a representation of an audience's experience.

Some say that the proposition "Resolved that life is not worth living" does not state a debatable question. Perhaps they are wrong. But in all seriousness I must say that I have never heard the case for the affirmative less convincingly argued and that only those really convinced for other reasons could ever find "Legend for Lovers" persuasive. When I was young we used to be told that one of the great differences between civilized Europe and Puritan America was simply that here we did not know how to take light loves lightly. We were put through an intensive course in importations from Vienna, Budapest, and Paris, from which we were bid learn that the end of the world does not necessarily come if two young people fall into bed together or even if it is discovered that members of the female sex have more than once been the victims of this pleasant accident. But did any Puritan ever have a dream so absurd as the dream of the young man in this play, and did any Puritan ever argue, as M. Anouilh here does, that if casual encounters in railway stations do not usually turn into beatific visions then life is obviously not worth living? Yet it is something very much like that which he seems to maintain with utter seriousness. No doubt a death wish can be the occasion of impressive works. But it needs to be a great deal better rationalized than it is in this merely sickly play.

The Other "Cleopatra"

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

CONTEMPORARY audiences are not conditioned to accept, much less respect, the love which Shakespeare celebrates in "Antony and Cleopatra"—the passionate love of a man and woman who are mature and at the full but no longer young and therefore jealous of time. Small wonder, since contemporary audiences are fed on the puerile, the "pure" and prurient, romance of the films, fed also on the cruder "Freudian" clichés about sex, and beset by the public convention—the private conviction may be different—that there is something a little ridiculous about passion in middle age. All the more reason why a production of "Antony and Cleopatra" should be pitched on a level of taste and tact which allows for gaiety but not for farce, for the communication of sensual delight but not of mere "sexy" titillation. And the appropriate tone, I learned on seeing the Olivier production, must be set in the very first scenes if the last scenes are to have their full tragic import.

The first scene of the Olivier production (Ziegfeld Theater) owes more to Hollywood than to Shakespeare, not only in its attributes as spectacle, which is well enough, but also in the first sight it gives us of Antony and Cleopatra. Instead of entering "with their trains" in the full dignity of a queen and a conqueror, they are carried in on a litter and they are so disposed and so comport themselves as to invite the titillations that were immediately forthcoming. In the second scene, in Cleopatra's private apartment, farce is added to titillation. The eunuch Mardian is cast and made up to be funny; so, even, is the queen's adviser, Alexas. In this context the humorous byplay of the first part of the scene is turned into prurient farce—it is also given too much emphasis—while the ominous effect of the soothsayer's lines presaging the tragedy to come is quite lost on the giggling audience. But what is far worse, the court of Egypt is instantly made ridiculous in our eyes.

This handling is not only cheap but, in dramatic terms, incredibly stupid. The primary tension of the play rises from the conflict between two views of life, subsumed in the conflict between Rome and Egypt. The reader is pulled first toward one and then the other, and in the end the choice between them becomes for him, as for Enobarbus, a tragic choice. But here we are instructed at the outset to take, as it were, the Roman view of Egypt. As a result the basic conflict is renounced even before the action begins. It follows that parts of the play are rendered all but meaningless; and I think the utter wrongness of these opening scenes is best indicated by the fact that the crucial role of Enobarbus, the sensible man whose reason persuades him to choose Caesar and Rome and who then dies of grief and remorse for having deserted Antony and Egypt, has so little significance or relevance that it scarcely matters that he is badly cast—though it is hard to take an inept reading of "Age cannot wither, or custom stale. . . ."

Needless to say, the belittling of Egypt reduces the stature of Cleopatra as well, so that the love between her and Antony inevitably takes on the proportions of a private affair, not an affair of state involving the highest politics. And Vivien Leigh cannot overcome this hazard. She has not the presence of a queen; she is more girl than woman: she is very pretty but not voluptuous. She reads very well and her voice is sufficiently rich, but it has little variety, and its overriding, finally monotonous sound often tends to absorb rather than display the extremes of mood of a woman in love or the distinctions in tone between the woman and the queen.

As for Mr. Olivier, his performance never suggests, in spite of the lines that make it clear, that the capacity for love is as much an aspect of Antony's greatness as the capacity for world conquest. His passion for Cleopatra is presented rather as a weakness—again the Roman view—and there is in Olivier's reading and his overacting more than a hint of the old lecher, which is unforgivable. The audience loved it.

In the latter part of the play the acting of both, and particularly that of Miss Leigh, is much more in keeping with the spirit of the original; but the damage has been done, and though the final scenes are moving they are closer to pathos than to tragedy.

Robert Helpmann as Caesar and as symbol of the cold pursuit of power is pictorially effective—his head and face are made up to resemble the visage on a Roman coin—and he acts the part fairly well, though he gives the impression less of the strong man who has subdued the softer emotions to his will to power than of the robot who has never had to contend with them. Lepidus, the elder statesman, is well handled; the characterization of Pompey as an ineffectual and genial fool is another gaffe. But I must desist.

The pace of the production is fast, and the revolving set is employed to generate excitement as well as to accomplish quick changes of scene. To people who do not know the play the Olivier interpretation will probably seem "wonderful" if only because it does make so many concessions to current conventions. To me it seemed a sorry mishandling of a great play.

TWO excerpts from Berlioz's "L'Enfance du Christ"—the lovely Adieu des bergers à la Sainte Famille and Repos de la Sainte Famille from Part 2—were issued here on records many years ago; and there was a Christmas Day broadcast of several excerpts a few years later; but there has been no concert performance of the entire work in New York that I have known about before the recent one by the Little Orchestra Society, which at last provided an opportunity to hear a score that W. J. Turner regarded as Berlioz's finest. It was a performance in which, as usual, the orchestra's playing under Thomas Scherman's direction was a mere production of the notes, and in which much of the solo singing—by Martial Singher, baritone, and Mary Davenport, mezzo-soprano—was not very agreeable to the ear. But there were also Leopold Simoneau, an excellent tenor; Donald Gramm, whose fresh bass voice was one of the most beautiful I have heard in years; and William Jonson's Choral Art Society, which produced sound of extraordinary transparency and loveliness. As for the music, to someone listening with Turner's statement in mind it was bewildering to hear the mellifluous nineteenth-century oratorio style in Part 1; but one heard the highly individual operation of the Berlioz mind in the overture and the familiar vocal portions of Part 2; and its most powerful manifestations came in Part 3, in the passages concerned with Joseph's anguished appeals for refuge and the granting of refuge by the Ishmaelite. Parts 2 and 3 certainly make "L'Enfance du Christ" a remarkable and beautiful work; but—recalling the marvels of the Love Scene, Queen Mab, Juliet's Funeral Procession, and Romeo in the Vault of the Capulets in "Romeo and Juliet"—I cannot agree with Turner that "L'Enfance" is Berlioz's finest score.

The Quartetto Italiano, at the Y. M. H. A., played Boccherini's Quartet Opus 6 No. 1 in half-voice, so to speak—with a delicacy of style and sensitiveness of phrasing that employed the finest gradations of its extraordinarily blended tone. All this made for the most remarkable quartet playing since the first years of the Budapest Quartet, and a perfect performance of Boccherini's charming work; but the same delicacy and sensitiveness in parts of Beethoven's Opus 59 No. 3, and a by no means robust treatment of other parts, produced a less satisfying performance of this piece.

With all the remarkable qualities of the tone there was a dryness which I wasn't sure I was hearing in the half-voice Boccherini performance, but which was unmistakable in the Beethoven; and when my guest exclaimed: "You know, it sounds like a different quartet up here; in Town Hall the tone was fuller and more luminous," I had my answer at last to the question that had been raised in my mind by the deficiencies in tone of the Budapest Quartet at the Y. The group has not been playing as it used to; but the poorer tone has been made to sound worse by the acoustic peculiarities of the Y. auditorium.

The New York City Ballet is now a superb company; and its great Balanchine ballets are enough to make its repertory quite the most distinguished in the world. The company is a superb one even without a Youskevitch, a Lazovsky, a Kriza whom it needs, and even with Laing whom it doesn't need and Eglevsky whom it would be better off without; the repertory is a distinguished one even with the inferior ballets of other choreographers than Balanchine. So far from objecting to the inferior ballets, I contend that these other choreographers must be represented in the repertory, and by what they produce. Not only that, but if keeping the Balanchine works on view for the small public which appreciates "poetic suggestion through dancing" depends on attracting to the box office the larger public which goes for literal representation of private neuroses and crimes passionels and for corny cuteness and comedy, I think the company is right to attract the larger public in that way. And I recognize a similar justification for the engagement of popular dancers like Eglevsky and Laing, but contend only that the proper way to use them is not to fit them into Balanchine ballets which they spoil but to present them in their specialties—Eglevsky in virtuoso pas de deux, Laing in a succession of "Lilac Garden"s.

If such tactics with the general public are necessary it is because there is nobody writing for it today. Edwin Denby wrote several years ago—nobody to explain, for example, that "to recognize poetic suggestion through dancing one has to be susceptible to poetic values and susceptible to dance values as well . . . I find that a number of people are, and that several dancers, for example Miss Danilova and Miss Markova, are quite often able to give them the sense of an amplitude in meaning which is the token of emotion in art." Instead there are, among others, writers like the one in Theater Arts who was described to me as one of those for whom modern dance expresses emotions whereas classical ballet is merely beautiful to the eye, and who was quoted as having credited Balanchine only with superb craftsmanship, not with artistic creativeness. There are, that is, writers who themselves lack the susceptibility to poetic values and to dance values that would enable them to recognize poetic suggestion through dancing.

The others include John Martin of the Times, whose present line with Balanchine is that of an admirer and friend who can understand Balanchine's affection for "Apollo," a "historical milestone," but must point out that it is "a very young and dated effort" which will never be a popular ballet; or who regrets having to counsel Balanchine to consign the wonderful invention of "The Four Temperaments" to oblivion for lack of the right music to carry it, and to return as beautiful a work as "The Fairy's Kiss" to the storehouse until its technical problems are solved; or who, conceding the beauty of "Swan Lake," must nevertheless admonish Balanchine sternly not to concern himself again with such old chestnuts—which is as though a theater company were admonished not to concern itself with Shakespeare or Shaw. "As a friend, and for your own good," says Mr. Martin to Balanchine, "I urge you to cut your throat."

Indo-Pakistan Relations Are Improving

Dear Sirs: I think most Western newspapers have neglected to emphasize the fact that relations between India and Pakistan have improved in recent weeks. After the tension that existed between the two nations during the summer, it is heartening to think that an era of good feeling may be in the making. The fundamental kinship between India and Pakistan came to the surface, strangely enough, at the time of the assassination of Pakistan's Prime Minister, Liaquat Ali Khan. The grief expressed by Indian leaders was genuine, and the better atmosphere it engendered has not been dissipated. It had the immediate good effect of establishing Khwaja Nazimuddin, Pakistan's new Prime Minister, and Ghulam Mohammed, the new Governor General, in many Indian minds as "able and moderate" and striving for peace between India and Pakistan. New leaders could not have got off to a better start with usually hostile neighbors.

The first fact about Nazimuddin which an Indian mentions is that he is a Bengali. That, for them, places him. It is like saying Ambassador Chester Bowles is from Connecticut, which gives an American an image of a tall, honest-faced New Englander.

The general feeling is that Nazimuddin's being from East Bengal may help ease some of the tensions within Pakistan. East Bengal, that island of the Pakistan nation which is separated by 1,000 miles of Indian territory from the capital at Karachi, holds 64 per cent of Pakistan's 76,000,000 people. With this proportion of the population the Bengalis believe they have not adequate representation in the top government posts. Nazimuddin's appointment is expected to allay that resentment.

Furthermore, because he is a more orthodox Moslem than was Liaquat, Nazimuddin is expected to please the religious-minded in Pakistan. He made his pilgrimage to Mecca in 1936, which gives him the honorary title of "Al-hajj." Nazimuddin also pleases the educated moderns of Pakistan, for he has a "moderate" concept of the Islamic state and is said to have progressive ideas on such problems as land reform.

The big question—whether Nazimud-din and the others who have taken over the reins in Pakistan will be able to improve Indo-Pakistan relations over the long run—is considered in a spirit of hopefulness. Nazimuddin's efforts, when he was Chief Minister of united Bengal, to bring about harmony between Moslems and Hindus are often recalled. Also the ability to hold amicable talks with India, displayed by Ghulam Mohammed, the new Governor General, when he was Finance Minister of Pakistan is cited as an encouraging sign. Some people here in Delhi even say that Nazimuddin, lacking the drive of Liaquat, will be a quieting influence on the extremists in Pakistan; it might, of course, work the other way—he might be pushed by them. If he does control the extremists, an atmosphere may be created in which the "new approach" Nehru has been talking of can be worked out. The creation of such an atmosphere, of course, cannot be one-sided. The extremists in India would have to be quieted at the same time, a job which Nehru has been stressing constantly.

Reaction in New Zealand

Dear Sirs: Your readers may be interested to learn of a bill recently introduced into the New Zealand House of Representatives, bearing the title "Police Offenses Amendment Bill," which makes it an offense to excite disaffection, or to arouse hatred, or contempt against H. M. Government of New Zealand, or any other member of the Commonwealth, or against the administration of justice. Clause 5 of the bill makes it an offense "to print, publish, sell, distribute, deliver, have for sale, or import into New Zealand, or cause to be imported any document or other matter having seditious intention or tendency" and places the onus of proof on the accused, presuming guilt if a document loosely described by law as "seditious" be found in a person's possession. Policemen have the right to seize any documents, printing presses, or duplicators and to arrest without warrant anyone they believe to have broken the statute. Bail is denied to the accused person pending appeal. Clause 12 gives the Crown the right to keep any seized property even if no charge is made.

The right to strike is for all practical purposes denied. The term "strike" includes a reduction in "normal output or the normal rate of work—the said act being due to any combination, agreement, common understanding, or concerted action, whether expressed or implied, on the part of any workers, and being intended or having a tendency to interfere with the manufacture, production, output, supply, delivery, or carriage of goods, or articles, or the carriage of persons. . . ." Clause 15 forbids anyone to "watch or beset any premises" or follow any person with a view to "compel, induce, or influence" him not to become a blackleg. It also makes it an offense to publish documents exposing any person or class to hatred or contempt. There is also a provision in the statute which outlaws the displaying of banners, badges, etc., deemed likely to "facilitate victimization of any person or class of person, or to boycotting any person or class."

Not only is the burden of proving innocence placed upon the accused, but under the bill statutory time limits in which charges can be made are abolished. Clause 17 gives a police sergeant the right to pass judgment on the likelihood of a person's guilt and makes it an offense to disobey his orders regardless of whether or not they are just or reasonable. Furthermore, a police sergeant has the right to forbid demonstrations or processions.

Mexico's New White Wealth

Dear Sirs: Recently, a new class of hacendados has sprung up in Mexico which has further widened the gap between rich and poor in a country of extremes. Chief among them are the cotton millionaires who have blossomed in Matamoros across the Texas border from Brownsville. During the last decade the thirsty desert lands lying south of Matamoros, irrigated from Rio Grande projects, have burst forth with a new white wealth—cotton. The new millionaires, with the instincts and desires of pre-Civil War cotton planters, have made the city's El Jardin district into a showplace of fine homes and estates. At Nuevo Laredo, Chito Longoria is building a palace with seventeen bathrooms, a swimming pool, a five-car garage, and three bars. Longoria and his brothers—associates of Clayton and Company—own 10,000 acres of choice land, and control banks, cotton-seed mills, wholesale and retail stores, and a score of other enterprises.

In contrast with this "new prosperity," Mexico's landless and impoverished agricultural workers, who still comprise the great bulk of the population, often receive no more than two pesos (23 cents) a day; even in the most prosperous regions farm wages are miserably low. The landless often subsist on 1,100 calories of food a day, but they hunger for land as well as food. Forgotten are the principles of the revolution, which promised the landless liberty and land. Today the emphasis is on industrialization, not land distribution. In the six years of the Cárdenas regime more than 43,200,000 acres were distributed to the peasants, but since 1940 the new owners have had to struggle against lawsuits and denunciations of titles and much land has returned to the big proprietors.

The peasants say that fiery Zapata and wild Pancho Villa still live and can be seen riding over the mesas. Some day, they say, these heroes may return to restore the land to them.

Loyalty Oath for Writers

Dear Sirs: I am an English writer visiting this country as a guest of the United States government to see America. One of the first things I saw was Collier's World War III issue. . . .

Since loyalty oaths are the fashion, isn't there one loyalty oath everybody could take—self-administered—which would bind oneself, in this time of unbalance, not to write anything disloyal to human interests? The editors of dollar or pound journals might not understand. But the writers they try to seduce ought to. If they are desperately short of pounds or dollars it would be better to sell their illustrious names to advertisers of beer or cigarettes. . . .

GEOFFREY GRIGSON

[Mr. Grigson is on the staff of the London Morning Post, literary adviser to the B. B. C., a former editor of New Verse, and author of a number of books of poetry and criticism.]

An Error Cited . . .

Dear Sirs: The editors of Scholastic Magazines have read with surprise the article by Morris Mitchell entitled Fever Spots in American Education, first of a series on "The Battle for Free Schools," published in the October 27, 1951, issue of The Nation.

Presumably the Nation article, dealing as it does with very recent events in Pasadena, Englewood, and similar situations, was intended to inform readers of the present pressures on the schools and the forces behind them. The 1951 reader would have no idea, however, that the incident referred to involving Scholastic Magazines occurred over eleven years ago, before the United States entered World War II, and that conditions have changed drastically since then.

The feature in question was an article which appeared in the September, 1940, issue of the American Legion Magazine, entitled Treason in the Textbooks, by Orland K. Armstrong, now a representative in Congress from Missouri. In addition to its generalized charges of "subversive influences" in the schools, it published a list of textbooks, magazines, and pamphlets which, it alleged, the Americanism Commission of the American Legion had found objectionable. In addition to Scholastic Magazines, the list included such books as Carl Becker's "Modern History," Charles A. and Mary R. Beard's "United States History," and "The American Observer" and other publications of the Civic Education Service.

If this article was later republished in pamphlet form without change and distributed by the American Legion and the National Economic Council, we were not aware of it. But we have in our files a signed statement from Boyd B. Stutler, then managing editor of the American Legion Magazine, which was given wide publicity at the time, and which reads in part as follows:

The American Legion Magazine expresses its regret that Scholastic was inadvertently included in the list of publications said to be objectionable for school use, which appeared in connection with the article entitled Treason in the Textbooks, by Orland K. Armstrong. . . .

The editors of the American Legion Magazine find nothing in the publication [Scholastic] which is un-American or otherwise objectionable for school use. . . .

The Legion also found it necessary to make public retractions to other publishers whose publications were listed.

How the careless handling of facts can work to the detriment of innocent persons is well illustrated by the fact that as a result of the article in The Nation we have already received a number of inquiries about our "loss of circulation" brought about by an attack on us by the American Legion.

Editor-in-Chief, Scholastic Magazines

. . . Apologies Tendered

On helping young people to think for themselves

THE propagandists of orthodoxy, both of the Right and of the Left, have always made special efforts to capture and to curb the minds of students. Those of us who care about freedom must do as much to keep our viewpoint before the new generation. These considerations recently led a liberal-minded Chicago businessman to take action.

☞ He arranged with The Nation to obtain a list of the valedictorians in the high schools of his city. To each of these honor students he sent a year's subscription to The Nation, both as a reward for scholarship and as a stimulus to further independent thinking. An honor certificate and a letter from The Nation's editor, crediting the donor of the award, went to each winner.

☞ Many other readers of The Nation have found merit in this idea, and have added their help to the program. We recommend it to your attention as an honorable investment in the future of freedom. Young people today are beginning to believe that there is something "disloyal" about exercising traditional American liberties. The Nation, as America's oldest weekly, may serve as an antidote to this dangerous lie, and as an example to future voters of how to think for themselves about social and political matters.

☞ If you would like to start such a program in your own community, The Nation will be happy to cooperate. Subscriptions for this purpose are available at half the usual rate, and we will attend to all the necessary arrangements.

THE OBVIOUS RESULTS OF THE CHURCHILL visit have been duly tabulated and added up: American steel for British aluminum; agreements as to Britain's relationship with the future European army; American pledge that bomber bases in England will not be used without the consent of both governments; a few others which together imply more cooperation and less competition in various parts of the world. But the less obvious results, some not yet revealed and perhaps still only half-formulated, are certainly more important and considerably more disturbing. The talks in Washington between Acheson and Eden and the later secret discussion among General Juin of France, General Sir William Flim of Britain, and General Bradley indicate clearly enough that new commitments are in the making in regard to Asia. For one thing it is now accepted that Japan will be pushed by the United States into diplomatic relations and a separate peace treaty with Chiang Kai-shek. Mr. Eden's protest against this action, which was initiated in violation of American promises during Mr. Dulles's recent Tokyo visit, failed to move Mr. Acheson. As James Reston remarked in the New York Times last Sunday, "In the last analysis the British felt there was very little they could do. They could not break with the United States on the issue. They needed the financial and military help of the United States, so their tendency . . . was to go along, even though they felt the situation was fundamentally wrong." What, if any, economic or military quid pro quo Eden received is not known. But the British undoubtedly pressed their claim for greater aid in Burma and Malaya.

REGARDING INDO-CHINA THE PROSPECT IS still more obscure. The Churchill-Truman warning to Peking that they were watching the military situation in Southeast Asia and would not tolerate Communist expansion here, a warning more strongly phrased by Eden in his Columbia University speech, may imply an agreement to intervene with arms if the Chinese send troops into Indo-China. It has been interpreted this way by several well-informed Washington correspondents. No such agreement, however, has been publicly announced, although the United States has apparently promised General Juin naval and air support in case of a Chinese invasion, and this, we all remember, was the way the whole thing started in Korea. Without any question the Asian aspects of the recent Washington talks provide hints of most serious developments ahead, and it is essential that all the facts be revealed without delay so that they may be examined by the public and by Congress before bigger and worse wars are launched.

PRESIDENT TRUMAN'S WITHDRAWAL OF THE nomination of General Mark W. Clark as ambassador to the Vatican State—ostensibly at the request of General Clark—may satisfy those who disapproved of sending a military man on such a mission, but it will not quiet the storm of protest provoked by the original announcement. As usual, Mr. Truman appears to have been moved by political self-interest. The day before the nomination of General Clark was withdrawn, Senator Tom Connally voiced strong objections to it and implied that it could not be confirmed. In addition to this important opposition, a storm of protest has been beating on the White House and on Congress. "Members of the Senate," reported the Wall Street Journal of January 8, "who must act on the nomination, say they are still receiving a large volume of mail on the Vatican issue—and nearly all of it against the President's proposal. One Southern Democrat says that out of a 'trunkful of letters' . . . only three have favored a United States ambassador to the Papal State. Senators from other sections report overwhelming opposition to the nomination. 'And the Protestants,' says one law-maker, 'are demanding that it come to a vote so that they can see exactly how every Senator stands on the issue.' " For the time being the President has prevented a record vote, but groups opposed to the appointment of an ambassador should keep the pressure on until Mr. Truman publicly disavows the project and formally reaffirms the constitutional separation of church and state.

ATTORNEY GENERAL J. HOWARD McGRATH was teetering on the end of a plank around the turn of the year; today he is back in the President's good graces. Not only has his continuance in office been confirmed, but he has been assigned the task of cleaning up the scandals in which some at least of his own subordinates are involved. What happened to bring about this happy ending—for McGrath? Washington reporters have little doubt Mr. Truman had planned to jettison him. According to David Lawrence, writing in the New York Herald Tribune, the President actually approached four men in his search for a new Attorney General. Three of them refused, but the fourth, Justin Miller, executive head of the National Association of Radio and Television Broadcasters and former Associate Justice of the United States Court of Appeals, accepted after some hesitation. On January 3 Mr. Truman missed a chance to deny widespread reports of McGrath's departure, and the announcement of his successor appeared imminent. Next day, however, McGrath emerged from a Cabinet meeting wreathed in smiles and told reporters that no change in his status was contemplated. According to Robert S. Allen, he was saved by the intervention of three friends—Senator Theodore Green, his political godfather; Cardinal Spellman, who telephoned a plea from Tokyo; and Matt Connelly, Presidential secretary, who concerns himself particularly with affairs of the Roman Catholic church and is said to be close to Franco's active Washington lobby. This story fits in with another Washington rumor—that McGrath has been allowed to stay at the Department of Justice until he can resign with dignity to take another post, that of ambassador to Spain, which is likely to become vacant shortly as the result of the illness of the present incumbent, Stanton Griffis.

WITH THIS ISSUE WE BEGIN A SYMPOSIUM ON the long-range problems of peace in Korea. In view of the continued deadlock in the cease-fire negotiations, such a discussion may seem premature, perhaps over-optimistic. But we are convinced that an armistice will eventually emerge from the talks and that it will bring with it a flock of problems more important and far more difficult to resolve than those now being discussed at Panmunjom. The authors contributing to the symposium have considered these problems with detachment and realism and where possible have suggested workable solutions. This week Arthur L. Grey, Jr., takes up the question of Korean unification. In subsequent issues Lawrence K. Rosinger will discuss the effect on Korea of the Japanese treaty and the Pacific Pact; Walter Sullivan, New York Times correspondent in Korea in 1950, will describe the task of rebuilding and relief that will face the United Nations once the fighting ends; Yongjeung Kim, director of the Korean Affairs Institute in Washington, will try to anticipate the internal political difficulties that peace will bring in Korea; finally Owen Lattimore and W. McMahon Ball will comment on certain broad aspects of a Korean settlement.

WITH MUCH STAR-SPANGLED FANFARE THE "Alert America" exhibit opened in Washington on January 7, sponsored jointly by the federal Civil Defense Administration and an organization known as Valley Forge Foundation. Actually the Valley Forge Foundation is an offspring of the Freedoms Foundation which was set up some years ago for the apparently harmless purpose of awarding cash prizes annually to "Americans who speak up for freedom." Its winners have included such freedom lovers as Westbrook Pegler and George Sokolsky, a fact which in 1949 led the International Brotherhood of Paper Makers (A. F. of L.) to hand back to the Freedoms Foundation an award of $600 and a gold medal. The Alert America exhibit represents what is referred to in Pentagon circles as a "new concept"—the partnership of civil defense and the military. It will visit the forty-eight states and over a hundred cities. School children in particular will be encouraged to view the exhibit, which according to the advance billing "is so arranged that the effect is cumulative on the visitor. As he passes through it he sees the destruction of a city, of crops . . . of life." Whether the new concept of linking military and civilians is a good one is certainly open to question. But in any case it does not excuse collaboration between the government and an outfit like Freedoms Foundation and its dubious subsidiaries.

Eisenhower: Silent Symbol

ANY uncertainty about General Eisenhower's political affiliations and political ambitions has been removed by his announcement that he would accept the Republican nomination. In the phrase of Joseph Alsop, it can now be said that the General is "an avowed, available, and firmly Republican" candidate for the Presidency.

With Senator Taft virtually unopposed, the entry of General Eisenhower in the Republican race might normally be taken as a healthy political development. But the General has made his announcement under circumstances that give his candidacy an abnormal significance. We are disturbed by the manner of the announcement and its reception, by the view that the General apparently takes of his own position, by the extreme emphasis being placed on "leadership," and by the threat of increased military influence in government.

Consider, first, the strange situation in which the General's candidacy puts the average voter. Eisenhower is in Europe and if his statement is taken at face value will remain there until after the Republican convention. He does not intend to campaign. He does not intend to discuss the issues. He will enter no debates and appear on no platforms. There is a calculated aloofness about this that cuts across the grain of the American political tradition. As Max Lerner put it, the General's duty to NATO today is greater than his duty to campaign for the nomination, but his duty to run for President in July will be greater than his duty to NATO. It looks as though the General wanted the Presidency handed him on a platter. This is certainly not flattering to the political ego of the average American voter, and it is unfair to the General's Republican rivals. Even a talented debater like Senator Taft will find it difficult to argue with a Silent Symbol on the other side of the Atlantic Ocean.

Presumably Senator Taft and General Eisenhower differ on foreign policy; on domestic questions we are inclined to accept Mark Sullivan's assurance that the General is "staunchly Republican." But if foreign policy is the key issue in 1952, how can conflicting tendencies within the Republican Party be clarified and appraised if only Saltonstall can speak to Lodge and only Lodge can speak to God? The necessity for debate is all the greater because the differences between Taft and Eisenhower on foreign policy are perhaps more a matter of timing and geography than of substance. Both are proponents of military containment, differing principally as to the scale and speed of rearmament, the value of the United Nations, and the respective importance of Europe and the Far East. Behind Eisenhower are the so-called "Morgan interests" that supported Willkie in 1940 and Dewey in 1948, with their familiar emphasis on the Atlantic and Europe; behind Taft are the corn-fed industrialists and financiers of the Middle West, who are inclined toward an isolationist position but who nevertheless favor a strong policy in Asia along the lines of the MacArthur recommendations. These divergent interests and emphases should be thoroughly explored; all too little is known about them.

Despite the difficulties of debating with a Silent Symbol, Senator Taft is a determined man and can be counted on to challenge Eisenhower to take off his uniform and talk to the people. But assuming Taft can force a debate, how much of a debate will it be? Under other circumstances, it might be lively and enlightening; today it can hardly be either. The manner in which the Eisenhower announcement was received implies a strong determination to rule out any significant discussion of foreign policy. The swift indorsement of Eisenhower by newspapers like the New York Times and the Chicago Sun-Times indicates how easily a frenzy of enthusiasm may be whipped up under cover of which the only issue will be: are you for or against Eisenhower? That liberals like Senator Douglas and Senator Morse should be for Eisenhower along with diehard Dixiecrats such as Alabama's Tom Abernethy is a measure of the neurotic need for a "leader" and a hint that the next President may be chosen by "acclamation" rather than on the merits of his candidacy as tested in a political fight.

The danger in this attempt to avoid a campaign on the issues is increased by the very qualities that have made

General Eisenhower a popular figure. If he had the mannerisms and the arrogance of the stereotyped "man on horseback," in short if he were more like MacArthur, one could safely assume that the American people would recognize the type and act accordingly. But "Ike" is from Kansas; he looks and talks and acts like a civilian in uniform. The General should be aware that his supporters are exploiting these qualities. Eisenhower is the ideal candidate, writes Walter Lippmann, because he is "enormously stronger with the voters than is the Republican Party." In other words, Eisenhower's personal popularity can be used to bring to power a minority party that has been discredited by past performance and is still distrusted by the great mass of voters. Under the circumstances General Eisenhower's acquiescence in the type of campaign that is shaping up—for which, indeed, he is himself largely responsible—betrays a fundamental failure to understand the implications of democratic leadership.

The possibility that political debate will be foreclosed is further increased by the probable impact of Eisenhower's nomination on the two-party system. Though the Republicans' candidate, Eisenhower might well be the Democrats' as well, in fact if not in name. There is already, as in 1948, a strong pro-Eisenhower sentiment among many so-called "liberal" Democrats, and it can be argued that his nomination would prevent a Dixiecrat secession. The greater danger, of course, is that Eisenhower will be the Democratic candidate not formally but by default. If President Truman is nominated, there can be no debate on foreign policy. Nor can there be any real debate if the Democrats choose someone the President approves. They might as well nominate Republican Eisenhower as Democrat Vinson.

There is a final circumstance about the General's candidacy that we find even more disturbing than those mentioned. Eisenhower is not only a general; he belongs to the military. He was trained at West Point, and his entire career, with the exception of the brief interlude at Columbia University, has been spent in uniform. He was a tactful commander of a coalition of armed forces, but he has had no experience with political parties or political administration. The Eisenhower jacket may be less brassy than the gold braid on MacArthur's cap, but it is still part of a uniform. Today the influence of the military in government is perhaps greater than it was at the end of World War II. General Eisenhower may not want to represent the Pentagon in the White House, but how can he help it? The circumstances of the times—the danger of war, the war economy, the vast and growing network of alliances—tend to make any President, even a civilian and a democrat, a tool of the military. If there was reason, as we believed and stated, to be concerned about the appointment of General Marshall as Secretary of State, there is much more reason to be concerned about the presence today of a regular army officer in the White House.

In a later issue we intend to examine what is known about General Eisenhower's position on foreign and domestic issues and discuss means by which the Democrats could organize to meet the threat which his candidacy presents to the two-party system. But the political season is already well advanced, and action should be taken now. In our view every effort should be made to prevent a stampede for Eisenhower. The General should be asked to resign his command immediately, return home, and start answering questions. Independent candidates should be entered in both major parties, for as many offices as possible; independent delegations should be entered in the Democratic primaries in as many states as possible; and liberals and progressives should start to caucus immediately on other ways of assuring voters a real choice in this most crucial election.

Visbinsky's Offer

Paris, January 12

TODAY'S announcement by Soviet Foreign Minister Vishinsky that Russia was now prepared to accept as part of an atomic-control plan inspection on a "continuing basis" not only represented an important concession; coupled with his retreat from Russia's previous position that atomic weapons must be prohibited first with international control to follow, it has presented the Western Allies with a genuine challenge. How they will meet it is not yet certain, but the first reaction of the Americans was to look for booby-traps. They professed to have spotted two questionable items: one, Vishinsky's insistence that the control agency should "not be entitled to interfere in the domestic affairs of states"; the other, the possibility that his proposal was intended to block the new Disarmament Commission, approved yesterday over strong Soviet opposition.

But it is clear that Vishinsky's initiative will increase the lead Russia has taken in the peace-propaganda bout going on in the Assembly. In every committee the Soviet delegates have been on the offensive, with the obvious purpose of proving that, while some great powers look for solutions in other quarters, Russia at least takes the United Nations seriously.

Until Vishinsky's intervention today, the outstanding Soviet proposal was that calling for a special meeting of the Security Council, to be attended by the Foreign Ministers, which should try to arrange a Korean truce and also to reduce tension and establish friendly relations among the powers. The Korean proposal was doomed from the start; but the idea of periodic meetings of the Security Council appealed to so many delegations that after strong initial objections from the Americans it was ultimately amended to eliminate references to Korea as well as the Soviet demand for a meeting "without delay," and was then adopted as modified. The result was, in effect, a Soviet defeat, for no one here believes the Americans will permit an early meeting of Foreign Ministers even for general discussion of differences. But the fact that Vishinsky voted for the much-amended resolution is taken as additional evidence that Russia intends to back any move, however slight, toward big-power talks on peace. And if a cease-fire should be arranged at Panmunjom before the end of the Assembly, the Soviet demand for a Security Council session would have overwhelming support.

With the passage of time the contention that everything proposed by the Russians must be rejected automatically and entirely is losing force. Delegates are very conscious that two years ago Secretary General Trygve Lie recommended similar special meetings of the Security Council. They are conscious, too, that the concessions offered by Vishinsky on disarmament, if they mean what they appear to mean, greatly reduce the gap between the two rival plans and eliminate the most serious points of difference. It will not be enough, in the view of most people, merely to throw doubt on the sincerity of the Soviet offer; it should be examined on its merits with an evident will to agree if agreement is possible. Otherwise the setting up of the Disarmament Commission to work toward the "regulation, limitation, and balanced reduction of all armed forces and all armaments" will be proved an empty gesture.

Same Pill, Less Sugar

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

IN HIS report to Congress on the state of the nation, the President prescribed the same mixture as before except that the bitter defense pill was to be larger and its sugar-coating thinner. He recognized that arms were not the only protection against aggression but emphasized the building of military might and gave a minor role to the social and moral means of fortifying democracy—reform at home, economic development abroad. There was little evidence in the speech that the Administration had given heed to the authoritative and varied voices that have recently warned against putting too many of our eggs too fast into military baskets lest we weaken our economy and, even more, the economies of our allies.

I found the message depressing, but I was not at all surprised that the Stock Exchange regarded it as bullish and turned strong the following morning. Quite correctly, the professional traders saw inflationary implications in the President's words and therefore bought equities which, if not a perfect hedge against depreciating dollars, are better than no hedge at all. In the first place, while details of spending were withheld for later messages, Mr. Truman appeared anxious to dispose of rumors that he would hold down military appropriations. "Our first job," he said, "is to move ahead full steam on the defense program. . . . This year I shall recommend some increase in the size of the active force we are building, with particular emphasis on air power. This means we shall have to continue large-scale production of planes and other equipment for a longer period of time than we had originally planned." It would appear that the Pentagon advocates of a 140-group air force have triumphed.

While the military budget seems certain to grow larger, there may be some trimming of civilian expenditure. Mr. Truman repeated the aims of the Fair Deal—conservation, improved social security, better housing, health and education, civil rights—but he was less specific than in earlier years and he conceded that "we cannot do all we want to do in times like these." Moreover, defense priorities for materials seem likely to reduce the volume of social investment.

Only in two instances did the President urge definite Congressional action which would increase non-defense expenditure. Some effort, he said, should be made to ease the pressure of living costs on those dependent on fixed payments. Old-age and survivors' insurance benefits should be raised at least $5 a month above the present average of $42; similar increases should be made in veterans' benefits and public-assistance grants. These proposals will no doubt be attacked by advocates of blind economy, but they represent elementary justice for the most helpless victims of inflation.

The President's second request to Congress was of more dubious nature. I cannot think that, at a time when producers of food and fibers are enjoying booming prosperity, strengthening the farm price-support system is imperative. At least any further underpinning of price floors for agriculture ought to be accompanied by the construction of solid ceilings over food prices. However, while Mr. Truman pointed out that the stabilization law was "shot full of holes" and asked for enactment of a stronger measure, he failed to mention the gap opened at the behest of the farm bloc.

Mr. Truman declared that "we can control inflation if we make up our minds to do it." But it is doubtful whether in an election year Congress is prepared to take the painful steps necessary, and Mr. Truman's speech left the impression that he was not going to push it very hard. True, he said that preserving the financial strength of the government would mean high taxes over the next few years, but he made no mention of the necessity for a balanced budget, though possibly he will do so in a future message.

Failing the strongest kind of lead from the White House, there seems not the remotest chance that Congress will raise taxes again this year. Thus we face the prospect of a growing deficit to swell the springs of purchasing power in a period when the supply of many kinds of consumer goods will be curtailed more drastically than had been expected a short time ago. Under the circumstances the guarded hopes of economic equilibrium which I expressed in these pages two weeks ago begin to appear decidedly over-optimistic.

New Phase in France

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

THE Pleven government, as has been expected for some days, was defeated in the National Assembly on Monday by 341 to 243 votes, all the Communists, Gaullists, and Socialists, as well as a number of Radicals, M. R. P.'s, and others voting against M. Pleven's demand for special powers in the reorganization of the French railways. This was one of several fields in which the Pleven government was seeking authority from Parliament to put in force drastic financial and administrative measures by decree. The resistance to legislation by fiat, or what amounts to the same thing, is common in French parliamentary history; and in this particular case the Socialists and the left wing of the M. R. P.—not to mention the Communists—feared that the Pleven government, if given these special powers, would use them to make inroads into the whole range of social services.

But this is only one reason, the superficial one, why the Pleven government fell. There are many deeper, less obvious reasons. It is reported from Washington that the American press is much relieved that Pleven was not defeated on foreign policy. This satisfaction may prove premature and shortsighted. There is a strong feeling in parliamentary quarters that the Pleven government was profoundly representative of the phase of history through which France passed in 1950 and 1951, but that it had now somehow become an anachronism. In this phase France was expected to assume that it was the leading European nation of the Atlantic Pact and that large-scale rearmament, in view of the danger of a Russian invasion of Western Europe and German rearmament, were essential. The tendency now is undoubtedly to seek other solutions. As Le Monde put it:

It is often assumed that a Cabinet crisis in France merely means a slight reshuffle of seats. Governments change, but the people remain the same. It is not certain that this is true at present. Not only are the Gaullists proposing a new foreign policy, but among all other non-Communist political groups in Parliament one notices a development favorable to a revision of our international commitments, in accordance with our physical possibilities. These tendencies, though still far from precise, and still hard to locate exactly, roughly correspond to "Bevanism" in Britain. . . . Naturally, it is no use expecting a radical change in our foreign policy overnight. The "Bevanist" tendency is still represented by only a small minority in each group; even so it already affects more than just a few isolated individuals, as it did last year. The views of Daladier on Indo-China, for instance, have undoubtedly an influence on the rest of the Radicals, and there are similar phenomena among the M. R. P.'s.

The paper goes on to say that the Gaullists and "Bevanites" see eye to eye when they criticize the Pleven government's excessive subservience to Washington, and both fear that Germany may be rearmed without sufficient safeguards for France; they do not believe much in a Soviet invasion. But here the similarity between the Gaullists and the French "Bevanites" stops. For if the "Bevanites" would like to veto the rearmament of Germany, cut down France's own military expenditure, and start negotiating with Ho Chi Minh and Mao, the Gaullists stand for a militarist policy in Europe and a kind of MacArthurism in Indo-China.

Thus while there is little chance of the "Bevanites" and the Gaullists finding enough common ground, in either the domestic or the international field, to permit them to form an alternative to the Pleven coalition, the two together exercise enough influence to prevent an exact repetition of the Pleven government. But to bring about a government combination which will be representative of the new mood in France will be exceedingly difficult on the parliamentary plane, and for this reason the crisis is expected to be a long one. It may, at first, be solved by the formation of some kind of makeshift government, fairly similar to the last one—probably with M. René Mayer as Foreign Minister instead of M. Schuman. But the 243 deputies who supported Pleven, most of whom are bound, because of their "central" position, to find a place in the new majority, are extremely divided themselves. The greater part of the M. R. P. want the Socialists in the next government coalition—which would necessitate the adoption of a financial policy somewhat different from M. René Mayer's—while other M. R. P.'s and many Radicals and right-wing conservatives favor, if only as an "experiment," the inclusion of some Gaullists. The peculiar feature of the present parliamentary situation in France is that in each of the major parties except the Communists there are at least two tendencies pulling in different ways; in most parties there is now what, for lack of a better word, Le Monde described as a "Bevanist" minority. Whatever the final outcome of the crisis, the Pleven-Schuman era, as we have known it these last two years, is either over or is nearing its end.

Internal Confusion in Internal Revenue

BY NORMAN REDLICH

THE subcommittee of the House Ways and Means Committee headed by Representative Cecil R. King of California has brought joy to the Republicans and anguish to the Administration by its revelations of corruption in the Internal Revenue Bureau. As a direct result of the committee's investigation, President Truman recently announced that the bureau would be completely reorganized and more revenue officials placed under civil service. But the scandals uncovered by the King subcommittee strike at the heart of our tax-collection system, and the problems raised will remain with us whether or not Congress approves the President's plan. They will exist as long as personal judgments determine how much money individuals and corporations shall pay to the federal Treasury each year.

Taxes no longer have a direct and dreaded impact only on the wealthy few. This year the federal tax system will drain off approximately one-fourth of the national income. Yet this vast collection process, which garners over sixty billion dollars annually, is largely voluntary. The government could never enforce the tax laws if individuals and corporations should decide to ignore them en masse. Weak governments have usually discovered, as Nationalist China did, that the tax-collection system falls apart if public confidence is forfeited. And the quickest way to destroy confidence is to let the public think that some persons, by bribing revenue officials, are "getting away with something."

With this fact lurking in the background, it is essential that the agency responsible for administering the tax-collection system should be a model of efficiency and integrity. The Bureau of Internal Revenue, at least in the last ten years, has deviated sharply from the required standards. Its organization is antiquated, and it is pitifully understaffed for the tremendous burden placed upon it by the revenue demands of the Second World War and the present defense program. Fair-minded observers would agree with President Truman that the majority of the bureau's employees are honest, but there has been enough dishonesty and inefficiency to arouse distrust about many of its activities. An especially unfortunate situation has developed in the offices of the sixty-four collectors of internal revenue. Although technically under the jurisdiction of the Commissioner, these collectors are direct appointees of the President and enjoy a large measure of autonomy in their respective districts. Many of their offices have been notoriously inefficient. Only the pressure of the recent investigation, for example, brought about a genuine effort by the Third New York District to issue warrants for delinquent taxpayers. The collectors' offices are supposed to audit returns under $8,000, but in many districts there is no auditing at all. John B. Dunlap, the present Commissioner, pointed out recently that only fifteen of the sixty-four collectors are career men and that twenty of them have outside business interests.

If all taxes were automatically computed and deducted from income like pay-roll taxes, corrupt officials would have a narrow field of operation. Unfortunately, preparation of a tax return by business men, corporations, executives, professional men, and those who are self-employed in various capacities is not a cut-and-dried affair. In a perfectly legal and aboveboard manner accountants and tax lawyers are constantly advising clients on ways to minimize their taxes. The Kiplinger Washington Agency, for example, in its tax letter of December 29, 1951, presented a detailed analysis of the use of charitable foundations as a device for passing corporate stock from generation to generation without paying an estate tax. Of course, beyond the accepted methods of tax saving lies the area of fraud. A business man may try to deduct $2,500 for "entertainment of customers" when actually he bought his wife a mink coat. A doctor may try to conceal part of the cash he receives for house calls. A merchant may take a few dollars out of the cash register each night and charge it to "petty cash."

Returns in which the taxpayer has consciously sought to minimize taxes by either honest or dishonest means, and usually with the assistance of experts, offer tempting opportunities to venal officials. And these opportunities have been multiplied by lax administrative practices. For example, the collectors of internal revenue hand on returns of over $8,000 to the internal-revenue agents for auditing; the collectors audit those under $8,000. Often the receipt of many thousands and even millions in tax dollars hinges on an agent's decision to allow or disallow a deduction. It is at this point that smart accountants and lawyers, representing wealthy clients, come face to face with agents whose incomes are small and whose scruples are flexible. In thousands of instances, for a few hundred or a thousand dollars or even for friendship or a minor favor, an agent will decide a close question in favor of a taxpayer; these transactions rather than the publicized $500,000 shake-downs constitute the typical corruption in the tax service. The King subcommittee is aware that this type of corruption, because it is more widespread, is even more dangerous than the corruption in high places. Unfortunately, it is extremely difficult to uncover.

The prosecution of fraud cases also offers opportunities for shake-downs and fixes. Between the time a tax-fraud case is first turned over to the special agent's office and the time prosecution is started by the Assistant Attorney General in charge of such cases, charges can be dropped at any one of seventeen points along the line. Tax evaders anxious to stay out of jail can dangle attractive bait before the eyes of officials who have discretionary power to stay prosecution. Corrupt officials have been assisted by the bureau's practice of permitting a prosecution for fraud to be discontinued if a taxpayer's health or sanity would be impaired by a trial. The investigations of the King subcommittee have made it plain that under the direction of T. Lamar Caudle the Tax Division of the Department of Justice did not prosecute fraud cases solely on the basis of apparent guilt.

GIVEN an administrative problem as complex as this, a Congressional committee of inquiry can obtain only certain limited results. The King subcommittee has neither the money nor the personnel to conduct a full-scale investigation of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. Its chief function is rather to cast a spotlight in different directions, awakening the public to the problems and leaving corrective measures to the Administration.

While the exposure of deals between local agents and accountants or lawyers has been of great interest, the more sensational revelations of the corruption of high officials have grabbed the headlines. These headlines may have placed an unfair amount of the blame on the shoulders of the Truman Administration, but they have already resulted in some important changes in the bureau. Commissioner Dunlap has replaced Commissioner Schoeneman, a notable improvement. The chief counsel has resigned. A new assistant commissioner, a new head of the alcohol tax unit, and a new Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Tax Division of the Department of Justice have been appointed. Tax-fraud cases will now be referred directly from field offices to the Department of Justice, thus by-passing the complicated hierarchy in the Internal Revenue Bureau. New collectors have been named in New York, Boston, and St. Louis.

Commissioner Dunlap has also organized an inspection service which is conducting its own investigation of dishonest practices in the bureau. Half the bureau's employees have filled out forms which detail their property holdings and net worth. Of course, an official dishonest enough to take a bribe will be dishonest enough not to include it in his net worth, but the forms may reveal some unexplained accumulations of wealth by men earning small salaries. And the necessity of filling out these forms may act as a deterrent against bribe-taking in the future.

Perhaps the most tangible result of the committee's work to date has been President Truman's reorganization plan. The new inspection service will be made a permanent part of the bureau. Twenty-five district commissioners will replace the present loose network of collectors, agents, and special agents. The district commissioners will be under civil service and forbidden to have outside employment or business interests. Abolition of the politically appointed collectors is a big step forward; civil-service career men are far less susceptible to the pressure of people with "influence."

Apart from these immediate gains, the current investigation has unquestionably achieved some important long-range results. The public has been made aware of a deplorable situation. For some time, at least, revenue agents, tax accountants, and taxpayers will be on their good behavior. Fear may not be the most desirable method of securing compliance with the law, but it is often an effective one. As more disclosures are made by the King subcommittee, the public can look forward to still greater efforts by the Administration to clean house. However, the President's choice of Attorney General McGrath to conduct an investigation of the bureau is not likely to inspire confidence, in view of the justified charges leveled by the King subcommittee at McGrath's own department.

Congress will be asked to authorize an expanded staff for the overworked bureau and to increase salaries of field officials. The subcommittee itself, in a report to be released in the spring, will undoubtedly come up with some excellent suggestions for improving administrative and civil procedures. It will also recommend stricter regulation of federal tax practice in order to keep uncertified accountants, so-called "tax experts," and influence peddlers from negotiating with revenue officials. The committee has found that lawyers as a group are guilty of fewer dishonest acts than other tax practitioners.

But even if all these corrective steps are taken and the bureau becomes, as President Truman has predicted, a "blue-ribbon civil-service career organization," the danger of corruption will remain. On the lower levels of tax auditing and collecting, men of means will still offer bribes which some officials will accept. The improvements already made and those in prospect will narrow but not eliminate the problem.

It is unfortunate that the subcommittee's disclosures have provided some unearned political ammunition for the Republicans. While the Administration will say that the changes it has instituted have solved the problem, the Republicans will insist that the only hope for greater honesty lies in a Republican victory in November. Neither claim will be true. So long as revenue officials can give or withhold favors at their will the possibility of dishonesty will exist. This fact cannot be used as an argument for lower taxes, for a large and complex revenue system is now an essential part of our national existence. Instead, the public must insist that vigorous and non-partisan investigation be carried on constantly by the new inspection service of the bureau and periodically by Congressional groups like the King subcommittee. Corruption in tax-gathering can never be entirely eliminated from a tax system as extensive as ours. But it can be minimized, and certainly it should not be encouraged by inefficient organization, careless administrative practices, lax enforcement of the law, or patronage politics.

Granddaddy of the Tax Scandals

BY HARRY BARNARD

THE current Washington production, "Tax Scandals of 1951"—and presumably of 1952—is but a new version of the original show that reached the stage on Capitol Hill in 1924. The leading actors in this granddaddy of "Tax Scandals" were President Calvin Coolidge and Secretary of the Treasury Andrew Mellon; Senator James Couzens of Michigan was the producer. The piece was a great hit and ran for years.

Attracted to every controversy, especially if it gave off even a slight odor of graft, political favoritism, or any other governmental wrongdoing, Senator Couzens was drawn inevitably into an investigation of tax collection. Having amassed forty million dollars by showing Henry Ford how to run an automobile company in a business-like way, he thought every other multimillionaire ought to be as honest as he was. And probably also because of his own millions, he had not an iota of awe for other multimillionaires, not even for Mr. Mellon, "the greatest Secretary of the Treasury since Alexander Hamilton."

Secretary Mellon was putting through Congress the tax program described as the Mellon Plan for Assuring Permanent Prosperity. Its nub was the reduction of World War I surtaxes on large incomes. Quite persuasively Mellon argued that if big corporations had their taxes reduced, they would put the money back into their business, and everybody would benefit. A few progressives challenged this plan, but the opposition got little attention until Senator Couzens opened up against it.

HARRY BARNARD, a Chicago newspaperman, is the author of "Eagle Forgotten," a life of John Peter Altgeld. He is working on a biography of James Couzens.

Couzens had written a letter to Secretary Mellon asking him for the facts with which he backed his tax theory. Mellon considered this an affront and sent Senator Couzens a reply which in effect told him to mind his own business and to let Alexander Hamilton's successor handle such complicated matters as taxation. The belligerent Senator from Michigan let out a rejoinder foreshadowing an atomic explosion. Mr. Mellon, not as meek as he looked, replied in the same style, implying that Senator Couzens was not only a dolt in financial matters, in spite of his accomplishments with Henry Ford, but also a tax slacker, since he had admittedly invested much of his forty million in government securities.

That did it. On February 21, 1924, Couzens presented to the Senate a resolution for a committee to investigate the Bureau of Internal Revenue, which then as now was under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of the Treasury. The bureau had not been investigated by Congress since the income tax had gone into effect eleven years earlier. Though controlled by the Republicans, the startled Senate passed the resolution. When the Senators recovered, they tried to remedy matters by denying Couzens the chairmanship of the investigating committee, which by precedent he should have had, and giving it to faithful old Jim Watson of Indiana. The committee was further loaded with good friends of Mr. Mellon, but Couzens insisted on a real investigation and stole the show. The first thing he did was to subpoena from the Bureau of Internal Revenue its top-secret files on all the corporations in which Mr. Mellon owned a substantial interest—a sizable file indeed. Next he retained as counsel for the committee the famous prosecutor of the San Francisco "graft" cases, Francis J. Heney. It did not bother Couzens that his Republican colleagues had intentionally omitted from the resolution specific authorization for counsel. He got around this impediment by paying Mr. Heney's fee out of his own pocket.

NOW came the comic relief. Jim Watson rushed to Secretary Mellon, and Mellon rushed to President Coolidge. Among them they cooked up two blistering letters. One from Mr. Mellon to Mr. Coolidge informed the President that if the wealthy Senator Couzens were permitted to pay for legal counsel for an investigating committee, the Constitution would be subverted, the Republic endangered, and, worse yet, Mr. Mellon might be forced to resign in protest. A letter from President Coolidge to the Senate touched off a beautiful to-do in that body. Even Senators as conservative as Carter Glass denounced the President, declaring that his attack upon Senator Couzens and the committee was an attack upon the Senate itself; it was comparable, said Senator Tom Walsh, to the treatment of the English Parliament by the Stuarts and Tudors. Senatorial indignation over Coolidge's tactics was so great that the Couzens committee was again given the green light, this time with authority to hire a lawyer.

The interesting reports which Senator Couzens now sent regularly to the Senate showed that Mr. Mellon's Bureau of Internal Revenue had secretly granted rebates and refunds on their income taxes amounting to millions of dollars to a large number of corporations, including several controlled by Mr. Mellon. In one report Senator Couzens estimated that these secret refunds totaled well over $600,000,000. Among the corporations which benefited were the Aluminum Corporation of America (Mellon), $15,589,614; United States Steel, $55,063,312; Bethlehem Steel, $22,103,942; duPont, $15,369,123; Federal Ship Building, $19,849,786; National Aniline Chemical, $9,912,140; and Gulf Oil (Mellon), $3,378,000. Other beneficiaries included William Randolph Hearst, whose papers soon would be demanding a national sales tax, and Colonel William Boyce Thompson, an industrialist who had served as treasurer of the National Republican Committee.

Couzens was subjected to a great deal of criticism for failing to show that these refunds were illegal. In another report he answered that this was precisely the point—these internal-revenue secret dealings were legal, but the tax money was being shoveled back to the corporations without the public knowing anything about it. At the same time he insisted that under any fair system of taxation many of these corporations would not be entitled to such refunds, that they ought, in fact, to be taxed more heavily, and he urged that the laws be changed. He also declared that the Secretary of the Treasury, even if his name was Mellon, should not have the exclusive say on tax policy; this was something over which Congress should exercise effective control. Therefore he recommended the creation of a permanent Joint Committee on Internal Revenue, with a permanent staff of experts, and the recommendation was adopted. Today one must wonder what has happened to this committee.

The curtain then went up on the grand climax of Couzens's "Tax Scandals of 1924." Mr. Mellon was so outraged by the effrontery of the Michigan Senator that he struck back at him with a fury that eventuated in the most celebrated tax case of all time up to then.

Back in 1919 Henry Ford had bought out all the other stockholders in the Ford Motor Company, including Couzens, paying Couzens alone thirty million dollars for his shares. Couzens paid in income tax on the transaction approximately nine million dollars, after having checked with the incumbent Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Dan Roper, as to the amount that he owed. When Henry Ford, around 1924, began talking of running for the Presidency, somebody sent to Jim Watson a memorandum asserting that the Ford stockholders had not paid enough income taxes. The Bureau of Internal Revenue investigated the matter thoroughly on several occasions and rejected the allegation. Now this old memorandum was dug up from the bowels of the bureau, and on the basis of it Mr. Mellon dispatched the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to Couzens in the Senate chamber with a notice that he was being cited for income-tax delinquency to the tune of ten million dollars.

"Sue and be damned!" Couzens told the Commissioner, then a gentleman named Blair. The result was a giant-size case before the United States Board of Tax Appeals which went on, concurrently with Couzens's investigation of taxes, for almost three years. In the end Couzens not only won a victory over the Bureau of Internal Revenue but showed that he had overpaid his taxes by more than $900,000, which the government now had to refund!

It is clear from this recapitulation of the "Tax Scandals of 1924" that the 1951 version is pretty weak stuff and that Republicans as well as Democrats have been involved in corruption from time to time. The characters in the current show seem small potatoes—rotten as some of them probably are. If Congress could produce someone like the belligerent, progressive Couzens, with the temerity to dig into the files of the really big taxpayers instead of into the affairs of little people linked mainly with mink coats, we might get a performance that would make history. The investigators, of course, would have to be interested less in newspaper headlines or ammunition for a coming political campaign than in penetrating to the heart of what political analysts from James Madison to Charles A. Beard have called a basic problem of government—who pays what taxes?

Korea: Steps Toward Unification

BY ARTHUR L. GREY, JR.,

THE fundamental issue of the Korean problem is the political unification of this artificially divided country. Unless it is resolved, there is little possibility that lasting peace will be achieved.

Although the armistice talks at Panmunjom have been concerned entirely with military matters, they have great bearing upon the unification question. In the first place, these talks opened channels for negotiation on the Korean situation which had been blocked since the dissolution of the U. S.-U. S. S. R. Joint Commission in 1947. Secondly, agreement on an armistice—which still appears possible despite the wrangling—should encourage attempts to settle political matters as well. Finally, should the proposal for neutral participation in the enforcement of the Panmunjom provisions be accepted, it would be an important precedent for genuinely international settlement of the Korean problem.

Korea's history and geographical position decree for it a role of absolute neutrality in international affairs. The first action of the United States and China in coming discussions of the future of Korea should be recognition of this fact. So long as one power has a strategic advantage in Korea, no agreement on unification will be reached. Direct negotiations with China by the United States, either acting for itself or for a combination led by it, would just as surely fail to produce a unified Korean government as did United States negotiations with Russia in 1946 and 1947. Each side would still feel that it was in its interest to reject any settlement which did not give the balance of power to the Korean group it was already supporting.

Assuredly the role of the Korean people in the unification process should be a large one. The present situation is a direct result of too much outside interference in the country's affairs. The capacity of the Koreans to govern themselves has been severely maligned during the past few years, much as it was earlier by Japan. Actually the Koreans displayed a good deal of skill in self-government when they had the opportunity immediately following the Japanese surrender in 1945. Before the arrival of the Russian and American occupation forces, the Japanese authorities acceded to the demands for government-tal powers made by the new "People's Republic," a representative body of more than forty Korean political groups of all shades which emerged from the underground on V-J Day. The People's Republic was in the main left of center. Not until the extreme rightist groups which now dominate the South Korean government withdrew from it and set out to destroy it, was it to a significant degree controlled by Communists. While it cannot be assumed that the Korean people have been unaffected by the pressures to which they have been so long subjected, it is hardly plausible that a country which so recently contained a large measure of moderate leadership is now fairly represented by Communists in the North and venal reactionaries in the South.

A FIRST concrete step toward unification could be the formation of a national government with limited powers but responsible for the boundary line created by the cease-fire, the establishment of a uniform currency, and the removal of other obstacles to freedom of movement and commercial relations between the two areas. In this way the difficult issue of the dissolution of the present northern and southern governments would not have to be faced immediately.

The impossibility of agreement between the United States and the Communists on how elections should be conducted precludes the selection of the over-all national government by vote of the people. Therefore, such a government should be set up by an international agency created through an accord among the belligerents, and its members should be appointed on as widely representative a basis as possible. When, after a period of time, the new government had assumed most of the responsibilities of sovereignty, the international agency should consider ordering a national election. The important thing from the standpoint of the agency would not be the internal government but the maintenance of Korean neutrality.

Seemingly, it was for discharging just such responsibilities that the United Nations was created. But the U. N. agencies established for dealing with the Korean dispute are incapable of mediating it. One of the great weaknesses of the U. N. in the present situation is that Asian countries like Pakistan, India, Burma, Indonesia, and the Philippines have each only as many votes in the General Assembly as, for example, any one of the six Central American countries. Yet all the latter together have a population only one-half that of Burma, the least populous of these Asian states. The result has been that the U. N. has become too closely identified with the United States in Korea and is unable to play an independent role. The establishment of a new agency which is acceptable to both sides is therefore necessary.

ARTHUR L. GREY, JR., a writer on Far Eastern affairs, collaborated with the late George M. McCune on the widely read "Korea Today." This is the first of a series of articles on the problem of peace in Korea by a number of experts on the Far East. The second, by Lawrence K. Rosinger, will appear next week.

In the meantime, non-military U. N. agencies now in Korea should be assuming greater responsibilities. These are the United Nations Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea (UNCURK), which succeeded the U. N. Commission on Korea in 1950, and the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency (UNKRA) established a short while later. Neither is operating effectively, either to relieve the deplorable economic conditions in South Korea or to prepare the area for becoming part of a unified Korean state. American policy on economic assistance has followed the same disheartening course during the fighting that it did during the occupation period four and five years ago, affording only militarily administered relief "for the prevention of disease, starvation, and unrest among the civilian population." UNKRA, which derives the bulk of its funds from the United States, has been unable to start even a small program for repairing some of the eight billion dollars' worth of war damage in South Korea.

No doubt the willingness of both sides to continue the talks at Panmunjom has been prompted by their conviction that a resumption of the fighting would bring little in the way of decisive results. Thus instead of facilitating agreement, the armistice may only increase the reluctance of one or both sides to make the compromises necessary for the realization of Korean unification.

One of the difficulties which we may hope will be overcome by reduced direct American participation is the present inelastic attitude of Congress. There is every danger that the din of Senatorial tocsins would frighten American negotiators from agreeing to the slightest departure from the status quo. The possibility that China and Russia may feel that a constructive approach is now expedient must not be dismissed. In any case, the chance of a negotiated settlement should not be sacrificed to useless recriminations and justifications for continued unilateral action.

The war has reduced Korea to a condition in which it is of very little value to anyone. There have been an estimated five million casualties out of a total population of thirty million at the beginning of the war. Millions of people are homeless. Most of the factories are leveled; schools are either wrecked or have been requisitioned by the military; and agricultural production, which was not adequate before, has fallen by nearly a third. If these facts mean anything, they call for imaginative cooperation to rescue Korea from chaos.

Headache Powders: Use Your Head

BY LEONARD ENGEL

TWO out of three Americans are said to get headaches a dozen times a year or more, and 10,000,000 to suffer from chronic headaches, often of the severest kind. Whatever the validity of these figures, the drug industry finds our aching heads a good thing, worth almost $100,000,000 a year in sales; headache remedies are second only to laxatives among over-the-counter (no prescription required) drugs. Unfortunately, many of the headache preparations on the market are far from innocuous, many more are unscrupulously promoted, and most are overpriced.

Needless to say, the right way to deal with headaches, especially if they occur frequently, is to find and treat the cause—a job for a physician. Headaches may be a sign of such serious disorders as the malignant type of high blood pressure, eclampsia (toxemia of pregnancy), brain tumor, meningitis, encephalitis, and head injury. They may also have an infinity of other causes. Emotional tension and allergy are often involved, both in ordinary headaches and in migraine. Eye strain and poor posture can bring on a headache, and so can menstrual difficulties and constipation. Colds, fever, sinusitis, and neuralgia are commonly accompanied by an aching head. And, of course, a headache may be the price of what copy-writers like to call "over-indulgence."

The best-known, most widely used medicine for occasional headaches and other minor pains is aspirin; yet few people are aware of the most important fact about it. This is simply that aspirin is aspirin, no matter what the ads may say. The next time you shop for aspirin, ask for it without specifying the brand. If the clerk is reasonably honest, he will offer you a choice of half a dozen brands ranging in price from 20 to 85 cents for a bottle of 100 tablets, and when you ask what's the difference, he will reply "none whatever." What he says is literally true. Aspirin is an "official" drug, that is, it is listed in the United States Pharmacopeia. Under the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act of 1938 drugs so listed, or drugs with similar names, must conform to the Pharmacopeia standard. All brands of aspirin, in other words, must be and are the same.

LEONARD ENGEL is a writer on scientific subjects whose articles appear frequently in The Nation.

Ninety per cent of the aspirin sold in the United States is produced by two chemical companies, Dow and Monsanto. Most "aspirin manufacturers" merely buy the stuff in bulk from one or the other, sometimes both, press it into tablets, and bottle it. There is nothing unethical in this, but it shows how ridiculous is the claim of high-priced brands to special merits.

Aspirin is one of the safest drugs known, although large doses may interfere with the coagulation mechanism of the blood, and a few individuals get a rash if they take any aspirin at all. On the other hand, it provides only a modest amount of relief. When something more potent is needed, physicians usually prefer a preparation known as APC or AAC compound, a mixture of aspirin, caffeine, and a coal-tar derivative named phenacetin or acetophenitidin. APC is a standard preparation, available under many different brand names—such as Empirin and Anacin. Being more potent than aspirin, APC preparations are not so safe, though they are less dangerous than many other headache concoctions currently offered the public. Directions on the label should be followed carefully.

Many headache remedies are based on acetanilid or antipyrine, two coal-tar derivatives discovered in Germany sixty or seventy years ago. At about the same time the Germans discovered two other coal-tar products, aminopyrine and cincophen, which were used as pain-killers for several decades. Though harmless enough in small, occasional doses, they were highly toxic when taken over a long period or in large amounts. Both were finally eliminated from over-the-counter drugs. Acetanilid and antipyrine are not much safer but are still in use. If taken too frequently or in too large quantities, they can lead to digestive and skin disorders and even to more serious ailments and death.

IN ANOTHER dangerous group of drugs found in many headache remedies are sodium, potassium, and ammonium bromides. The bromides were formerly used in epilepsy—they have been superseded by far more effective agents—and are still prescribed occasionally as sedatives. If taken too often they tend to cause rather than relieve headaches, leading the user to take ever larger doses. The result may be addiction, skin eruptions, digestive disturbances, or mental derangement—ending perhaps in delirium, coma, and death.

About a dozen years ago the Food and Drug Administration seized shipments of Bromo-Seltzer, an acetanilid-bromide headache remedy put out by the Emerson Drug Company of Baltimore. Emerson indignantly denied that its product was unsafe, but the F. D. A. won in court, and Emerson was compelled to cut the quantities of acetanilid and bromides in Bromo-Seltzer and to print a strong warning on the label pointing out, among other things, that Bromo-Seltzer is "not for use by those having kidney or other organic disease, unless advised by physician." Bromo-Seltzer is now probably safe enough for occasional use, provided the label warning is kept in mind. Not all who use the drug, though, see the warning, since Bromo-Seltzer is dispensed at soda fountains. To reach all users, a warning should be incorporated in the ads. Drug advertising, however, is within the jurisdiction of the Federal Trade Commission rather than the F. D. A., thanks to the efforts of the drug lobby when the Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act was debated.

During the war the F. T. C. filed complaints against five manufacturers of headache remedies, charging them with misrepresenting in their ads not only the merits but the safety of their products. "Respondent's advertisements," the F. T. C. declared in one complaint, "contain no warning or statement revealing the potential danger of the excessive use of its preparation with respect to either the dosage or frequency of use, and such failure may lead the public to believe that the preparation may be safely taken in such amounts and with such frequency as may be necessary to accomplish the represented and desired results." None of the five pointed out, the commission added, that their preparations were particularly dangerous for children. One of the five was Emerson. The other four and their products were the BC Remedy Company (BC Headache Powders, containing acetanilid and bromides), Stanback Company (Stanback Headache Powders, acetanilid and bromides), Capudine Chemical Company (Hick's Capudine, antipyrine and potassium bromide), and Miles Laboratories (Dr. Miles' Nervine, a triple bromide preparation, and Dr. Miles' Anti-Pain Pills, containing acetanilid).

After lengthy hearings the F. T. C. told BC and Stanback in 1946 that their ads would have to mention the acetanilid and bromides in their products. Both companies elected instead to eliminate the two ingredients from their formulas, and agreed further that the F. T. C. could issue cease-and-desist orders without new hearings if either were ever used again.

Hearings in the other cases dragged on until last year. Then, just as they were to go to trial examiners for decision, the F. T. C. turned around and settled them by stipulation (agreement with the defendants). None was compelled to make any vital disclosures in its ads. Emerson and Capudine were merely required to make minor changes in their claims and to include in their ads the innocuous phrase, "Follow the label—avoid excessive use." Miles, which had delayed the proceedings with a court suit contending that the F. D. A., not the F. T. C., had jurisdiction over drug ads, had to use the same phrase. In recent ads that I have seen, this cautionary statement is well buried in the text.

It still seems to be all right to pass on to the ultimate consumer the headache over headache remedies.

ROCK

There is stone in me that knows stone,
Substance of rock that remembers the unending unending
Simplicity of rest
While scorching suns and ice-ages
Pass over rock face swiftly as days.
In the longest time of all come the rock's changes,
Slowest of rhythms, the pulsations
That raise from the planet's core the mountain ranges
And weather them down to sand on the sea's floor.

Endures in me record of rock's duration.
My ephemeral substance lay in the veins of the earth from the beginning,

Patient for its release, not questioning
When, when will come the flowering, the flowing,
The pulsing, the awakening, the taking wing,
The long longed-for night of the bridegroom's coming.

There is stone in me that knows stone
Whose sole state is stasis,
While the slow cycle of the stars whirls a world of rock
Through light-years where in nightmare I fall crying
"Must I travel fathomless distance for ever and ever?"

All that is in me on the rock replies,
"For ever, if it must be; be, and be still, endure."

KATHLEEN RAINE

The Problem of Greece

GREECE: AMERICAN DILEMMA AND OPPORTUNITY. By L. S. Stavrianos. Henry Regnery Company. $3.25.

PERPLEXED Americans can find no better paradigm by which to assess their responsibilities and interests in areas under American influence than the experience of Greece. Modern like ancient Greece provides an ideal laboratory specimen; volume is limited, contributory factors are susceptible of isolation and scrutiny, and remoteness facilitates objectivity. Hence if the dilemma and opportunity of Professor Stavrianos's title are valid for Greece, the analysis and program he offers may be applicable to wider areas also.

Stavrianos's indictment of American policy in Greece has a familiar-enough ring. Our intervention has done nothing to solve the problems which necessitated intervention—and which, unsolved, must continue to necessitate it—but has only maintained in power an utterly selfish and corrupt clique indifferent to their country's welfare, quick to use terrorism, and certain to fall as soon as American financial and military support is withdrawn. We have made substantial contributions in improving communications, controlling malaria, keeping starving people alive, and insisting upon Liberal Party representation in the government, but these ameliorations leave Greece's desperate social and economic unbalance virtually untouched; because our policy has never envisaged the rectification of this unbalance it has been doomed from the start and cannot secure even the strategic goal which is its object. The army and the administrative machinery have remained firmly in the same rightist hands in which the British placed them at the end of the war, and the present political leadership, even with a Liberal Party façade, is utterly incapable of initiating the thoroughgoing reforms essential for reorganizing the country's economy and exploiting its resources so as to employ its surplus population and raise the shockingly low standard of living. Rehabilitation of war damage is not enough. Greece's economic and social ill health was chronic long before the war, and led to the harsh dictatorship of Metaxas in 1936. During the war the leftist resistance movement called E. A. M. gave the parts of Greece it controlled, according to E. A. M.'s friends, the most efficient and equitable government they had ever enjoyed; and the disappointment of the high hopes raised by it, the intensification of the economic stringency occasioned by the loss of foreign markets for Greek tobacco and other meager exports, and the reversion to a government very like that of Metaxas in political coloring and techniques have brought the chronic malady to a critical point. No government which does not attack the ills at their root can survive without repression, and no repression can succeed without outside support.

Why have we committed our mistakes? Perhaps the most useful aspect of Stavrianos's book is his account of how, step by step, our policy came to be what it is, so that if we refuse to believe that our officials have been blind we need not assume that our policy has been wise. If there is a villain in the piece it is Winston Churchill, who set the policy of using only the extreme right, even before liberation, and of thwarting every honest effort put forth by moderates. Churchill's policy was continued, without perceptible change, by the Labor government, until, in February, 1947, the British acknowledged their failure and withdrew from Greece. To keep Greece from falling into the Soviet orbit the vacuum had to be filled, but America lost its unique opportunity for making a thorough house-cleaning the condition of its support, and instead, by the terms of the Truman Doctrine, actually outbid British intransigence. The civil war which followed must be kept in mind in any calculation of Greece's probable contribution in any future war. The rebels were too numerous and their determination too great for their movement to be ascribed to a hard core of Communists inspired from abroad. Formidable resistance flared up even in the traditionally conservative Peloponnese, which had no contact with Communist regimes to the north of Greece, large sections of the regular Greek army refused to fight against their brethren and were interned, and though the insurgents undoubtedly received assistance from the north, the Greek government had to use far larger numbers and far more lavish equipment to subdue its rebels than the Germans had used to curb the E. A. M. resistance during the war.

The accuracy of Stavrianos's estimate of the past is vouched for both by his meticulous documentation and by the actual course of events. The one crucial question upon which opinions must always differ is the extent to which E. A. M. was committed to world communism, and hence the degree of likelihood that if it were not suppressed it would bring Greece into the Russian orbit. The best objective evidence of E. A. M.'s good faith is its conduct before the bloody civil war of December, 1944. It welcomed the token British force, retired from Athens, and actually began demobilization, until it was moved to resistance by outrageous provocation. But even if the Communist core of E. A. M. were committed to the Russian program, it remains true that they could have been countered more effectively by using their rivals of the socialist and democratic parties than by relying on their polar opposites.

It is in its optimism for the future that Stavrianos's book may arouse greater skepticism. His solution is that we encourage a truly centrist government, free it from the hamstringing incubus of rightist army and administrative direction, and give our full support to a program of fundamental reform. If such a program had been adopted from the start, civil war—which Stavrianos thinks is otherwise bound to recur—would have been averted, Greece would have been made into a model exhibit of democracy in action, and at far less cost than the two billions we have spent we should have had reliable allies instead of a sullen population that speaks of the American "occupation."

Greece's economy can indubitably be greatly improved, and numberless commissions of experts have projected programs for fuller exploitation of its resources, but it is hard to see how Greece could ever approach the satellites' rich agricultural and mineral potential. The problem of finding new political leadership seems no less difficult. The polarization instigated by both right and left and crystallized by British and American policy has left the center bare. The "liberal" parties of today are indistinguishable from the right; the meaninglessness of labels is now illustrated by the fact that Papagos can be heralded as a liberal. We should have resolutely to face the cries of "Communist" that would greet the newcomers we would countenance and the measures they would introduce. These measures might indeed emulate some of those taken in the Soviet satellites to the north, but unless we blunder Greece will not itself veer over to Russia. Greek national pride is too strong, and even its doctrinaire Communists have been twice disillusioned by Stalin—when for his own ends he surrendered them to Churchill, and when for his own ends he forbade their necessary contacts with Tito during the civil war of 1948.

But all difficulties must be faced. Our present approach, deriving from the traditions of the British Foreign Office which the British have themselves abandoned, has been proved futile; the social and economic situation in Greece is explosive and gathering steam; we may still, and therefore we must, channel the forces of change in a direction profitable to ourselves as well as to Greece and the world. Stavrianos's expert knowledge and patent sincerity command respect. If he makes no secret of his partisanship, he offers justification for it that is always plausible and at most points convincing. Because of its geographical position the problem of Greece possesses very great importance for us in itself, and perhaps equally great importance as a pattern for our policy in other areas; a thoughtfully presented view which differs from that upon which our present policy is based deserves attention.

Mr. Brooks's History

THE CONFIDENT YEARS: 1885-1915. By Van Wyck Brooks. E. P. Dutton and Company. $6.

THE CONFIDENT YEARS" brings to a close Mr. Brooks's five-volume "history of the writer in America." The virtues and shortcomings of Mr. Brooks's method have by now been thoroughly canvassed, and "The Confident Years" provokes no novel reflections on that score. The same skill in evocation recreates the latter-day milieu of American literary life—the physical and social scene, the components of the intellectual climate—as freshly as for the earlier years; it is an art which, as Mr. Brooks notes with allowable asperity, "critics who totally lack it have always disparaged." The same sense of discovery, or of sharing one's own discoveries, is aroused as Mr. Brooks's sensibility responds to the particular note of some half-forgotten book of minor worth or a minor genre and sketches its claims on us. And the same evasion, finally, of literature in its major aspects, of the work of literature as an autonomous entity, disappoints the expectations which these artfully composed backgrounds, these passing felicities of appreciation, awaken in us. As in the other volumes the most successfully presented figures are those of lesser writers or writers of only quasi-literary interest—the chapters of “The Confident Years” which seem best to encompass their subjects are on O. Henry and H. L. Mencken—and the implied claim for American accomplishment never quite realizes itself by bringing into focus the end product, the achieved work of art, by which the claim stands or falls. It would be grossly unjust to Mr. Brooks’s series to say that it is an admirably arranged museum of Americana; yet it too often comes too close to being just that.

What Mr. Brooks intends the series to be is disclosed in the last chapter of “The Confident Years.” This Forward Glance is an affirmation of American literature as an expression of the Enlightenment, a restatement, developed with less intemperance of manner and greater dialectical skill, of Mr. Brooks’s old case against T. S. Eliot and the prevailing alienation of the literary mind from the set of ideas at the core of the American experience. In the dialectics of debate Mr. Brooks thrusts shrewdly enough, as I have said, at the paradoxes of Eliot’s position, and he is on firm-enough ground, one feels, in the supposition underlying his argument that the present crisis of the Enlightenment is a crisis of growing pains and not of senility—the more severe in America in so far as America has given itself more wholly than Europe to the chiliastic beliefs that the Enlightenment, like early Christianity, is in the process of sloughing off.

But Mr. Eliot as an ideologue is after all not very difficult to dispose of, and shrewdly and tellingly as Mr. Brooks at times puts his case against the defectors from the liberal-democratic tradition, his own relationship to that tradition is hardly a forceful or compelling one. In the end, in fact, his attitude seems to be that of rather thin nostalgia for the brave days of “Jean Christophe,” the “confident years,” in short, of his own pre-World War I youth: “If the abcess of the world-war time were to break in a world-peace instead of in world-destruction,” he writes, “what shouts of jubilation then would rise from a renaissance world.” This mood is as little relevant in a central way to a revaluation of the liberal-democratic tradition as Mr. Eliot’s prescription of a Coleridgean “clerisy” and, if one may put it so, a good deal less amusing. As a piece of cultural history Mr. Brooks’s series is in its way a unique achievement, but as an interpretation of American literature and of the American mind this closing volume sharpens one’s sense of its shortcomings. The Two Germanys

THE EASTERN ZONE AND SOVIET POLICY IN GERMANY, 1945-1950. By J. P. Nettl. Oxford University Press. $5.50.

OUR GERMAN POLICY: PROPAGANDA AND CULTURE. By Albert Norman. Vantage Press. $2.50.

UNDER the flood of news reports and arguments about the West German Republic, now courted as an ally in the defense of Western Europe, it is easy to forget that Germany is not one, but two, and that the other, Soviet-controlled Germany is at one and the same time a pawn of Soviet policy and a quarrelsome Siamese twin of the Adenauer republic. As the two republics grapple with each for leadership of the frustrated urge to national unity, their struggle is a reminder that Germany again has a potential freedom of choice between two basic orientations and that coexistence of two worlds means a prolonged coexistence of two mutually hostile and rival Germanys.

The nature and potential of that “other” Germany have been clarified by J. P. Nettl’s thoughtful and well-documented study, the best available. Avoiding dramatic conclusions and, indeed, clinging to a somewhat drab style of understatement, Nettl implicitly warns Western students and planners of policy against regarding the East German “people’s republic” as a negligible or non-existent factor. And while he throws much new light on the basic contradictions in Soviet policy, his analysis also carries with it a caution against the over-facile assumption that the Russians may somehow be jockeyed into giving up their domination over their third of Germany.

What are the plus signs, in power terms, for Soviet policy in East Germany? By a drastic land reform, carried out while the Germans were completely disorganized and benumbed by defeat, the traditional class of large landowners was uprooted and a broad redistribution of the land was effected. If East Germany lagged far behind the western republic in recovering production and living standards after 1948, it also avoided the extremes of economic despair through which the West Germans passed between the defeat and 1948. The East German transition from one totalitarian system to another was, unfortunately, less painful in some respects than the far greater change to a widening range of democratic choices and responsibilities in the western zones.

In Nettl’s opinion this relentless erection of a new totalitarian regime was based on a carefully predetermined Soviet plan of action. However, from his own evidences of conflicting Soviet aims and interests it can be argued with considerable force that the outward appearances of careful planning may derive from the fact that, when confronted with choices to be made, Soviet policy-makers were conditioned to make decisions which copied or reinforced that system of power which was familiar to them. For example, Nettl documents in considerable detail the difficulties which faced the Soviet leaders in deciding between removing capital equipment and taking larger reparations out of current production, between extending direct Soviet ownership of industry and manipulating the terms of trade. If the Soviet representatives had been operating on a longer-range plan, they would have found many advantages in postponing the fusion of the Communist and Social Democratic parties, as occurred in Poland and Hungary.

Nettl’s carefully buttressed conclusions, which have to be mined out of the context by the reader, are important. The Soviet government has acquired a valuable colony in East Germany and will not abandon its prize except to grasp at the even greater resources of West Germany. Moreover, despite removals which total some 20 per cent of the total product, the Soviet authorities can bring about a gradual improvement in that sector which serves the German population, so that the West cannot rely in perpetuity on the superior attractiveness of its living standards. Contrary to a widespread assumption, both East and West Germany have adjusted their economies quite well to getting along without the other. The Soviet government realizes that the eastern zone is the most anti-Soviet region of Germany, except for a part of the youth, and must therefore maintain the rule of a stooge party which would disintegrate under conditions of genuine political freedom. On balance the Soviet zone makes important contributions to the economy of the Soviet sphere and provides a potent but not decisive leverage in the politics of Germany as a whole.

"Our German Policy: Propaganda and Culture," by Albert Norman, is a brief account, by an interested and observant staff member, of the efforts of the American occupation authorities, in 1945-46, to promote the growth of democratically oriented press, publishing, radio, motion-picture, and theater services in their zone. It gives credit for many sensible constructive steps which were taken by the improvised administrators of the occupation, and makes clear the confusion of purposes with which the United States approached the task of German reconstruction. While Norman barely touches on the basic question of whether "democratization" can be injected from without or merely encouraged to grow from within, he has given a frank and modest picture of the problems which faced the occupiers in the fields of education and information.

PHILIP B. MOSELY

That the twilight of the gods of culture had set in was made plain to our author when the Nazis separated him from his library and hunted him from pillar to post.

We first meet him during his Viennese exile, just as his boxes of books are miraculously restored to him. His "lost library" is clearly a choice cross-section of the standard bibliothèque of the European cultured classes before 1933. As he unpacks his precious volumes one by one, he gives free rein to nostalgic memories suggested by the work and author in question, not to mention related works, coteries, critics, traditions, and movements up and down the centuries. Thus we learn that Mr. Mehring has been a prodigious reader of everything censored and uncensored in Western prose or verse, and that he has something pointed or piquant to say about all the famous authors from Goethe to Thomas Mann and about all the infamous authors from the Marquis de Sade to James Joyce. At times "The Lost Library" is in danger of becoming a "Who's Who" of the world's literature. But the author regales us with such a brilliant flow of anecdotes, comment, satire, mockery, and acute observation that we are hugely entertained, even to the point of forgetting that his reminiscences are held together by the theme of "Alas, poor Yorick!" The lost library becomes a symbol of the lost European culture which Mr. Mehring dearly loves and which he fears will soon be as dead as Newton's rectilinear universe.

In spite of its vein of pessimism, "The Lost Library" is a witty, entertaining, and instructive book. The author has had the good fortune to get two excellent translators to introduce his first prose work to the American public.

MIRACLE IN MILAN." A sentimental documentary fable about loving that neighbor, set in a hobo jungle beside the Milan railroad tracks; a grubby, inventive "My Man Godfrey" that came to America late in the year but walked away with most of the best-foreign-film awards and will doubtless delight every filmgoer who seriously believes he loves his fellow-men. It is a De Sica treatment of a Zavattini novel, featuring Francesco Golisano—a grinning, bull-like mixture of Burt Lancaster and Mussolini—as a naive orphan who turns his shanty town into a haven of fine emotions, simple pleasures, and modest comforts. Highly unenjoyable

The Lost European Culture

THE LOST LIBRARY. The Autobiography of a Culture. By Walter Mehring. Translated by Richard and Clara Winston. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $3.50.

ONCE upon a time Walter Mehring, a German poet and novelist now living in New York, owned a library, bequeathed by his father and enriched by himself. In those happy, far-off days the Kings of Steel and Oil still gave culture a pat on the back now and then. And a man might boldly carry a book down Fifth Avenue or Piccadilly without people looking askance at him as at a half-alive fossil or a ghost-writer on his last legs. Then the World Series of wars began, Hitler emerged, and as Mr. Mehring sees it, the Kremlin brought down its mailed fist and hobnailed boots on what was left of the Four Freedoms.

for its moronically oversimplified pantomime and symbolism, its fragmented and ragged structure, its exhaustive sentimentality: to wit, the forlorn thread of a dirt road (loneliness); marble-walled interiors (the idle rich); fried eggs (what the poor dream about); the falsetto operatic voice (art is pompous and pansy-like); high hats and mink coats; little capitalists being chased down the street by angry mobs; buttocks-rich shots of pseudo-Grecian statues; bums kissing bums; people counting (charmingly) on their fingers; white flags of surrender; sunsets; parades; angels. Though it has been called "the freshest movie in years"—by those who very likely applied the same phrase twenty years ago to the René Clair films which served as prototype (in the matter of high hats being blown across a lot, for instance)—"Milan" really burglarizes the repertoire of those suave, altruistic C-men (Cartier-Bresson, Chaplin, Clair, Capra) who treat the spectator as a child to be guided, taught, and disciplined.

"Rashomon." A torpid, stylish Japanese study in human frailty, like nothing so much as a tiny aquarium in which a few fish and a lot of plants have delicately been tinkered with by someone raised in Western art-cinema theaters and art galleries. Five characters, two unfrequented real-life sets—a ruined temple and a forest—and a script which is probably the first to describe a highly contrived sword-fight-and-seduction through the biased eyes of four different people. The villain is a conceited, slothful, bug-ridden bandit (Toshiro Mifune)—a type now familiar in Hollywood adventure-comedies about Mexico—who has a hard time pulling himself away from a good nap to ravish the wife of a traveling samurai. Makes its play for posterity with such carefully engineered actions as one in which the dozing barbarian scratches his crotch while the sword across his knees somehow rises (Maya Deren-fashion) as though it had just had a big meal of sex hormones. "Rashomon" is supposed to get down to the bedrock of such emotions as lust, fear, and selfishness, but actually it is a smooth and somewhat empty film whose most tiresome aspect is the slow, complacent, Louvre-conscious, waiting-for-prizes attitude of everyone who worked on it.

"I Want You." The Goldwyn stock company (Granger, Andrews, McGuire, Keith, etc.) drafted away from their side of the railroad tracks—the other side from De Sica's—for the duration of the cold war. Written by New Yorker writers Irwin Shaw and John Cheever. Much too talkative and taken up with the sad departures of drafted men; nothing more momentous in it than Mildred Natwick sweeping all her pseudo-hero husband's war mementoes off the wall. Yet good—as all Goldwyn's soap-operas are—for its sad, cautious desire to get at the haggard side of Americans by being exactly right about the stained wall-paper around picture frames, the sexless bathrobe of Mrs. Suburbia, the sullen pooped-out expression on her face, the chenille His-Her towels in the bathroom, and the fact that most of the conversation consists of tired nothings: "What'll it be?" . . . I want to say hello to George Kress. . . . Why, I'm making you rich; what're you complaining of? . . . Oh, wait a minute. . . . Why doesn't Landrum mind his own business? . . . How are things in Washington? Scary." Not even Goldwyn can keep Farley Granger from his obsequious, frightened, liver-lipped manipulation of a smile or a drag on a cigarette, but the others almost break your heart with their pinched-faced "bravery," their frozen pantomime, their ability to talk without opening their mouths.

"Behave Yourself." A tasteless, paceless, surprisingly good farce, spoofing the "Thin Man" idea of having cops, robbers, a dog, a mother-in-law, keep a young married couple (Granger again, with Shelley Winters) from going to bed together. Crammed with ultra-modern buildings, furniture, statues; shot mostly through leaves and incidental bric-a-brac. Cameraman James Wong Howe, usually an earnest documentarist, shoots a crucial murder here as if he'd been bribed by Florence Knoll. The humor is either strictly from Minsky or tied up with the décor, or both (as when the dog finds himself in a jungle of plastic mannikin legs). Best funny moment of many months is provided by the scene in which a silly egg-skulled cockney gangster (with a bullet wound in his forehead that may have been painted by Pierro della Francesca) slides down like a well-oiled banana into a colossal bubble-bath.

"The Racket." This movie had everything—Mitchum, Ryan, and today's most-talked-of subject matter. But it came out a junky, impossible bore.

"Another Man's Poison." The elevation to co-stardom (with wife Bette Davis) of the over-energetic Gary Merrill in a psychotic melodrama that left me limp, incredulous, and baffled.

"Westward the Women." Two hundred women and Robert Taylor. This is a Western?

THE superb Purcell Fantasias in three, four, and five parts are played well by the London String Trio and Aeolian Quartet (Allegro), but with more animation and more finesse in spite of the fuller sonority by a small Viennese string orchestra under Litschauer (Vanguard). The Viennese performances are better reproduced, except for the coarse brilliance of the violins on the side with the five-part and the first six four-part Fantasias; and some of the Allegro performances are too low in pitch. The Vanguard records offer also two fine Purcell Chaconnes and an effective performance of one of Beethoven's least accessible works, the Grand Fugue 133.

One of the accessible great works of his last period, the Quartet Opus 132, is given a performance by the Paganini Quartet that is in every respect first-rate (RCA Victor).

First-rate in most respects is the playing of the New Music Quartet in Beethoven's Opus 59 No. 3 (Bartok); but it has an excessive nervous tension which is disturbing even when it doesn't convert sforzatos into explosions; and the finale suffers from an attempt to play it in the impossibly fast tempo set by Beethoven's metronome-marking. From an accompanying note about the failure to obey Beethoven's metronome-markings and the resulting falsification of the music one would think it had amounted to allegros being played largo; when in fact it has amounted only to reducing them to allegros which permit the clear articulation of the music necessary for its sense. On the same record is a similar high-tension performance of Beethoven's reworking for string quartet of the not especially interesting Piano Sonata Opus 14 No. 1. With treble reduced the sound is brash in loud passages; whether the noises are solely those from the scratches on my review record I cannot say.

Two engaging early works of Beethoven, the String Trio Opus 9 No. 1 and Serenade Opus 8, are played beautifully by the Pasquier Trio; but even with minimum treble the recorded sound is not beautiful (Allegro).

Beethoven's inconsequential Trio Opus 11 for clarinet, cello and piano gets from Reginald Kell, Frank Miller, and Mieczyslaw Horszowski a fine ensemble performance which Mozart's Trio K.498 for clarinet, viola, and piano does not get from Kell, Lillian Fuchs, and Horszowski on the same record (Decca); and my guess is that it is Miller who restrains Kell, stimulates Horszowski, and integrates the playing of the three in the Beethoven piece. That guess is based on all the playing I have heard Miller do, which has led me to the opinion that he is one of the greats among the ensemble musicians of today. His tone hasn't the rich sensuous beauty of Leonard Rose's, but has a tensile strength which makes possible the exciting continuity in a sustained legato phrase, and even in a series of plucked bass notes; with this continuous life there is also extraordinary refinement and elegance of style; and in addition to everything else there is the feeling for ensemble performance that seems to carry other musicians with it. The Beethoven piece is excellently reproduced; the Mozart is not; surfaces are gritty.

Another of the superb Budapest Quartet performances of the period when Roisman was in good form and Alexander Schneider was second violin—this one of Schubert's great Quintet Opus 163, with Benar Heifetz playing second cello—has been issued on LP (Columbia), its sound now free of the defects of the 78 rpm version, and wholly agreeable even without the warmth and radiance of the Victor recording of Beethoven's Opus 132.

The sound is in fact more agreeable than that of the beautiful performance of Schumann's Piano Quintet recorded by the Budapest Quartet of today with Curzon (Columbia), which has an excessively sharp distinctness that sharpens the edge on Roisman's tone.

C. P. E. Bach's Chromatic Fantasy for harpsichord is interesting, but his Trio in B flat and W. F. Bach's Sonata in F are not; the performances by Lois Schaefer, flute, Robert Brink, violin, and Daniel Pinkham, harpsichord, are good (Allegro).

I would skip the Loewenguth Quartet's coarse-grained performance of Mozart's K.457 (Decca), and the Aeolian Quartet's pedestrian performances of K.575 and 590 (Allegro).

As the first volume in its Archives of Recorded Music UNESCO has issued "L'Oeuvre de Frédéric Chopin" (Paris: Editions de La Revue Disques), a compilation without evaluation, under the direction of Armand Panigel, of all the recordings of Chopin's works, including those no longer available.

On the other hand the Music Library Association (c/o Music Division, Library of Congress) has assembled from the December 1948 to September 1950 issues of its quarterly magazine, Notes, the summaries of record reviews by Kurtz Myers, and published them as "Cumulated Index of Record Reviews." I would say a considerable number of the evaluations aren't worth anyone's attention; and the summarizing is done with a few symbols that are not always adequate.

Otto Erich Deutsch, who assembled all the available documentary material on Schubert in "The Schubert Reader," has issued an equally valuable "Schubert Thematic Catalogue" (Norton; $8.50), listing and dating the works in chronological order, with single-stave incipits, information about manuscripts and editions, and so on. I find inadequacies and inconsistencies in the incipits; but they don't amount to a major defect.

R. D. Darrell, who compiled the first "Gramophone Shop Encyclopedia of Recorded Music," has now produced "Schirmer's Guide to Books on Music and Musicians" ($6), an excellent volume of the same kind—one which answers the question whether a book exists, but not the question whether it is worth reading.

Letters to the Editors

Witch-Hunt Victim

Dear Sirs: I am one of the many victims of the current loyalty purge who will receive no hearing except that which you can provide for me by publishing this letter. I am a tenth-generation American whose Puritan ancestors fled from England in 1635 because they dissented from the state religion of that country. I am also an economist who received an unusually costly education, including five years of full-time post-graduate university work, and was later awarded a two-year post-doctoral Carnegie fellowship at Columbia University. Since then my life has been devoted to university teaching, government work, and writing. In 1948, at the age of forty-four and after eight years of federal employment, I retired from a $10,000 position to devote my full time to writing a book on price theory, now almost completed. When I returned to Washington a few months ago to seek reemployment with the government, I was denied a position, not on the ground of reasonable doubt as to my loyalty but, literally, on the ground that there was a reasonable doubt as to whether there was a reasonable doubt as to my loyalty. In other words, the loyalty probers of the agency where I found an opening (OPS) could not make up their minds in two months' time, and my prospective chief had to hire someone else because he could wait no longer. This experience will, of course, make it extremely difficult if not impossible for me ever to secure another federal position, and universities will be equally reluctant to employ a person of doubtful loyalty. There is almost nowhere else for an economist with my experience to work. Such penalties are imposed every day of the week upon American citizens who have no hearing and no recourse. I cannot even appeal to the review procedures of the Civil Service Commission, for no appealable decision on my loyalty has been reached.

So far my case is typical of thousands of others, most of which are not even listed in the official statistics on the number of persons suspended or discharged on loyalty grounds (I was not suspended or discharged). I would like to add some information as to my political beliefs, perhaps the real grounds for the charges of disloyalty. For thirty years I have been a democratic Fabian Socialist. Like many Republicans and professors of social science, I believe our country, like Western Europe, is moving slowly but steadily towards democratic socialism. Unlike the Republicans, I approve of this trend. . . .

Since I am a Fabian Socialist and consider the American Socialist Party ineffective, I have actively worked and campaigned for the Democratic Party, when not in federal employment, since 1933. In 1934 I was a leader in my home city in the Democratic campaign of that year and was elected a member of the Los Angeles County Democratic Central Committee. In 1938 I managed the primary Congressional campaign in Pasadena for an able Democratic state assemblyman, Elmer Lore. In 1940 I was the official Pasadena Roosevelt-Wallace campaign manager. To these and other Democratic Party campaigns I gave hundreds of dollars and devoted hundreds of days of time, including weeks of door-to-door bell ringing. In 1944, when I was a federal employee, my mother was a delegate to the National Democratic Convention, where she voted for Harry Truman. I myself am a warm admirer of our President, and shall vote for him again regardless of the outcome of my case. I blame Republican McCarthyism, not Truman, for the great injustice to most of those charged with disloyalty.

There are other pertinent facts in my case which any fair-minded judge or jury would consider. The four books I have had published on economic and social theory during the past twenty years all contain clear evidence that I am not a Communist. One of them, called "Total War" (1943), is, in my humble opinion, the best available guide to the all-out economic mobilization which would be required in a war with Soviet Russia.

While I have of course been given no hearing, or even an interview, on the charges against me, I have heard in a round-about way of one, and only one, charge—namely, that I traveled to Russia in 1939 with a group of Communist sympathizers. Actually, I have never been to Russia, a fact I regret rather than feel proud of. In 1939 I hoped to go, and made all arrangements, but changed my mind. The record of the passport and visa granted me in 1939 is presumably the evidence on which I am accused of the serious offense of desiring to see for myself how communism works in Russia. I remember nothing concerning the Intourist tour I planned to take, but this may of course have included Soviet sympathizers. The only other possible basis for charges that I am a Communist is that I once (1935) learned to read Russian, read some Communist books and magazines, and attended meetings addressed by Communist speakers. As a life-long student I regret that I did so little of this, for science requires the study of arguments and evidence on both sides of every issue. Nine out of ten American writers on Soviet Russia simply don't know what they are talking about, and I fear I still belong in this group. To regard study of communism as evidence of Communist sympathies is one of the crudest errors of our loyalty probers, an error which may result in disastrous ignorance of our enemy in World War III and even help to bring about this war.

I am in a position to reveal the questioning of my loyalty and the damning facts upon which it may be based only because I have a small private income. The vast majority of those who have been similarly treated dare not reveal their misfortune because this would make future employment still more uncertain. I speak, therefore, for thousands who are voiceless. For them more than for myself I protest against the vicious practice of questioning a man's loyalty and denying him federal employment without a hearing and on such grounds as former study of communism or Soviet Russia, the malicious testimony of discharged servants, and the intolerance of some religious and political opponents.

Dear Howard:

I have just finished SPARTACUS. It's a terrific book, the best you've done, in my opinion. A true symbol of the world toiler now and in all past times. All the while I read it I kept seeing contemporary figures, modern Ciceros, ward heelers in Washington, the cities of today and the servile revolt of the present period now on a world scale.

I feel that this is the book of yours most durable and with most universal appeal, because it can be read anywhere and fit any of the countries of the epoch of imperialism.

Also I think you've done a radiant job of using the materials that have come down to us on Spartacus. Of using the actual materials and actual characters of the period and making them understandable in terms of both then and now. Your handling of Negro and Jewish and Nordic white symbolization was beautifully done, pertinent not only for the American scene but having worldwide color-national connotations.

This is a book I chewed up clause by clause, like a meal. It has to be read that way to get its full historic and contemporary meaning.

I feel sure that the world's progressives will, with time, regard this story as the one most symbolical of the long struggle of labor. It has beauty, mature style, and hits the philosophic bull's-eye of life itself.

I would take heart, if I were you, in the knowledge of having done an enduring and highly symbolical work of art, and the way in which you have struck out, in publishing SPARTACUS yourself, is an act itself of a literary Spartacus.

May I express my admiration.

Sincerely,

Earl Conrad.

THE above is a letter from a friend of mine, a fine and brave writer in his own right. You can understand that I read his letter with great pride and considerable happiness. And here, briefly, is the story of the book he refers to:

The book was written—with some gaps and diversions—over a period of a year and a half. It was finished in June of 1951, and submitted in the same month to my regular publisher, Little, Brown and Company. The editor-in-chief, Angus Cameron, read the manuscript immediately, and wrote to me:

"It is a novel we can publish with pride and with the gamble that it will do better than The Proud and the Free. . . I congratulate you."

He told me a few days later that the editorial staff agreed with him, and that in his opinion, I had written my best book. He told me that Little, Brown and Company would publish it.

But a month later, I learned that Mr. Cameron had been forced to resign from Little, Brown and Company. I also learned that they would not publish Spartacus.

Whereupon, I submitted the manuscript to six other publishers; not to every publisher, but to six others. After all, it was not a first novel. Nineteen years ago, I had published my first; this was my twelfth.

Three of the publishers would not even read the manuscript. Three rejected it flatly. This I considered sufficient indication of how the wind blew, and rather than spend the next five years in endless submissions, I decided to publish it myself.

I had no money with which to publish a book, but I had friends and I knew that over ten million people in America had read my books. I wrote to these friends. I asked them to buy in advance, sight unseen, a novel called Spartacus, which I would publish if and when enough of them sent me five dollars for a subscription to it. It was a strange offer on my part, and I got a strange response.

Over fifteen hundred people sent me five dollar bills and checks. Not only did I receive enough money to send them copies of the five-dollar edition, but their faith and their kindness made it possible for me to publish a cheap edition for mass distribution.

I am not good at writing advertising, nor do I think I can hire anyone to write the sort of advertising I need. What Earl Conrad says about my book is important because it comes out of his own experience and struggle—and I think little that does not come out of such a source can have real importance in telling anyone else about a book. I know a woman who works very hard and who has worked very hard for most of her life, and who has had to face the stubborn and bitter things of life most directly and unequivocally. A few days ago I received a letter from her which said:

It is 12 midnight Sunday night and I have finished reading SPARTACUS. It has left me with a wonderful feeling of the wholeness and rightness of the simple things that I love and of the complete justness of fighting for the 20th Century freedom you and I are aspiring to.

I haven't the ability to criticize your book in a literary fashion. All I know is that I love what you have written, I love how you have written it, and love what it will accomplish in bringing us nearer to that world of peace and equality of man that Spartacus and men of similar mold have endeavored to bring about.

I do not think that more than this could be said or should be said. My problem now is to find out whether people will go out of their way to buy and read this book. I am asking you to do so, to write me at Box 171, Planetarium Station, New York 24, N. Y., and send me $2.50 in cash, money order or check, for a copy of Spartacus. The book will be sent to you immediately.

The Shape of Things

THE PRESIDENT'S ECONOMIC REPORT TO Congress added little really new although it elaborated many of the points made in his State of the Union Message. Again Mr. Truman emphasized the "great gains in our basic economic strength," gains which, assuming military security has been achieved and peace thereby preserved, would make possible "a material well-being never known before." This promise of jam tomorrow was presented as compensation for a cut in butter today which need not be very severe. Combating the arguments of those who have questioned our ability to carry the load of rearmament, the report pointed out that in terms of 1951 dollars the growth of production goods and services since 1947 exceeded the total cost of the national-security program last year. Since a further 5 per cent increase in national output is a reasonable expectation in 1952, we should be able to cover the contemplated large additions to the defense program while maintaining at least 1947 living standards. The implication of all this is that a pay-as-we-go policy, which the President urged strongly last year, would be feasible without undue sacrifice. Unfortunately, Mr. Truman now seems to have abandoned this objective. Facing a prospective deficit of $16,000,000,000 in 1952-53, he is asking Congress for additional revenue amounting to only $5,000,000,000, and even this modest request is couched in terms that suggest he is resigned to a refusal. The almost certain consequence, as Keith Hutchison pointed out last week, is increased inflationary pressure, which, even if held to manageable proportions, must mean serious maladjustments of the economy and much greater inequalities of sacrifice than would be necessary if the Administration and the Congress united in balancing the budget.

MR. CHURCHILL'S ADDRESS TO CONGRESS WAS undoubtedly a succès d'estime; it is less sure whether, to use David Lawrence's phrase, "he made a sale." Senators and Representatives of all shades of opinion praised the speech as a performance, but many seem to have steeled themselves against being persuaded by it. When the Prime Minister's words confirmed their own convictions—for instance, his appeal to the United States to preserve its atomic supremacy—they drew loud cheers; but an expressive silence greeted his suggestion of stronger American support for Britain in Egypt. From the British point of view Mr. Churchill's visit to Washington has, perhaps, achieved one of its major objectives—an improvement in the atmosphere—and one of its secondary purposes—an increase in steel shipments to Britain; but taken as a whole it appears to have been a limited success. On his return home, Mr. Churchill is certain to be criticized for giving away too much for too little. Already upset by the way Washington has exerted pressure on the Japanese government to agree to a treaty with the Chinese Nationalists—a move with dangerous economic and political implications—Britons are definitely alarmed by the Prime Minister's expression of support for Washington's Formosa policy and his implied promise to back up an extension of the Korean war if the armistice talks break down. The advantages of "increasing harmony" between British and American policy in the Far East are well understood in England but wholehearted unison with the American orchestra will be difficult to achieve until its brass sections are toned down.

IF GENERAL EISENHOWER WAS SKEPTICAL about President Truman's warning that a political career would expose him to rotten eggs, tomatoes, and dirt, he now has had a first taste of what it means to enter the Presidential sweepstakes. The Taft forces are out to get the Republican nomination by fair means or foul. According to David Ingalls, Taft's spokesman at the San Francisco meeting of the Republican National Committee, Eisenhower is merely a "good-looking mortician" who if nominated would preside over the Grand Old Party's last rites. The ruthlessness and venom with which Taft's champions flailed out at Eisenhower won some sympathy at San Francisco for the General's spokesman, Senator Lodge. A little earlier, similar tactics had drawn from Governor Warren of California a warning that those who live by the sword eventually die by the sword. But none of this means that Taft's blitz will not work. If Eisenhower refuses to take off his uniform and come home to campaign before the Republican convention next July 7, Taft will be the only potential winner who can give authoritative promises to Republican politicians hungry for patronage, the only front-running candidate who can make solid deals and change his tactics from day

AN EISENHOWER SUPPORTER SIGHED WITH relief after the San Francisco meeting had ended and somberly suggested to reporters that "for amateurs" the General's group had "done all right." What he meant, presumably, is that the Eisenhower battalions had escaped encirclement, at least for the moment, by Taft's heavy columns. But Eisenhower's candidacy is not aided, among independents, by the ponderous efforts of Arthur Krock, in the New York Times, to prove that the people really know all they need to know about the General's views on domestic policy—and that these views, if we understand what Krock is talking about, are considerably to the right of Robert Alphonso Taft's.

TWO OFFICIAL DECISIONS HANDED DOWN recently in Germany have an ominous ring. In one case three Jewish merchants of Polish nationality had been brought before a Berlin city court. The details of the case are of no interest, but the following statement in the sentence is worth recording. "The three defendants are Jewish merchants of Polish nationality. . . . One of the aggravating circumstances against the defendants is the fact that they are foreigners. As such they enjoy the hospitality of Berlin and they have badly abused it. . . . Also to be considered aggravating is the fact that the defendants are Jews." In the second case the widow of Colonel Count Marogna-Redwitz was informed by the Bureau of Finance in Munich that her pension was to be stopped because her husband had been sentenced to death for high treason—the Colonel had been involved in the unsuccessful attempt to overthrow Hitler in July, 1944. This is apparently still considered a major crime by German justice in the year 1952. Those who remember the anti-democratic decisions of German courts and administrative authorities under the Weimar Republic will surely feel: this is where we came in.

THE SCHOOL FIGHT IN ENGLEWOOD, NEW Jersey, which The Nation first brought to national attention (Our Town in Turmoil, June 16, 1951), has flared up again. At the beginning of the new year the Board of Education apparently felt that it would be expedient to yield a point to those who have been conducting a bitter campaign against the public schools of the community. Before recommending a textbook or supplementary book for general use, the superintendent must now require the teacher who is to use the book, or a committee of teachers, to certify in writing that the book does not "advocate the support of a foreign power nor of a doctrine inimical to the principles of government established by the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of the State of New Jersey, and further that it does not advocate a principle or doctrine inimical to the American system of free enterprise." The New Jersey State Federation of Teachers, affiliated with the American Federation of Teachers, has properly objected to this new burden placed upon teachers in a time of general fear and uncertainty. The regulation is not aimed, of course, at preventing the intrusion of an alien philosophy or ideology; its sponsors know perfectly well that no revolutionary doctrines are being taught in the schools of Englewood, New Jersey—one of America's wealthiest suburbs. Its purpose is doubtless to appease the reactionary minority. But the inevitable effect of the regulation will be to intimidate teachers in the exercise of their professional judgment, since their tenure can be threatened by the charges of bigots that materials they have certified do in fact advocate a doctrine "inimical to the American system of free enterprise." And just how is this phrase, we wonder, to be defined?

THE REAPPEARANCE OF MUSSOLINI'S FAMOUS paper, Il Popolo d'Italia, has aroused a good deal of surprise and indignation among those who still refuse to admit the resurgence of Italian fascism. The event, however, is only the most striking of a number of similar happenings in recent days. The list of journalists who were practicing Fascists in the Mussolini era is already a long one. Messaggero, Rome's most popular daily, is headed by Mario Missiroli, one of fascism's so-called intellectual leaders, the author of "L'Uomo Mussolini," a minor "Mein Kampf." On La Stampa are the Fascist journalists Giulio de Benedetti and Paolo Monelli. Signoretti is editor of Roma, an important Naples daily. Other newspapers and magazines, the press services, and the radio stations employ dozens of former Fascists. It is hardly too much to say that outside the small and financially weak left and liberal papers, the best journalistic plums in Italy today drop into the hats of those who can prove an impeccable pro-Fascist past. It did not take long.

ON THE DAY MRS. HARRIET MOORE DIED IN Nims, Florida—just a week after her husband Harry Moore, State N. A. A. C. P. leader, was murdered by a bomb placed in their home—a series of four weekly nation-wide radio broadcasts entitled "Florida Speaks" was launched over the far-flung Liberty network "to let the people throughout the country get the true picture of conditions down here." (For background on the Liberty network see The Nation for November 3, 1951, page 370.) Significantly, the programs originate from Station WLBE in Leesburg in Lake County, where Sheriff Willis McCall recently shot down two handcuffed Negro prisoners, Samuel Shepherd and Walter Lee Irvin, killing the former and seriously wounding the latter. The "Florida Speaks" series, according to Wendy Husebo, co-owner of WLBE, will answer "the many unfavorable stories and comments of Northern newspapers and radio stations." Speakers will include Doyle Carlton, president of the state chamber of commerce, Karl Lehman, secretary of the Lake County chamber, and W. E. Debman, author of the recent novel "Weep No More My Lady." Mrs. Moore can no longer weep or speak, but her daughter Rosalea, who narrowly escaped the blast, or Walter Irvin, who managed to cling to life by playing dead, could say a few words about conditions in Florida too.

AMONG ARAB NATIONALIST MOVEMENTS none has been more responsible and moderate than the Tunisian movement, and no nationalist leader more eminent and admired than Habib Bourguiba, head of the Neodestour Party. Ever since the end of the war Bourguiba and his followers have engaged in negotiations, punctuated by strikes, in an effort to win, not independence, but autonomy within the French Union. Early last year an agreement was reached in principle but never carried into effect. France has insisted that the European minority in Tunisia—some 300,000, half of them French—shall have as many seats in the Assembly as the 3,500,000 Tunisians. This the Bey has refused, under firm pressure from the nationalists, and in the middle of January he dispatched an appeal to the United Nations for intervention by the Security Council. The consequences could have been foreseen by anyone familiar with the old, ugly pattern of colonialism on the defensive. Invoking the state of siege proclaimed in 1939 and never rescinded, the French police ordered the dissolution of the Neodestour Party, denied it a meeting hall, and then, without warning, in true totalitarian style, seized M. Bourguiba and four of his lieutenants in their homes before dawn and carried them away to unknown places of detention.

HOW RECKLESS AND PROVOCATIVE THIS action will be shown in the days ahead. Bourguiba and his followers are not even charged with a crime. The arrests are described as a "measure of removal" to end the "systematic agitation" of the nationalist leaders. If they serve any such purpose it will be a modern miracle. A contrary result is far more probable. In Tunisia resentment and nationalist excitement will rise, hope of a settlement by negotiation will disappear, and the fever will spread across the borders. In the United Nations the Arab countries will class France with Britain as an overt enemy, and the United States will be caught in a new dilemma: how to support French control of an area essential to Western defense plans without totally and fatally alienating the Arabs. In this situation only the Russians can afford to smile.

IN OUR OPINION JOE LOUIS, FORMER WORLD heavyweight champion, lost one of the most important fights of his life when he decided to play in the San Diego open golf tournament despite the acknowledged color-line barring of another Negro, Bill Spiller. When the Professional Golf Association—sponsor of the event—announced that all non-Caucasians were to be barred from membership, Louis lashed out at such "Hitler like" action and said that he would enter the tournament. Eventually he did, but on a technicality: he is an amateur. Horton Smith, president of the P. G. A., explained that "Joe Louis, as an amateur with a Number 2 handicap, will be permitted to play under the United States Golf Association rules." Spiller, he added, since he is a professional, must abide by the P. G. A. rules. In referring to his decision to play Louis said that "you crawl before you walk." He seemed satisfied that the affair "had brought the matter before the public . . . and now it is up to the P. G. A. and the newspapers to see that the situation is cleared up." It was an obscure loophole in the P. G. A. rules through which Joe Louis "crawled." If the ex-champion will stay in his "biggest fight" to the end he will apply for entry into other P. G. A.-sponsored tournaments and insist that Negro professionals be allowed to participate also.

Honoring "President" Tubman

PRESIDENT TRUMAN sent a delegation of four distinguished Americans—Ambassador Edward R. Dudley, Major General James S. Stowell, Mrs. Mary McLeod Bethune, and Carl Murphy, editor of the Afro-American of Baltimore—to represent him at the inauguration of President W. V. S. Tubman for a second eight-year term as President of Liberia. One can only hope that the members of this delegation were unaware of the circumstances under which President Tubman was reelected; but Mr. Truman must have known the facts.

When W. V. S. Tubman was first elected in 1942, the Liberian constitution stipulated that the President could not be reelected. Tubman began his administration by issuing various enlightened edicts and sponsoring a number of important amendments to the constitution. For example, the franchise was extended to the aborigines, who form over 90 per cent of the population. Since Liberia was founded, the country has been run by the Americo-Liberian minority—descendants of freed slaves from the United States—with a ruthlessness that would incite the envy of any ruling class in Africa. As recently as 1930 Americo-Liberians were shipping natives to the slave markets of Fernando Po. To give the vote to the masses seemed to be a bold step forward. Another amendment sponsored by Tubman permitted the President to be reelected for a second eight-year term.

The test of Tubman's "reforms" came in the election of May, 1951 (see editorial comment, The Nation, May 5, June 9, 1951). A new party, which included both aborigines and Americo-Liberians, selected as its candidate Dihdwo Twe, a full-blooded aborigine of the Kru tribe who had been educated in this country. It was Twe who in 1930 first brought to light the facts of Liberia's slave trade and forced an official investigation. His efforts won him international fame but hardly added to his popularity among Liberia's ruling class. As a result of the investigation, and of ensuing action by the League of Nations, C. D. B. King, who was President at the time, was forced to resign. He is today Liberia's ambassador in Washington.

From the outset Twe had great difficulty in qualifying as a Presidential candidate. Tubman claims that Twe's party did not file in time; Twe claims that the government's constant interference made it impossible for his supporters to obtain signatures to petitions. A month before the election Twe and his coworkers filed a statement with Tubman citing various acts of harassment, violence, and terror, and asking for an extension of time. The request went unanswered. Whatever the merits of these conflicting assertions, it is a fact that the ballot, in true totalitarian style, gave the name of only one candidate, Tubman, who was reelected without a dissenting vote. Soldiers armed with machine-guns were present at the polling places to arrest any voter bold enough to write in another name.

After the election an indictment was returned against Twe and eighty-six of his followers, charging them with sedition. This outrageous act caused scarcely a ripple in the world press. Indeed, as long as Liberia remains a museum piece among the nations, of no appreciable interest to anyone, it will be difficult to focus attention on happenings there. Twe promptly, and wisely, fled to the high bush, where Kru tribesmen hid him while soldiers and government-recruited witch-doctors scoured the country with instructions to bring him in dead or alive. Eventually he escaped by canoe, after two days and nights on the open sea, to a nearby European colony, where he now lives in hiding.

The State Department and the United Nations have refused to intervene or make any representations to the government on the ground that the dispute is an internal matter. This excuse has a hollow ring in view of the protests and censures distributed to similar offenders who happen to fall within the Soviet orbit instead of ours. Washington's policy may have been influenced by the fact that Tubman has cooperated in a Point Four program for Liberia which promises to be quite successful. Then, too, Liberia is a member of the United Nations, where a vote is a vote. But whatever the reasons for the failure of the State Department to act, this country does not need to honor men who have no better title to high public office than Tubman's to the Presidency of Liberia.

Justice Douglas Is Available

ARTHUR KROCK to the contrary notwithstanding, The Nation is convinced that Justice William O. Douglas is "available" for the Democratic nomination this year. Mr. Krock's story in the New York Times of January 14 that Justice Douglas had eliminated himself from consideration for the nomination was one of those curious political exclusives for which Mr. Krock is noted and which must be scrutinized with great care.

Three interpretations of the story are current. One is that President Truman or some member of the White House staff "leaked" the story to Mr. Krock to discourage those Democrats who think of Justice Douglas as the real heir to the Roosevelt tradition. Another assumes that Justice Douglas and Mr. Krock are good friends although they do not see eye to eye politically; in fact, it has been suggested that Justice Douglas is the unnamed "Northern Democrat" who was the source of Mr. Krock's report of last November 7 that President Truman had offered to support General Eisenhower for the Democratic nomination. This interpretation implies that the story was a curious political stratagem: the announcement that Justice Douglas was not "available" was supposed to stimulate a demand for him.

In our view the story and its timing were part of a plan to prevent a movement in favor of Justice Douglas. Confronted with the published fact that he had sent President Truman a note last August stating that he was not and would not be a candidate, Justice Douglas could be expected to do what in fact he did—"reiterate his decision." The timing of the story is important. It appeared on the day after the New York Times Magazine had printed an article by Justice Douglas, The Black Silence of Fear, which is by all odds the strongest, most thoughtful, and most carefully considered statement he has made on current issues. Referring to the article, Mr. Krock wrote: "... [Justice Douglas's] attribution of responsibility to the 'military' mind of what he termed the perilous ascendancy of an orthodox and fatal attitude toward Asia was taken by some as a challenge to those Democrats who hoped to nominate General of the Army Dwight D. Eisenhower in place of Mr. Truman. If Administration politicians who don't believe the President will run again, and were thinking of Justice Douglas as his successor, got goose-flesh and developed a fever over this article, the news of his August letter from India [to the President] should restore their political health." Other politicians, too, might want reassurance on this subject. Indeed, everyone supporting General Eisenhower, including Mr. Krock's employer, the New York Times, must have appreciated the kindness of whoever it was in the President's entourage that released, just at this time, a letter which Justice Douglas had written the President last summer.

Despite the letter, we are convinced that Justice Douglas is available for the Democratic nomination. We believe that he has given every possible indication compatible with his office that he is available. Apart from this, the American people can demand that any individual be a candidate, and if enough of them join in the demand, the chances are excellent that he will yield. The moral pressure that can be brought to bear is truly irresistible.

To repeat what we said last week, if there was ever an election that called for a great debate on foreign policy it is this one. General Eisenhower has been in Europe a year. During that year it has become clear that the emphasis in American policy has shifted from economic reconstruction and development to military containment. Justice Douglas is as much a symbol of the former as General Eisenhower is of the latter. If these two men were the opposing candidates, the people would have a real choice. An attempt is being made to take Justice Douglas out of the struggle not because he might win the Democratic nomination but because a pro-Douglas movement could endanger the plans of those who want to preclude all debate on foreign policy in the coming campaign. Just how far the pre-Eisenhower forces are willing to go in an effort to avoid a real debate is suggested by Walter Lippmann's surprising statement in the New York Herald Tribune of January 15 that it is really quite unimportant what General Eisenhower says about major issues, so "synthetic and contrived" are most political declarations. We too place only limited credence in speeches and platforms, but we have faith in the educational value of a political campaign in which the big issues are fully discussed by the candidates.

The notion that it is proper for a military commander on active duty to become a silent candidate for the Presidency but improper for a Justice of the Supreme Court to be considered by the people must be demolished. To help along the good work, we are going to start "leaking" stories ourselves. In the best Krock tradition, then, we can report that "it become known this week" that Justice Douglas could be induced to make himself available as a candidate for the Presidency if enough people wanted him—and our mail indicates that a large number do. The people who feel this way should resolutely reject the myths of his unavailability and start talking about him.

Universal Military Training

NATIONAL NEED

BY WAYNE MORSE

United States Senator from Oregon

ONE of the first items of business to be taken up by the Armed Services Committee in this second session of the Eighty-second Congress will be the recommendations of the National Security Training Commission for a program of universal military training. Last year the Congress approved the principle of universal military training; the questions now are how and when we shall translate that far-reaching decision into a positive program. Although the legislation adopted in June, 1951, would seem to have determined the basic issue, the mail coming to my desk indicates that many people believe Congress should reexamine the need for a U. M. T. program. I think the reasons for universal military training are as compelling now as they were six months ago, and it is my hope that with a minimum of delay Congress will approve the broad outline of the program recommended by the National Security Training Commission—a program which is designed to organize the defenses of the nation so that they can be supported in the indefinite period of danger facing us without jeopardizing our economy or impairing the structure of our democratic society.

National defense rests, in the last analysis, on trained man-power. The public must realize this, and understand that the concept of a "push-button" war is an illusion. No responsible military or political leader can give our people assurance that, should world events force us into all-out war, we would have time to train the necessary forces before hostilities began. Swift mobilization will be required, and unless we maintain enormous standing armies, which might well cripple our economy, the only way in which we can be prepared to meet an attack is by having a reservoir of militarily trained citizens. That is the fundamental reason for a U. M. T. program, coupled with a sound reserve structure.

The hopes of dictators for world domination have always been nourished by the conviction that democracies, with their deep-seated suspicion of large standing forces, will permit their defenses to deteriorate during periods of relative calm. Had we adopted a system of universal military training following the end of World War II instead of demobilizing at breakneck speed, we certainly would have avoided a substantial part of the costs of our recent and projected defense build-up. Moreover, it is not unlikely that the aggressors in Korea were encouraged to launch their attack by the knowledge that the military defenses of the United States had been allowed to dwindle to a fraction of the forces available at the end of hostilities in 1945.

A U. M. T. program will insure that the burdens of defense are shared by all, in the democratic way. When the attack came in Korea, we found ourselves compelled to rely primarily on reservists and members of the National Guard for trained replacements. Thousands of these had served in World War II, and it is grossly inequitable that they should now be undergoing a second major disruption in their lives and careers as the direct result of our shortsighted policy in not preparing younger men to answer the call. In the long-term crisis that confronts us—and the situation is of such gravity and unpredictability that, in the words of General Marshall before the Senate Armed Services Committee last January, we must be prepared for effective action "whether the challenge comes with the speed of sound or is delayed for a lifetime"—we must be capable of responding to periodic military alarms, including all-out war if necessary, in a manner that will least injure our social and economic structure. The tragic experience of the past year and a half, when necessity required the large-scale recall of veteran reservists, is to my mind ample testimony to the need for U. M. T. and a reinvigorated reserve program.

Prompt approval of a U. M. T. program is essential for another important reason. It makes explicit the ultimate duty of citizenship, which has always been implied—the duty to bear arms in defense of the nation. In the past, owing to the unrealistic policy of unpreparedness, the youth of every generation of Americans have gone to war psychologically and physically unprepared. Thousands of needless casualties have occurred because young men have been denied the military training which would give them a better chance to survive in battle. It is only fair that before they are committed to combat these young men should be prepared in military skills and mental outlook to discharge their obligation of citizenship.

Adopting a program of universal military training does not mean that we thereby abandon efforts to achieve an honorable and peaceful settlement of the causes of world tension. We must continue those efforts. But it seems painfully plain to me that we cannot expect to meet the threat to our free society by neglecting our military defenses or hopefully assuming that a policy of unpreparedness will induce the Kremlin to abandon its objective of a world subservient to it.

Realism requires that the free world be prepared to defend its freedom, and a universal-military-training program is an essential step toward that goal.

BOOBY TRAP

BY EDWIN C. JOHNSON

United States Senator from Colorado

EVERY major country that has utilized universal military training has reaped a harvest of poverty and national impotence. Look at Germany, Japan, and France. U. M. T., because it has been oversold by the military, creates a Maginot Line complex. Even the members of the National Security Training Commission in their recent report to the Congress recognize this fact when they state: "We emphasize that U. M. T. . . . could be dangerous if U. M. T. were, for example, to become an excuse for the precipitate reduction of our standing forces."

The present U. M. T. plan provides for a six months' training period and seven and a half years "on call" in the military reserve. General Hershey accurately describes this reserve obligation as a mortgage on a boy's life. During those extremely important seven and a half years a boy's soul is not his own. That "on call" shadow will follow him everywhere with its threat of fouling up any plan he may have for his life.

Under the present Selective Service Act draftees can be forced into the reserves after their regular two-year term is over; that is, they are drafted for two years but must serve six years in the reserves, whereas service in the reserves was formerly voluntary. But the present Selective Service Act expires in 1954; it is not yet a permanent part of the security program of the government. U. M. T., on the other hand, has been justified by the Pentagon as part of the permanent policy of the government in war or peace. It would thus give to the President an enormous reserve, on a compulsory basis, which could be called into service without a declaration of war by Congress.

Every boy should grow up to be what he wants to be. Some will want to be soldiers; others sailors, teachers, lawyers, writers, bankers, mechanics, farmers, or merchants. Congress does not have enough wisdom to interfere with the development of careers. We must cling to "freedom of choice" if we would have a happy, progressive, successful society.

How can a boy assume the responsibilities of a family, the purchase of a home, an investment in business, a heavy indebtedness which would work out with careful nursing, when he lives under the shadow of U. M. T. for seven and a half years? The young man who wants an expensive, technical education may well hesitate to start his course because of his uncertainty about the future.

The boy who wants to marry and get a job may hesitate for the same reason.

In the early days of the emergency in Korea the professional proponents of U. M. T. played a clever game. The Selective Service Act of 1948 was about to expire. Renewal legislation was prepared in the Pentagon. But when it was submitted to Congress, U. M. T. had been incorporated in it. Congress was prepared to reenact Selective Service but was not willing—at least the House was not willing—to take U. M. T. also. So a compromise was worked out under which a new Selective Service Act was passed with a provision that a commission should be appointed to study U. M. T. The appointment of the commission implied that Congress had somehow approved U. M. T. in principle. This was not the fact. In any case the report of the commission, dated October 29, 1951, is now before the Congress. In the spring of 1951 the United States was caught in an emergency. Selective Service was necessary. It was democratic. It had proved its effectiveness. But the professional militarists, under cover of the emergency, managed to advance the cause of U. M. T. by the provision for appointment of the commission.

U. M. T. is in direct conflict with the fundamental principles on which this country was founded. It prostitutes the principle of free choice and free enterprise that has given the American nation the strength to grow to its present unchallenged power. No matter how one endeavors to dress up this vicious proposal, no matter what fanciful language is employed, under U. M. T. every young man becomes the plaything of the President for eight years. All individual choice and all consideration of the special aptitudes of American boys are effectively suppressed. Oh, I know the shouts are going up: "The routine of the boys will only be delayed slightly, and after the short period of training they will be permitted to pursue their lives in their own way"; but that is a lie.

The so-called training period is not important; the six months will pass quickly. It may do the boy little or no harm. From his standpoint, it may be of some indirect benefit. But it cannot add one iota to the nation's military strength. Ten years ago General Marshall told the Senate Military Affairs Committee that a soldier required eighteen months of intensive training, with fifteen months the absolute minimum. New weapons, new military concepts, and new military techniques of every description require time to master. War is becoming more specialized, and it requires specialists to manage its complexities. One does not become a specialist in any line in six months. But the six months are only the window dressing on this U. M. T. proposal. The big thing is the seven and a half years "on call." The six months' training is merely to fool parents, who naturally want to believe that the training their boy receives may save his life. It is a booby trap for parents. How the military can keep a straight face when they talk about the six months of training is beyond me. They throw in six months of monkey business to get a mortgage on American youth for seven and a half years.

Through the years the professional proponents of universal military training have resorted to every conceivable trick to clothe this totalitarian device in the garb of military preparedness and thus make it acceptable to the American people. By using the scare technique they have induced many sincere and patriotic folk to enlist in the cause. Heretofore the American people have recognized U. M. T. for what it is—peace-time conscription, a plan to Prussianize American youth, a scheme to destroy that rich heritage of energy and ingenuity which is the peculiar quality of free men. Panicky citizens who have pledged their undying support to the free-enterprise system now seem ready to deny it to American youth. Confused, frustrated, and hysterical, they now seem ready to abandon their long struggle against militarism.

I submit that the present Selective Service Act is fully adequate for obtaining and training the man-power for the defense of this country. Moreover, I want to make it crystal clear that I am in favor of using the draft act whenever and as long as the conditions warrant drafting American youth for military service. There is nothing beneficial to national defense which we might do under universal military training that cannot be done under the Selective Service law.

Indo-China: The French Must Choose

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

Paris, January 17

THE decision to hold the three-power conference on Indo-China in Washington was taken, it has been learned, as the result of a secret communication from M. Pleven to the United States ambassador in Paris. French intelligence, M. Pleven said, had acquired a great deal of information showing that the Chinese Communists had "aggressive intentions" toward Indo-China. According to France-Soir, M. Pleven hoped through this communication both to speed up American deliveries to Indo-China and to alert Allied opinion in favor of organizing common defense in Southeast Asia. Although it has been decided to hold a three-power military conference, the British, France-Soir declares, are taking the French "disclosures" with a grain of salt, and the Americans have made it clear that they cannot in the present circumstances intervene actively in Indo-China.

It is curious that the Pleven démarche to the United States ambassador should have been made when it was; one detects a strange coincidence with the beginning of the full-dress debate on Indo-China in the National Assembly. Was not the "warning" to the United States about the Chinese menace calculated to produce some new "element" which would help France to find a way out of the Indo-Chinese tangle? M. Pleven must have known what the debate on Indo-China was going to reveal—a practically universal conviction that France simply could not afford to continue the war on the present basis. In 1952 the war will cost between one-sixth and one-seventh of the entire budget. This overwhelming financial argument was reinforced by the clear necessity of "making a choice"; it was beyond France's financial means and military capacity to pursue the war in Indo-China and at the same time build up the large army in Europe which alone would enable it to pull its weight in the future organization of Western defense.

At the end of the three-day debate, it is true, the National Assembly passed by a large majority the appropriation of 326 billion francs for the land forces in Indo-China during the current year, but this sum does not cover the navy or air force, and as in past years some supplementary estimates will be required before long. The general mood at the Assembly was that "it couldn't go on like this"; if the credits were passed, it was only because the French army in Indo-China could not be left high and dry without money or equipment.

VIEWS which a year ago would have been considered "defeatist," or "unfriendly to France"—some articles on the subject printed in this journal were so described at the time—were openly expressed in certain quite unexpected quarters; and these remarks corresponded to the general mood much more closely than did official utterances. M. Mendès-France, the most "unorthodox" of the Radicals, once again dwelt on the relative backwardness of the French economy, which made it utterly impossible for France to build up an army in Europe and at the same time carry on the war in Indo-China. If it persisted in this effort, he said, it would plunge into the most disastrous inflation.

I am asking for a change of policy in Indo-China. I have never advocated capitulation, but I have asked and am still asking that every avenue be explored for an agreement with Vietminh. I am told one cannot negotiate with Communists, with Moscow agents. But what else are the Americans doing in Korea? . . . Our ministers now vaguely talk about "internationalizing the conflict" or about entering upon multilateral conversations—which simply means we shall lose what trumps we still have. . . . But the main point is this: as long as we go on losing all these officers and men in Indo-China, as long as we go on spending 500 billion francs a year, we shall have no army in Europe, and only 500 billion francs' worth of inflation, poverty, and fuel for Communist propaganda.

More surprising was the condemnation of the Indo-Chinese war by another Radical leader, M. Daladier, who argued that as long as 7,000 French officers, 32,000 n.c.o.'s, and 134,000 professional soldiers were "marooned" in Indo-China, France would be hopelessly outnumbered in its North African possessions. It was asking for trouble. It was, in fact, inviting the United States to build up Germany as the greatest military power in Europe. M. Daladier did not think it possible to negotiate with Vietnam and did not much believe in the possibility of "internationalizing the conflict," but he wanted the United Nations to negotiate a truce, to be followed by a referendum in each province in which the people of Vietnam "would freely choose the regime they desire." Whether M. Daladier meant that France should withdraw completely from Indo-China if the people so chose or should maintain a few strongholds in the country, whatever the results of the referendum, he did not make clear. But perhaps it was a matter of minor importance to him; what obviously was worrying him most was German rearmament.

Two other opinions should be quoted—those of M. Costes-Floret of the M. R. P. and of M. Palewski of the Gaullists. The former seemed to believe in a "deal" with Peking. Though he was less explicit than at the M. R. P. congress at Lyon last summer, where he proposed a "trade" by which the U. N. would admit both the Bao Dai regime and the Peking government, he still thought France could gain something from an "international settlement" in the Far East covering Korea, China, and Indo-China. The two great weaknesses of his argument were of course that the Bao Dai regime, like the Bao Dai army, is little more than a myth, and that no one in Washington in a Presidential year would be likely even to consider the admission of Peking into the U. N.

M. Palewski advocated "internationalizing" not the peace but the war, demanding that Britain and America take an active part in it, if only with their navies and air forces. This might have sounded a little more convincing but for a striking remark made by a Socialist Deputy, Gaston Defferre, who asserted that when Churchill was last in Paris and was asked what help Britain could give France in Indo-China, he replied, "England did well to get out of India." It was a good story, and perhaps true. In any case, it had a dampening effect on M. Palewski's crusading zeal.

THE most curious thing about M. Pleven's rather ill-tempered comments on Indo-China was that they showed no real attempt to answer his critics' two major arguments—that the war was ruining the French economy, and that it was reducing France's political and military weight in Europe. The most that could be read into his speech was that he might conceivably agree to "negotiate with Peking," whatever that meant. He claimed that the French forces had done a magnificent job in Indo-China in the past year, that they were getting stronger every day (in the same breath he said Vietminh, "actively supported by the Chinese," was also getting stronger), and that in a year or eighteen months from now France could reach a settlement "from positions of strength." His glowing account of the Bao Dai army was later debunked by one speaker after another. His warm tribute to the help received from the United States was not impressive, since it is common knowledge that this help has been far below the expectations entertained by the French during the visit to Washington last summer of De Lattre, who for a few short days was written up in the press as "the French MacArthur."

In a series of well-informed articles in the Observateur Claude Bourdet sharply criticizes the "official euphoria" displayed by the government; he says that Vietminh is receiving very substantial American equipment from China and has also been buying from the Bao Dai crowd, and that its anti-aircraft batteries are particularly effective. Vietminh has chosen to wage a war of attrition rather than embark on an all-out offensive because the French are being worn down more rapidly than they—the French casualty figures which he gives are much higher than the official ones. Bourdet also cites some unsavory examples of the friction existing between the French and the Bao Daists, and of the financial scandals reported at Hanoi and Saigon. Indeed, he believes there might be less resistance in Paris to terminating the war in Indo-China if there were not so many rackets in Indo-China—notably the piastre racket, based on the two exchange rates—in which not only numerous individuals in Paris but whole political groups in France are keenly interested.

A still more serious allegation made by Bourdet is that Washington is not really interested in seeing a large French army in Europe. In fact, it may welcome the absence of such an army as an additional excuse for going ahead with the rearmament of Germany, a much more "reliable" ally. At the same time Washington likes to see France keeping Indo-China warm—just in case. This, Bourdet argues, may be the chief reason for the government's "unimaginative" policy.

Is it not also one of the reasons why the Pleven course is nearing its end, why it will be replaced either by a more determined "war policy" in Indo-China—here the American Republicans and De Gaulle may find some common ground—or by a more determined peace policy? For better or worse, there is a noticeable break-away everywhere in Europe from the Truman-Acheson-Eisenhower conceptions. In the main, neither Britain nor France believes any longer in a Russian invasion, in the urgent need to rearm Germany, or in the advantages of "no East-West trade."

Indo-China: A Vietnamese Speaks

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Paris, January 15

FEW people in America realize what a headache the Indo-Chinese struggle is for the French. It not only threatens France with bankruptcy but it makes little sense from the viewpoint of European security. The officers who constitute the cadres of the French army in Indo-China amount to as many as will be required for the ten divisions France has promised to contribute to NATO. Small wonder, then, that the distinguished economic expert, Pierre Mendès-France, Radical Deputy and French delegate to the International Monetary Fund, should have proposed that the government open talks with the Ho Chi Minh regime. Even better evidence that the French would like a settlement is to be found in the statement by Foreign Minister Schuman that France "would not refuse an accord which would put an end to that conflict under conditions which would be honorable," and in the decision to send a Parliamentary mission to Indo-China to study the situation in all its aspects.

Today it is not so much the French who must be convinced of the desirability of a settlement in Indo-China as official Washington. Above all, Western opinion needs to be informed on the real issues in Indo-China. Unlike the Indonesian Republic, which was in a position to wage an excellent public-relations campaign in the United States, the Vietnam Republic is little known. Recently I had a chance to talk about the war in Indo-China with a remarkable Vietminh leader, educated in England, actively associated with Ho Chi Minh, and now in Geneva for several months' study of the specialized agencies of the U. N. He prefers, on account of his position, to remain anonymous, but I can vouch for the fact that he speaks with authority. The following report of what he had to say in answer to a series of questions from me throws light on the situation in Indo-China.

"Since arriving in Europe I have read and heard the most fantastic things about the Vietnam Republic. Most of the people who condemn us as a collection of Communists ignore both the origin of our fight and our purposes. From the very beginning of the Japanese occupation of Indo-China there was a resistance movement which included nationalists of every tendency. As Japanese strength was reduced by the American offensive, we were able to establish several liberation zones in the mountains of northern Indo-China, and when Japan finally collapsed, the resistance movement, under Vietminh direction, seized power in Hanoi and thus the Democratic Republic of Vietnam was born.

"People here talk as if there were two real governments, ours and one headed by the Emperor, Bao Dai. But Bao Dai is no ruler. He exists only because the French colonialists forced the hand of the French government, whose more intelligent members wanted a settlement with us. The only juridical claim Bao Dai can put forward is the false theory about his abdication. It is suggested that since his abdication was brought about by force, it has no legal validity and he is therefore the legitimate ruler of Vietnam. The answer to that argument can be found in the language of his abdication itself. Nowhere does it indicate pressure but rather a dignified readiness to make all sacrifices beneficial to the nation.

"We are not fighting Bao Dai and we are not even fighting France, which after all is a democratic republic, or the French people, who like ourselves are fond of freedom. If they had behaved differently and instead of seeking our destruction by force had really wanted to come to terms with us, we would not be fighting the colonialists either. We are fighting only those who seek by ruse or violence to reestablish their domination.

"Vietnam is not a one-party state, as is so widely assumed. Its government is chosen through popular elections. The constitution is republican, non-socialist. The Parliament is intrusted with the supreme powers of the Republic. The President of Vietnam resembles the President of the United States much more than the French President. But he differs in that he is elected by the Parliament from among its members. He chooses the Prime Minister from the Parliament.

"An important feature of the Vietnam constitution, confirming its democratic structure, is the provision creating the Permanent Committee of the People's Parliament, composed of the president and the vice-president of the Assembly along with twelve permanent and three alternate members elected by the Assembly. In this way parliamentary control is assured in any emergency. For instance, as a consequence of the war the National Assembly elected in January, 1946, is today dispersed, but its Permanent Committee follows the government everywhere and is always consulted before any important decree is issued. Of the twenty-seven posts in the government, six are held by Communists, two by Socialists, four by Democrats, one by a member of the Revolutionary League, one by a member of the Nationalist Party, the others being distributed among independents or representatives of religious groups (two Roman Catholics and one Buddhist). One must remember that one of the first decrees of the government proclaimed freedom of faith, fixing as national festivals both Buddha's and Christ's birthdays. In spite of heavy pressure from the Vatican we have many good Catholics on our side. They know that they have not been and will not be molested in their belief.

"The chief item in the government's broad program is agrarian reform. The Western powers don't understand the feeling of Asia about this. Take Korea. The strongest weapon of the North Koreans and Chinese is not the Russian planes you hear so much about; it is the support of the peasants.

"In Indo-China it is exactly the same. 'To gain the peasantry is the way to become Emperor,' said Mencius, the Chinese sage. Vietnam has followed this maxim. Peasants constitute the great majority of the population. In the strictest democratic conception they ought to receive, and have received, the most attention. From the outset the Republic has taken various measures to improve their lot. Every citizen over eighteen years who asks for it receives seven acres of land belonging to the state, with the obligation to till them. After two years the land becomes his property. The Republic has also distributed land belonging to French colonialists and Vietnamese traitors. To help the peasants overcome many difficulties of cultivation, the government is granting them ever-increasing financial assistance. Finally the government is encouraging the hiên diên movement promoted by certain rich patriots. This movement consists of a kind of emulation among landlords to put their rice fields wholly or partially, temporarily or permanently, at the disposition of a local community, a fighting group, or the nation itself. Cooperatives and the labor-exchange associations—of which there are already nearly 20,000—make it possible for peasants to exchange their agricultural experience and help one another in working the land.

"As for the war, the outlook is not bad. From the start our strategy has been geared to a protracted war, not to an effort to achieve a quick solution. Time is working for us. The war is a terrible burden, but it is still worse for the French, who are obliged to maintain an expeditionary army. Besides, you cannot separate the destiny of Indo-China from the destiny of all Asia, and in Asia the liberation movements are bound to win, sooner or later. General de Gaulle said the other day in Paris: 'One does not make war with the Pentagon and the initials [he was referring to SHAPE] but with the soul and the blood of the people.' Well, he is a reactionary, and if he should come to power he would also fight us, but there is a lot of truth in what he said. You have an example in Malaya, where not more than 10,000 natives, very badly equipped, have for years engaged some 30,000 trained British troops, armed with modern weapons. Our material resources may be smaller, but owing to special circumstances in Indo-China, France's energy and vitality are ebbing while our army and people are each day stronger and more united. The enemy must abandon many a base and retreat to the big towns; we can fight everywhere.

"A negotiated agreement with the French is still possible. France today has relatively few political or economic interests in Indo-China. It remains for reasons of prestige. There are people in France, even in conservative circles, who realize the war is a disaster and who see clearly the weakness and vacillation of Bao Dai. But whether such people will be heeded at this stage seems doubtful. It has been suggested that the U. N. should decide the Indo-Chinese dispute. But international action means intervention by the United States and Great Britain conceived in terms of the global strategy of the Western coalition. This ignores the fact that the Vietnam problem is only part of the crisis of colonialism, and of the resurgence of Asia.

"We are accused of receiving military aid from Communist China, but if we are receiving any aid—I say if—it would hardly match the aid the United States is giving France to liquidate us. The whole discussion of the threat of 'Communist expansion' seems rather beside the point in Asia, where the one vital business is the effort of the rural masses—half the world's population—to throw off the control, the existing control, of the colonial powers and wipe out the landlord system through which they are exploited. Until this is accomplished we are not likely to worry too much about 'accusations' of the sort you hear from our opponents."

Chiang's Guerrillas

BY ANDREW ROTH

London, January 15

AMERICAN policy toward Communist China may hinge on the fate of 4,000 malaria-ridden Kuomintang Chinese guerrillas holed up in the mountainous jungles of the Shan states of northeastern Burma. Their veteran commander, General Li Mi, recently made a secret trip to Formosa, via Bangkok and Hongkong, to get supplies and reinforcements. Adequate food, arms, and medical supplies—which must be shipped through Bangkok—can only be provided with open American help. To focus attention on this impending American decision, Peking and Moscow have been publishing ridiculously exaggerated accounts of United States activities. "The American command," Soviet Foreign Minister Vishinsky declared in the U. N. General Assembly on January 3, "is busy transferring Kuomintang troops from Formosa to Siam and Western Burma. It is preparing large-scale military operations on the borders of the Chinese People's Republic."

Released as Mr. Churchill's ship was approaching New York, the Vishinsky blast seemed a rather obvious attempt to dramatize the differences among the non-Communist countries in their relations with China. One of the most difficult assignments the Churchill-Eden team undertook was to persuade Washington to "freeze" the situation in Asia on the thin chance that it might abandon the Formosa regime after the November elections. By drawing attention to the Kuomintang guerrillas in Burma, Peking and Moscow hope to emphasize not only the gulf between the British government and the Truman-Acheson "moderates" in Washington but the unbridgeable chasm separating British opinion in general from the MacArthurite strategists who want to keep the Communists "off balance" by sponsoring Kuomintang raids on mainland China. Although Li Mi's troops have been described by the Manchester Guardian as "the only Kuomintang guerrilla force to achieve any substantial success," they are more likely to win victories in Washington than in Yunnan.

Li Mi is a veteran Kuomintang general who managed to escape through the Communist lines after his troops had been smashed in a decisive battle along the eastern section of the Lunghai Railway in 1948. He came into the news when the Kuomintang appointed him governor of his native Yunnan and commander of its remaining troops, after its long-time governor, Lu Han, went over to the Communists. In January, 1950, the Kuomintang's last armies on the mainland, the 26th and the 8th, were routed by the Communists in southern Yunnan. About 10,000 troops from these units and the 93d division were pushed back toward the high passes linking Yunnan and northern Burma.

Beginning in March, 1950, the infiltration of Nationalist soldiers in civilian dress became a source of severe embarrassment to the struggling Union of Burma government, whose small, over-extended army could barely hold Burma's major cities and main roads. The northern command could spare only a couple of regiments to police the mountainous border. Thus, while some Kuomintang troops were disarmed and imprisoned and a few were killed, most of them crossed the border into the eastern Shan province of Kengtung, where many Chinese refugees had settled as farmers during World War II.

The bulk of these troops entered between May and June, 1950, just when Burma and Communist China decided to exchange recognition. In order to show its honorable intentions toward the Peking regime, the Burmese government flew two regiments into Kengtung and attacked the Kuomintang troops. They took some prisoners, but most of the Chinese escaped.

That General Li Mi could survive and be reinforced during the next year provides an interesting insight into the shifting network of forces operating in Southeast Asia. He not only received support from pro-Kuomintang elements among the local Chinese and from pro-Kuomintang Chinese throughout Southeast Asia, but with typical Chinese dexterity established relations with some of the autonomous feudal Shan chieftains, who valued his aid in local rivalries. The Burmese government, lacking seasoned troops and adequate transport to defeat him in battle, tried diplomacy. It first explained to the Peking government its military inability to expel the Kuomintang troops, and then, having no diplomatic links with Formosa, it asked the United States to induce the Kuomintang regime to withdraw them. At the same time Burma complained to the Siamese government that gun-running was going on across Siam's borders. It became clear that the Siamese government, which had become increasingly pro-American and anti-Communist after it received a $10,000,000 grant in 1950—it was the first Asian country to send troops to Korea—was placing no restrictions on the activities of Li Mi and his agents and was even allowing him to establish a sort of headquarters in Bangkok. Since Siam also winks at Li Mi's use of the overland route, supplies can now be shipped to him at Bangkok, sent to the railhead at Chiangmai, and then taken by mule track into Burma. The only question is how much direct support the United States has given to this operation. The Burmese have heard planes dropping supplies in the Kengtung area but not been able to learn their nationality.

Last summer news agencies carried the story that three columns of General Li Mi's guerrillas, allegedly totaling about 10,000 men, had thrust sixty-five miles into Yunnan from Burma. From Formosa came the wild report that the General had seized one-third of Yunnan. But in August the guerrillas began to filter back into comparatively hospitable Burma, having lost half their effectives in combat with the Communist forces in Yunnan. General Li Mi's only consolation was that the Chiang government's propaganda had given a temporary shot in the arm to the remaining guerrilla bands in mainland China, fast evaporating as a result of the determined efforts of the Chinese Communists to extirpate "counter-revolutionaries." As the "open season" approached with the end of the rains in December, it became necessary to replenish Li Mi's supplies if his force was not to disintegrate.

WHEN it leaked out that General Li had passed through Hongkong on Christmas Eve on his way to Formosa, Communist China made wild charges about a plot to attack its southwestern borders. These charges were repeated by Vishinsky in a somewhat garbled form in Paris. The Peking New China News Agency listed the flights between Formosa and Bangkok of General J. Lawton Collins, United States Chief of Staff, and other American and Kuomintang Chinese officials and came to an unproved conclusion: "All these activities indicate that under the sponsorship of the United States a new conspiracy is hatching between the reactionary authorities of Thailand and the Chiang gang in Taiwan." The Agency claimed "inside information" concerning a November 13 conference at which Major General William Chase, head of the United States Military Assistance Advisory Groups in Formosa, had said: "Because, at one time, the Burmese government felt uneasy about the Kuomintang remnant troops concentrating in the northern part of the territory of Burma, the work of reinforcing the bandit Kuomintang troops had to be suspended for a while. Since the government and public opinion of Burma have relaxed their attention on this matter, Washington circles consider that the plans for transporting the bandit troops to this area must be fulfilled in the immediate future." The report added that the Seventh Fleet was to transport 70,000 Kuomintang troops to Bangkok before the end of 1951.

Peking can scarcely imagine that 70,000 troops could be shipped through Bangkok without anyone noticing them. And it probably knows how small a threat Li Mi's guerrillas constitute from a military standpoint. But it may well have wanted to nudge Burma into taking action against the Kuomintang troops using Burmese territory as a base. Above all, the Chinese, like the Russians, have hoped to divide the United States and its allies over the question of China. British diplomats were overjoyed when the Truman-Acheson "moderates" routed General MacArthur and his supporters. But they have been concerned at the tendency of the Washington Administration to take over, bit by bit, the policy of the MacArthurites with regard to China. As long ago as April 14 a "Voice of America" broadcast from Washington said: "It is one of the openest secrets here that both British and American agents have maintained contact with resistance forces in South China from the first days and that aid to such forces has been flowing by various channels for many months." Kenneth Younger, Britain's Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, expressed "dismay" at the allegation, denying there was any truth in it "as far as the United Kingdom is concerned."

The broadcast, however, was never disavowed by the State Department, and its consistency with American policy was indicated by Assistant Secretary of State Dean Rusk in a speech delivered on May 18 implying United States support for rebels against the Peking regime. Although Mr. Rusk was chided for overstating the American position, a high State Department official explained American intentions in not dissimilar terms to Sebastian Haffner, then Washington correspondent of the London Observer. "America intends, in fact," he said "to continue a wait-and-see policy toward the Chinese mainland, watching developments and reserving the right to give diplomatic and material support to any local or national government which might develop out of the present resistance and guerrilla movements."

Under the terms of last autumn's Mutual Security Act the United States was converted from a protector of the Formosa regime to an active ally. The 1952 Mutual Security program grants to Formosa $300,000,000—a third of the whole Asia allotment—mostly to modernize Chiang's twenty-five divisions. The implications were spelled out in the recent New York statement of Major General Chase, who described the United States and the Chiang regime as "equal partners, in the fight against the evil of communism." This was the first mention of the possibility of American and Kuomintang forces working together outside Formosa. It is clear that General Chase conceives the ultimate objective of his mission to be the overthrow of the Communist government at Peking. But how much can such an objective be furthered by sending aid to inaccessible Kuomintang guerrillas based in a friendly state (Burma) which recognizes the Peking government?

This is not the only political embarrassment that America's almost solitary support of the Chiang regime has produced. Thomas J. Hamilton, the New York Times United Nations correspondent, has disclosed that the United States delegation in Paris is feverishly seeking a way to deal with the situation which would arise if the Korean war were to end completely and formally. For peace in Korea would remove the rather thin pretext under which the United States Seventh Fleet is guarding Formosa to protect Korea's "flank." If the Korean fighting ends formally and the Chinese Communists then attack Formosa, American participation on Chiang's side would be open unilateral intervention in China's civil war, and would not have United Nations' support or authorization.

For such a move the United States would probably not win the backing of Britain or France. The American delegation, therefore, according to this usually well-informed source, is seeking to have the United Nations establish a trusteeship over Formosa, thus providing a United Nations cover for American naval action to protect Formosa from Communist landing forces. But if this were done it would be difficult for even the pro-American majority in the United Nations to continue to support Chiang Kai-shek's regime. Certainly a United Nations trusteeship could not permit Formosan aid to mainland raids like those of General Li Mi. This predicament may explain why a section of the United States delegation is reported to be opposed to any formal peace in Korea except under the currently impossible condition of a united non-Communist state.

American sympathy for General Li Mi's guerrillas contrasts with Britain's recently renewed acknowledgment that the Peking regime cannot be replaced in the near future, certainly not by the Kuomintang. The British know that the Truman Administration could not, even if it wanted to, abandon Formosa in an election year. But if General Li Mi is going to "needle" the Chinese Communists by raids into Yunnan, the Foreign Office would certainly prefer to have no label showing that the needle was "Made in the U. S. A."

Sprague—Conscience of Oregon

BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Salem, Oregon

OREGON is the most solidly Republican of all the Western states. This Republicanism is in the blood, and not even a 40 per cent population increase since 1940 has been able to dilute it. Only Oregon, in company with steadfast Maine and Vermont, never elected a Democratic United States Senator throughout Franklin D. Roosevelt's long tenure in the White House. Yet despite its faithfulness to the G. O. P., Oregon is the single state of the Pacific seaboard which has not enacted a loyalty oath or similar test legislation. Although the witch-hunting hysteria has been particularly virulent along the West Coast, in Oregon a person applying for a position of public trust still need swear only the time-honored allegiance to the constitutions of the state and nation.

This happy state of affairs is due in the main to the influence of one man, ex-Governor Charles A. Sprague, publisher of the Oregon Daily Statesman in Salem. Perhaps because he was born in Kansas, Sprague's admirers compare him to the late William Allen White of the Emporia Gazette. Sprague is a Republican who has abandoned—as White did—his party's predominant isolationism to support the foreign policy of the Democratic Administration. Like White a tireless defender of civil liberties, Sprague recently rebuked his party for inviting Senator Joe McCarthy to speak in Oregon. "If the Republican Party is to indorse McCarthyism," said this lifelong regular Republican, "it deserves to be laid in a grave both wide and deep. And to win the Presidency by condoning McCarthy's tactics would be to obtain office under false pretenses."

But Sprague salts such forthright opinions as these with an old-fashioned economic conservatism which makes him mistrustful of federal spending, of exotic figures in high office, and of concentrations of power in either corporations or trade unions. Only recently he criticized utility companies and public-power districts alike for waiting for the government to build dams across the Northwest's swift rivers instead of doing the job themselves. He assails his own community when it urges federal economy in the abstract and at the same time asks for local pork-barrel projects.

Sprague is Oregon's most influential citizen. His impact on the everyday affairs of the state far transcends that of Senator Wayne L. Morse, whom Sprague sustains against a host of reactionary foes. People in many parts of the Northwest subscribe to the Statesman in order to read the front-page column which the ex-Governor writes daily under the title "It Seems to Me." When the Chicago Tribune tried to read Morse out of the Republican Party last November, Sprague immediately came to the Senator's defense. "Morse is a party maverick, to be sure," he wrote. "But in my judgment he is a better Republican than Colonel Robert R. McCormick. The McCormick brand of Republicanism finds expression in blind isolationism, in distortion of facts, and in character assassination after the manner of Senator McCarthy."

Sprague intrudes himself boldly into the local issues that rock Oregon, a field in which Morse always has been extremely cautious. When a Republican state liquor commissioner took a trip at the expense of the Seagram distillery, Sprague at once insisted that he resign, although some Oregon papers which had been indignant about similar transgressions by the Democrats in Washington, D. C., kept silent. Sprague also has hammered constantly at the legalized pari-mutuel racing that makes a folly of police efforts to restrict less lucrative gambling.

IF THE Republicans look westward for a Vice-Presidential nominee, as they may have to do if Taft of Ohio or Eisenhower of New York becomes their Presidential candidate, they could do worse than pick this sixty-four-year-old publisher, often called "the conscience of Oregon." Probably few men would make a stronger appeal to the independent voters whom the G. O. P. must annex if it is not to be a permanent minority party. Young Republicans soon may circulate petitions to put Sprague on the 1952 primary ballot as the beneficiary of the state's convention votes for second place on the national ticket.

A strong religious and moral strain in Sprague often determines his stand. He neither drinks nor smokes, and his paper accepts no advertisements for hard liquor. An official of the Presbyterian church in the United States, he has cited Scripture against local corruption when other leading Oregon Republicans were looking the other way in embarrassment.

Yet Sprague is rarely doctrinaire. He asserted that "Taft can't have intelligence and integrity and have truck with McCarthyism," but he refused to become disturbed when adversaries of McCarthy were unable to round up signatures in Madison, Wisconsin, to a petition upholding the Declaration of Independence. He felt this was a childish way of opposing a sinister thing like McCarthyism. "The right to petition is guaranteed in our Constitution, and that implies also the right not to petition," he wrote in his column in the Statesman. "If 111 people refused to sign the reporter's petition, such was their privilege. That they can do so with impunity is still one of the benefits of our system."

For Sprague, Vermont is a political ideal. "I favor," he says, "sound, honest Republicanism which doesn't let people get pushed around." In his view this is epitomized by such individuals as Senator George Aiken, former Senator Warren Austin, the U. N. delegate, and former Governor Ernest W. Gibson. Indeed, Sprague fought with such ardor against the teacher's oath because he felt its passage in the legislature would challenge his boast that Oregon is "the Vermont of the West," a citadel of tolerance and stability.

The bill for a teacher's oath sailed through the state Senate by a vote of twenty-five to five. The expected Democratic opposition to it collapsed under pressure from a veterans' lobby; Democrats contributed some of the most raucous speeches in favor of the measure. The next morning members of the House of Representatives found a nervous, angular man with sparse hair and rimless glasses pacing the marble corridors like a panther. One by one, the ex-Governor pulled aside legislators who were his friends or acquaintances. "Oregon has not surrendered to hysteria, as have our neighbors in Washington and California," he told these men. "Let's not run down the flag now. Communists can be rooted out of the schools by positive action on each case as genuine proof develops. To subject all teachers to an invasion of their personal and academic freedom would be burning down the house to roast the pig."

And in "It Seems to Me" Sprague added, "Legislation like this is a product of fear. I have more confidence in the good sense of the teachers of Oregon and in their loyalty than to think we have to challenge them. There is no public demand for the bill. There is no situation in our schools which calls for this as a bar to employment of Communist teachers. The House should keep its feet on the ground and defeat this bill." The House took Sprague's advice. The oath bill died in the lower chamber. More than one legislator, just setting out on the rough road of politics, was surprised and flattered to be approached personally by a famous editor and former governor. Several college professors told their classes, half in jest, half seriously, that the events at Salem had knocked into the discard their belief that certain historical developments are inevitable, regardless of the efforts of individuals. There seemed to be no doubt that Oregon would have enacted an oath bill had not one particular man been on the scene.

Sprague's choice for President of the United States would probably be Paul G. Hoffman, the president of the Ford Foundation. Perhaps because of his intense interest in the oath fight, he was profoundly impressed by Hoffman's speech on liberty and tolerance at Freedom House a few months ago. His next preference is Eisenhower—with some reservations. He would like to know a good deal more about Ike's views on important domestic problems. He favors Eisenhower because "his nomination would be a renunciation of McCarthyism and MacArthurism." Sprague once gave this friendly warning to the General: "We may expect that if Eisenhower does say he will accept the Republican nomination he will immediately become the target of the pro-Formosa, pro-Chiang, anti-British, anti-Europe entourage whose white knight is Senator Robert A. Taft."

SPRAGUE was governor of Oregon from 1939 to 1943. One of the conspicuous achievements of his administration was the passage of a forestry code in this lumber-producing state. Bills enacted under Sprague's leadership provided that timber operators must leave a certain number of seed trees per acre and that pines of less than a certain circumference could not be felled. Only recently this pioneering legislation has been praised in a significant new book, "American Forest Policy," by Luther Halsey Gulick.

William Allen White wrote in his autobiography that he was strengthened in "the gymnasium of the woods and field and water." Sprague was trained in the same environment, and perhaps more ruggedly than was possible in level Kansas. Most of the peaks of the Pacific Northwest have felt his crampons. Even the 14,000-foot Mount Rainier is among his conquests. Thirty-six miles from the capital city of Oregon, Sprague and his wife own a chalet-like cabin on the Little North Fork of the Santiam River. They built it in 1945 on public land leased from the Department of the Interior. Sprague chops the wood for the fireplace and takes meditative hikes through the fir forests. He reads avidly, his regular fare consisting of Time, the Saturday Evening Post, The Nation, Reader's Digest, the New York Times Magazine, Harper's, U. S. News, and Scientific American.

Sprague also is a reader of the Congressional Record, where he finds, he says, many "unwritten stories." He confesses that being in politics was "so engrossing a game that I seldom got into the books or magazines that I needed to make me a well-informed person." And he adds that this may be one of the things wrong with American political life today. "Many of the participants become obsessed with rival personalities and with political animosities. As a result they lose sight of the tremendous impact on mankind of the decisions which they perforce must make."

Sprague's newspaper is partisan. But when he moves from candidates to issues, his party tie shackles him only slightly. No paper in the West encouraged Truman more consistently on the entire MacArthur question than the Statesman. Of MacArthur's recent public addresses Sprague has written, "His innuendoes are evidence more of the warping of his own mind than of Truman's malfeasance."

Perhaps because he is comparatively unfettered, Sprague occasionally ends up to the left of the Administration in Washington, which of course has its own groove. He has been chairman of an advisory commission on the administration of extremely valuable federal timber tracts in southwestern Oregon, part of an abandoned railroad land grant. A few months ago certain large and influential lumber companies forced the retirement of the regional director, a young economist named Daniel L. Goldy. Sprague championed Goldy and criticized the Interior Department for succumbing to the companies' pressure.

Sprague would probably return to public life only with considerable reluctance. He relishes the freedom of being a private citizen. He types his own letters, rarely making use of one of the Statesman's stenographers. When some Catholics canceled their subscriptions because the paper published news stories and photographs of Paul Blanshard speaking at a Catholic school in Mount Angel, Oregon, Sprague took the calls himself and patiently explained that it was the policy of the Statesman to print all the news without exception.

A religious man himself, particularly in a philosophical sense, he feels that disregard of spiritual values has led to a worship of money in the nation. Last Easter he devoted his column to Joseph of Arimathea, who asked Pilate for the body of Jesus. Sprague's own desire to be a free spirit and to decide great questions without fear or prejudice shone through the piece. "Most of us," he said, "are prisoners of our class, our creed, our associations. We tend to conform, adapting ourselves to whatever level we move in. Joseph was one of those rare souls who refused to be such a prisoner. The instinct of human charity broke through the restraints of narrow sectarianism. We might almost say that this Joseph was the first Christian. In a Christendom riven by multitudinous and contentious sects he has left too few descendants."

Korea and the "New" Japan

BY LAWRENCE K. ROSINGER

WHEN the Japanese peace treaty was signed in San Francisco on September 8, some commentators seemed to feel that the pact might affect the Korean situation to the advantage of the United Nations, at least psychologically. Today, more than four months later, the balance of military, diplomatic, and psychological strength in Korea appears broadly unaltered, and the future of the peninsula remains as unclear as before. But in a deeper sense things are not the same. The peace treaty, the subsequent American-Japanese security accord, and the earlier American mutual-defense pacts with the Philippines, Australia, and New Zealand are all part of the background for the gradual introduction of a re-armed and economically revived Japan as a factor in the Pacific. This will necessarily have repercussions in Korea, whether or not the war continues.

Some day, when more of the facts are known, we may be able to assess the impact of the peace treaty and pacts on the Korean cease-fire discussions. Perhaps the effects were slight, in view of the already numerous obstacles to an armistice, but there is some reason to think that the pact decisions and their execution may have stiffened the negotiators and made the proceedings more tortuous. The various pacts—like so many previous actions and counter-actions of one side or the other—further crystallized existing differences in the Pacific and narrowed the possibilities of compromise. This sharpening of the situation was implicit in the encounters between Gromyko and Acheson at San Francisco and in the public exchange of messages between Stalin and Mao Tse-tung on the eve of the conference, reaffirming the close ties between the two regimes and referring to the military guaranties of the Soviet-Chinese alliance.

Apart from its possible import for the cease-fire negotiations, the peace treaty contains clauses relating to Korea. Under its terms Japan recognizes Korean independence, and Korea—that is, in effect, South Korea—is included among the nations with which Japan expresses willingness to negotiate fisheries and commercial agreements and to which it is to extend most-favored-nation treatment. Japan also promises "to give the United Nations every assistance in any action it takes in accordance with the Charter. . . ." This clause is important as a reference to Korea, for it commits Japan to continue the aid given the United Nations forces in Korea prior to ratification of the peace treaty. It also furnishes a possible basis for more extensive or more formal Japanese participation in the Korean war at some future date, if the current cease-fire effort should not succeed.

Japan has already played a significant role in the war, not only as the crucial rear base from which the United States and United Nations have operated, but also as a formidable supplier of goods and services. For example, Japan furnished LST crews for the landings at Inchon in September, 1950, and the Japanese have also operated minesweepers off Korea. Most of Japan's help has been in the form of supplies, including machinery, metals, textiles, lumber, and chemicals. Japanese activities have ranged over a wide field, from the repair of damaged weapons and ships to the production of portable bridges, and Japan's metallurgical industries have handled large orders placed by the occupation authorities. From the outbreak of war in June, 1950, through July 29, 1951, American war-procurement orders of goods and services in Japan for the Korean operations totaled $385,000,000, and the July, 1951, figure of $53,000,000 was higher than for any other month up to that point. These orders, which continue to flow in, have created a Japanese war boom linked with Korea.

The prevailing American assumption—tinged with an element of doubt—is that a re-armed and economically revived Japan will serve actively in a Pacific front against communism without embarking on new adventures of its own. But some of the Pacific allies of the United States are less certain of this conclusion, and the recent defense pacts with the Philippines, Australia, and New Zealand were designed partly to reduce their fears.

The South Korean government has also expressed concern over Japan's future power. Although not invited to sign the San Francisco treaty—on the ground that Korea, as a former Japanese colony, had not been at war with Japan—the Rhee regime commented on the treaty draft last summer. South Korea reportedly asked Washington for the Japanese island of Tsushima lying between Japan and Korea and for a regional security agreement with the United States. It also asked that Japan should not be allowed to arm sufficiently to threaten Korean security. The formula advanced was that Korea and Japan should cooperate equally in Pacific defense. Since South Korea was in no position to obtain equality with Japan, this formula was probably in part an effort to strengthen Rhee's bargaining position with Washington and Tokyo. It is clear that, in the midst of more immediate problems, much Korean opinion remains fearful of Japan. This sentiment presumably influenced the official South Korean reaction.

LAWRENCE K. ROSINGER has written extensively on conditions in Asia. He is editor and a co-author of "The State of Asia." This is the second article in a symposium on the problems of peace in Korea. Next week Walter Sullivan, New York Times correspondent with the U. N., will describe the reconstruction task that lies ahead.

The real nature of Japanese-South Korean relations is suggested by recent conversations in Tokyo between representatives of the two governments. The purpose of the meetings, which began in October under occupation auspices, was to arrange a treaty of peace, amity, and commerce as a basis for the opening of diplomatic relations. The Rhee regime urged speedy discussion of a variety of subjects, but Japan seems to have shown little interest. In fact, the Pusan radio charged Tokyo with a desire to strengthen its position toward Korea by stalling until after the Japanese peace treaty takes effect. One question that is unclear is whether a Korean-Japanese military accord is also intended to result from the Tokyo discussions, which are now in abeyance but are scheduled to resume in February. The South Korean Foreign Minister touched on an aspect of the subject on November 24 when he declared that his government would never permit Japanese soldiers to enter Korea to fight Communists.

At present, of course, Japan can have no power of initiative in Korea, but any government in Tokyo, whether war-minded or peaceful, is certain to be deeply interested in an area so close to Japan. For this reason it may be useful to recall that Japan did not originally swallow Korea at one gulp but absorbed it only after protracted activity. The final act of annexation in 1910 was the product of two successful wars (with China in 1894-95 and with czarist Russia in 1904-05), supplemented by several decades of political intrigue in Korea. The point of these references to the past is not to predict that history will repeat itself but to suggest the importance of viewing a resurgent Japan in terms of decades rather than of the brief, controlled period of the occupation.

A REVIVAL of Japanese economic influence in Asia is involved in the American concept of Japan as the "workshop" of the region. Japan must of course export if it is to live, and Japanese industry can certainly supply much that Asian countries require. But economic influence—for example, in South Korea—could lead to political influence and ultimately to some form of political power. Asian nationalism constitutes a powerful counter-force. But former collaborationists continue to function politically in a number of areas, including South Korea, and it is conceivable that an alignment with a strong, independent Japan in a new "co-prosperity sphere" might seem attractive.

To the extent that Japan revives, it will have an increasingly strong bargaining position in relation to the United States. With more than eighty million people, a massive industry, and traditions of power, it may regard the San Francisco conference as only a small down-payment for its cooperation. This seems all the more possible in view of the weakness of the other Asian allies of the United States, such as the Rhee government, and the demands of the United States for speedy Japanese rearmament.

The conditions that might permit Japan to assume an active role in the Pacific area must be weighed against the many obstacles. The force of Asian nationalism has already been mentioned, and this, of course, includes Korean nationalism in both parts of the divided country. Another obstacle is the continued shakiness of Japan's economy, with the burden of rearmament likely to raise new difficulties. Again, the United States, from which Japan hopes to get more aid, may serve as a check on the disagreeable possibilities in Japanese policy. Whatever may be the ultimate intentions of some of its politicians, Japan is not today the militarized nation of the pre-war period. With respect to the Communist bloc on the continent, its attitude will be influenced by its pressing need for Chinese raw materials and a share of the China market. Japan's leaders and a majority of the people oppose communism, but Communist military power and political influence in Asia are important realities that Japan, with its exposed geographical position and memories of defeat, is likely to bear in mind.

The probability that for the present Japan will be circumspect in its foreign policy—to the extent that control is restored to Japanese hands—was underlined by the decision in Washington not to submit the peace treaty to the Senate in the last session of Congress, but to wait until the 1952 session. It is interesting to note the chief reason given for the State Department's action—the belief that if the cease-fire negotiations failed, the needs of a new Korean campaign would be better met by a Japan that remained an Allied base, as at present, than by a Japan that was, in the words of a New York Times correspondent, "a newly independent state struggling to regain her bearings."

In short, the ultimate effect on Korea of the Japanese settlement and the trend toward a Pacific pact is a matter of speculation. The peace and security treaties sharpen existing alignments in the Pacific but are at present no more than declarations of intention still to be carried out. In the long run Japan's leaders may be able to acquire new influence in the East, including Korea. Their opportunities for potentially dangerous activities, however, would be reduced by an early Korean peace, especially if this led to an adjustment of other outstanding issues in Asia.

BOOKS and the ARTS

HENRY ADAMS

The Mind and the Man

BY ELIZABETH STEVENSON

WHO reads letters now? Who writes them even? Yet for amusement, and for learning something about another time in the very atmosphere of that time's gossip, they cannot be surpassed. They beat histories, biographies, and novels for the acuteness of mood or tone. Farrar, Straus, and Young deserve thanks for the Great Letters Series. The third volume, following Keats and Cowper, is a selection by Newton Arvin from Henry Adams's previously published letters.* Here, in this sampling of his social rather than philosophic mind, is a good introduction to him.

The book is organized for the pleasures of reading. The letters are divided into five periods of Adams's life, each section headed by the editor's brief outline of the man's activities during that period. A list of identifications clarifies personal references.

An introductory essay by Newton Arvin summarizes Adams's life in such a way as to help break up the stereotyped image which continues to pass current as the truth about Henry Adams, having appeared recently in its most hackneyed form in "The Magnificent Yankee," in which "Mr. Adams" was a straw figure knocked over at regular intervals to enhance Wendell Holmes—a doubtful service to that robust democrat.

Arvin presents Adams more as an observer than as a prophet. He stresses the variety of his interests and the warmth of his sympathies rather than the blackness of his demonic insights. He shows him off as a letter-writer akin somehow to the very different Horace Walpole—a likeness Adams himself noticed. He exhibits him as the good traveler, enduring hardships when away from home with amazing cheerfulness and nonchalance to search out scenes which affected his imagination. And in judging some of the crotchets which afflicted Adams and make him difficult to resolve into a harmonious personality, Arvin shows acuteness. He suggests succinctly how personal tragedy could affect historical judgment. He indicates, too, the gradualness of the growth of Adams's pessimism, that slow process by which "Henry Adams moved from the great Unitarian synthesis of his fathers—from its pure, cold, arid, eighteenth-century rationality and optimism—to the mechanistic catastrophism with which he ended."

There are gaps and muffled transitions in the selection of the letters, since the book is a concentrated dose of the character, taste, intellect, prejudice of a man rather than a record of a whole life. The interesting Berlin episode of his youth is omitted. So also is the death of his sister Louisa, that first taste he had of irreconcilable evil. Left out is the crucial trip to Cuba in 1893 with Clarence King. Left out, the pleasing coda to his life—the hunting for and finding of twelfth-century songs in Paris.

Personal as the letters are, seeming to be good, spontaneous, unguarded talk, they do not contain all of Henry Adams. He was very shy of self-revelation. Some of it came out, disguised, in the novels, biographies, and "History." He could be more naked, for instance in "Esther" than in the first-person books, "Mont-St.-Michel" and "The Education." "Democracy" is his political ordeal; "Esther," his own, as well as his wife's, religious plight. And where one might least expect to find it, in the heavily documented, nine-volume "History of the United States," there are passages of lyrical intensity which tell as much about the subjective Henry Adams as any of these letters. One could trace his description of the New England privateers, lightly and dangerously rigged, from the "History" to "Esther," where it turns up again, this time as an image for the character of his heroine, and by private reference an image of his wife, Marian Adams.

But by presenting a fresh culling of letters Arvin has pulled Adams out of the portentous shadows. He has made it easy to listen to him. Reading the letters is like hearing his talk: bold, careless, but cutting to the center of things. "Havana is a gay ruin," he said, catching an essence in two words. "An engine house at night with two or three engines letting off steam and showing headlights" was the sight of a volcano at night in Hawaii. His friend, La Farge, was "a spectacled and animated prism." Stevenson, whom he could not like, was "an insane stork." Theodore Roosevelt, on a day when Adams was out of sorts with him—"a bore as big as a buffalo." The letters have the value of white-hot emotions expressed in picturesque, uninhibited language.

As Arvin says, he was "an ideologue touched with the poetic sense." He was a forever working mind. It is particularly exciting in these letters to see his historical imagination at work. Wherever he could find raw material for this special sense, he would swoop down and point out the connection never before seen; the conclusion never before reached; causes, consequences, and by-products; all expressed with living urgency. The past, in person or scene, seems to have just happened, or to be happening as one reads his works. He spoke, always, of Jefferson as if he had known him personally. He loved Albert Gallatin like a brother. He detested Napoleon. And his distrust of Alexander Hamilton was an intimate dislike.

Places no more than persons could escape his transforming eye. He settled in Washington when it still resembled, as he said, a happy village; yet he saw its future greatness and power. He visited Granada. All he could see there was its past; the fifteenth century surrounded him. In Samoa, "I felt as though I had got back to Homer's time, and were cruising about on the Aegean with Ajax."

He personified Tahiti and all Tahitian history in one image: "I don't mean that the place is gloomy, but just quietly sad, as though it were a very pretty woman who had got through her fun and her troubles, and grown old, and was just amusing herself by looking on, without caring much what happens. She has retired a long way out of the world, and sees only her particular friends, like me, with the highest introductions; but she dresses well, and her jewels are superb. In private I suspect she is given to crying because she feels so solitary."

In December, 1891, Henry Adams went to the opera in Paris one evening and recorded the experience in a letter to Elizabeth Cameron, to whom he could always write what meant most to him. A hundred years before, his grandfather, John Quincy Adams, had gone to hear a performance of the same opera. He had liked the opera, been haunted by its music, and had come to associate one song, a lament for the abandoned Richard, with his own abandonment by the people in the election of 1828. He wrote down this connection in his journal, with which Henry was familiar.

When Henry, in Paris, went to the revival of this old Grétry opera, he was charmed by the music, and also surrounded by associations. First, he put himself in the person of his grandfather; then he himself, in his own person, was there in that other time, listening to "Richard." "You know," he said to Mrs. Cameron, "what an awfully handsome young fellow Copley made me—with full dress and powdered hair, talking to Mme Chose in the boxes, and stopping to applaud 'Un regard de ma belle.'"

He had projected himself, through his imagination, into the past; or rather, he had extended the experience of his grandfather into his own life. The trait is illustrative. This intensity of imagination characterized his day-to-day observations. It is this imagination, buttressed by scholarship, which characterizes all his work: his "History," his biographies, the "Mont-St.-Michel," and "The Education." They are works constructed essentially by the shaping art. Such a passage tossed off carelessly to a far-off correspondent who might enjoy the reference exhibits the very generation of ideas.

The mind at work and the material on which it worked: both are here in the letters. The man and his time: the time presented with the flavor of bias; the man holding back something of himself, yet letting go intimacies he hardly knew he had revealed. If the letters do not have the high pitch and concentration of the books, if they do not show one the intensest Adams, at least they show the basis of development—the raw material from which he shaped the few great works that keep him an honorable thorn in the flesh of over-easy American optimism.

The books are products; the letters, process. But besides exhibiting an interesting mind forming itself, they deserve to be read for themselves. They are amusing in the best way—that is, seriously. They have depth of insight, but at the same time are witty, even about disaster. The great stretch of American history from the Civil War to the First World War had few such observers as Henry Adams. And apparently his pertinence is just beginning. We are more his contemporaries than his own correspondents were. It is as if he were writing his letters to us.

Mr. Acheson Defended

THE PATTERN OF RESPONSIBILITY. Edited by McGeorge Bundy from the Record of Secretary of State Dean Acheson. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.

IF HUMANITY—and more particularly the American people in an election year—were ruled by sweet reason, the publication of McGeorge Bundy's volume of selections from the public utterances of Dean Acheson might well settle forever the controversy over the merits and fitness for high office of the present Secretary of State. The selections are well chosen, the accompanying commentary is judicious and good-tempered—after reading them, no honest-minded citizen could fail to be convinced that virtually all the charges customarily advanced against Mr. Acheson are groundless. In presenting, chiefly in the Secretary's own words, a most able brief for the defense, Mr. Bundy has performed an essential public service. The record has now been put straight: the case should be closed.

Yet that is not quite the whole story. Besides the fact that the book has appeared rather late—corruption has replaced communism as the most promising pre-election issue, and the force of the opposition attack has shifted from the Department of State to the domestic failings of the Administration—one may question whether the bulk of Mr. Acheson's enemies are really interested in learning the truth. Essentially their opposition boils down to two things—a conviction that accusing one's political adversaries of "softness" to communism is good politics, and a profound personal dislike. Of the two, the latter is perhaps the more important. For the things about Mr. Acheson that drive his opponents to fury—his intellectual attainments, his good manners, his meticulous speech, and his uncompromising ethical standards, in a word, his personal superiority—are not likely to change. They are the essence of the man. By their mere existence they make nearly all the rest of Washington's political population look puny. And the fact that Mr. Bundy demonstrates the same qualities, that he comes from the same social and intellectual background, may hinder rather than assist him in his task of counsel for the defense.

Hence this reviewer for one regrets that Mr. Bundy should have felt obliged to direct his book primarily at the mass of Acheson-haters. The criticism, I grant, is eccentric and bears no relation to the realities either of politics or of the publishing business. Yet it is only honest to state that as I read on in Mr. Bundy's book, I became increasingly depressed. It seemed to me that both the author and his protagonist were tending to descend to a commonplace level of argument. They were not meeting the attack on ground they had chosen themselves but were simply rebutting a series of vulgar and frequently dishonest charges. It is disheartening—and a grim reflection on the state of American public life today—to hear Mr. Acheson defending his department before a group of newspaper editors in terms reminiscent of a football rally. And particularly so when this selection follows one totally different in character—a lofty, closely reasoned statement of his position on the Hiss case—which indicates what the Secretary is like when he permits himself to follow his true instincts.

And the same is true of Mr. Bundy. The preface—the only part of the book in which the author fully reveals his own personal attitude—is actually its best part. It is forthright, admirably reasoned, and independent—particularly in the passages in which Mr. Bundy lists his few but significant disagreements with Mr. Acheson. But the rest of the book does not maintain the same level. In the running commentary that connects the selections from the Secretary himself the tone is too cautious and “official,” the style is too bland, and too many crucial questions are skirted or omitted altogether.

Hence to Mr. Acheson’s friends and well-wishers—and the present reviewer counts himself among the latter—Mr. Bundy’s book makes rather strange reading. We are told all the things that we know already, we hear lengthy, sometimes tedious, answers to charges in which we have never believed, but our real questions remain unanswered. We do not get any further light on the things that have been troubling us about the public record of a Secretary whom we greatly admire. We find no comment, for example, on Mr. Acheson’s personal limitations in dealing with Europeans—no reflection of the fact that while his technical preparation within the Department of State is beyond compare, his foreign experience has been extremely limited. (A man who thoroughly understood the skeptical, highly critical realism of a European—or, indeed, of an Asian—would not say as flat-footedly as he does that the United States has no satellites “whose votes we control.” Nor would he speak so confidently of the possibility of organizing “truly independent national regimes” in Eastern Europe.) Some of these statements, of course, may be largely for the record, but if there is any difference between the Secretary in private and the Secretary in public, it does not pierce through Mr. Bundy’s commentary. And when we come to the latter’s statement that the American refusal to recognize Communist China or to vote for its admission to the United Nations was simply due to China’s failure to meet “basic standards of international behavior,” we really begin to wonder who’s fooling whom.

Mr. Bundy frankly recognizes that Secretary Acheson’s Far Eastern policy changed after the outbreak of the Korean war, and more particularly after the Chinese intervention. But the most dramatic (and to my mind, least justifiable) aspect of that change—the decision to strengthen Chiang’s forces on Formosa with arms and an American military mission—appears nowhere in the record as Mr. Bundy lines it up. Nor is there any hint that at least part of this change may have been a weary concession to merciless needling by the Secretary’s critics. (Mr. Acheson, after all, during the greater part of his secretaryship, has been fighting for his political life.) And the same consideration applies to the chapter on “security and loyalty in the Department of State.” We find no discussion of whether or not Mr. Acheson has occasionally allowed a man under suspicion to be thrown to the wolves—of why, for example, John Carter Vincent was demoted from Berne to Tangier with a cloud hanging over his name and no adequate opportunity to clear it.

But let none of the foregoing be misunderstood. It simply reflects the dissatisfaction of a questioning reader: it is not intended to cast doubt on the record of a great Secretary of State, and one, furthermore, whose actions have more frequently proved to be “right” than those of almost anyone else around these days. Mr. Acheson has suffered political martyrdom: his public career is a living illustration of his own warning that “evil” and “degradation” follow when “shrewd men . . . play on the minds and loyalties and fears of their fellows.” It is good that Mr. Bundy has set the record straight. And it is also good to know that in the Republican Party—of which Mr. Bundy, surprisingly enough, is a loyal member—there are men of his intelligence, political independence, and breadth of human understanding. Coaches and Coronets

OIDA. By Eileen Bigland. Duell, Sloan and Pearce. $3.75.

IN EVERY epoch since the widespread distribution of books, there has emerged a genre of writing—fiction, usually—which lies somewhere between the serious literature at the center and the masses of record and mere newsprint at the periphery. Its products are distinguished by a common subject matter rather than any individual quality, and since they exist in response to some deep social or psychological hunger, they enjoy an extravagant range and intensity of appeal. Thus the Gothic romance, with its possessed, irrational hero and its haunting threat of the unknown in human experience, came as a relief to the eighteenth century’s insistence on the all-sufficiency of reason and consciousness. A hundred years later the detective story, with its omniscient hero who always knew the answer, imparted authority and security to a generation of readers becoming less and less sure of everything it had taken for granted. Similarly, the rapidly urbanizing America before World War I found in an idealized cowboy and his wide-open spaces a nostalgia-image for the freedom it had lost; and today, when the earth gets smaller in every morning’s paper, science fiction has emerged to describe new worlds to get away to.

A century ago, when British society was still a three-layer cake of dukes, business men, and chambermaids, the romance of high life was born. There had always been memoirs by persons of quality, but they concealed more than they revealed, and though Disraeli’s novels were the first to deal familiarly with the private lives of peers, they were relatively discreet. It took the young lady who wore her hair like Alice in Wonderland and called herself Ouida to give the lending-library world what it was really waiting for. Her first story was called “Dashwood’s Drag.”

and was published when she was twenty. It was instantly popular, and its successors went on appearing for the next forty years. If Ouida's portrait of life among the coaches and coronets was less than documentary, if Kensington Gore and Belgravia had never known such recklessly gaming younger sons or lustroously evil countesses as hers, no matter. It was enough that in the pages of "Strathmore," "Under Two Flags," and "The Two Viscounts," the world at large could finally find out the wardrobe details of a duke's daughter, what a guardsman's dressing table looked like, and best of all, to what shockingly headstrong ends a titled head would go to get what it wanted.

So Ouida was read by millions, and with the fortune she made before she was thirty, she set up her notorious salon at the Langham Hotel. Here, surrounded by hot-house flowers, Longfellow, dozens of dogs, gold-braided guardsmen—who smoked in her presence—and as much blue blood as she could lure, she became not only the scandal of London but a figure more fantastic than any in her books. "Ouida in green silk, sinister, clever face, hair down, voice like a carving knife," said William Allingham; "elle était toujours affreuse," said the Duc de Dion; "curious, uppish, a little terrible, and pathetically grotesque," said Henry James. In her later years she settled in Italy, where her inane lawsuits—if her dog bit you, she sued—her shameless pursuit of royalty, and her lavish receptions kept her the rarest eccentric in Florentine society for decades, and where finally, in 1908, she died in poverty.

Theatrical, megalomaniac, entirely unrestrained by any self-knowledge, Ouida could not be the subject of a dull biography. Miss Bigland's is lively and full of detail, and if it tends to gush and fictionalize a little too much, this is not inappropriate in connection with its subject. Properly, the novels are treated only in relation to their author's career, though in a prefatory note Miss Bigland does protest the influence of her heroine on not only Furbank and Edith Wharton but Galsworthy, Dreiser, and even D. H. Lawrence. This is surely, affectionate and harmless as it is, playing that parlor game called Tradition and Individual Talent a little too earnestly.

KATHERINE MANSFIELD'S LETTERS TO JOHN MIDDLETON MURRY. Alfred A. Knopf. $6.50.

SEVERAL of last year's books, important or generally assumed to be important, have not, so far, been mentioned in these columns. They demand a closer examination than it is now possible to give them, but they should be commented on, if only in brief.

Ford Madox Ford's "The Good Soldier" was first published in 1915. Ford thought well of it: "I have always regarded this as my best book—at any rate as the best book of mine of a pre-war period." One of his friends remarked, acutely, referring to its tight structure and careful organization: "It is the finest French novel in the English language." It is not about soldiering, but scrutinizes the complicated relationships within a quartet composed of a wealthy American couple and an only slightly less wealthy English couple as they move from watering-place to watering-place in what now seems the halcyon Europe of the decade before 1914. It lacks the scope and the passion of the Tietjens series, in part because Ford's concern with form requires that the narrator be a rather imperceptive man to whom the moral horrors which surround him become only slowly apparent. Yet it is more satisfying than most contemporary fiction. Ford took his art seriously, and his seriousness shows, though it never oppresses.

According to Lawrence Durrell's note to "Aeolia," the Greeks consider Venezis one of their two greatest contemporary novelists. "Aeolia" is no novel but a charming series of childhood recollections of life in Anatolia before the Greek diaspora of 1914. These sketches do recapture a vanished and complex agrarian society in which—the sense of this fact is one of the delights of the book—myth and magic were as important in daily life as crops and the weather. The last scenes, when the author's family abandons its farm just before the Turks arrive, achieve a real pathos from which most writers today would shrink.

One should not read John Collier's omnibus of forty-nine short stories, "Fancies and Goodnights," all at once. What the jacket calls "these weird and fantastic" tales must be taken at widely separated intervals. Then one may not notice that even those which once seemed admirable are confections relying on the merely grotesque or macabre for subject matter and on new twists to the trick ending for plot. Their cleverness is overwhelming.

In contrast, the stories selected from the fifteen years of John Lehmann's English periodical, New Writing, bear rereading very well. They have great variety. Christopher Isherwood is represented by The Nowaks (one of "The Berlin Stories"); George Orwell by a fine fragment of autobiography, at once symbolic and first-rate reporting, Shooting an Elephant; and Rosamond Lehmann by a deft period-piece, The Red-haired Miss Daintreys. The contributions of Elizabeth Bowen, William Sansom, James Stern, and Denton Welch are all very good, though not as good as other stories they have written. And there are stories by seventeen additional "new" writers which are always more than competent, avoiding the contemporary American evils of slickness and the recording of simple sensitiveness.

Since I admire V. S. Pritchett's remarks on fiction, I wish I could admire his novel. "Mr. Beluncle" is an amusing full-length portrait of a rascal, a get-rich-quick operator of the London suburbs. It is beautifully written; the characters come fully to life. Numerous signs indicate, however, that it is meant to transcend these excellences. Indeed, they obtrude themselves. Yet it is difficult to tell what "meaning" the book is supposed to have. An anonymous reviewer in the London Times Literary Supplement, surveying all Pritchett's novels, suggested that each one gives the sense of a design or a purpose abandoned or forgotten halfway through. This judgment applies admirably to "Mr. Beluncle."

"Voyage to Windward," J. C. Furnas's long life of Robert Louis Stevenson, has every appearance—new material, full detail, the extirpation of ancient heresy—of a standard biography. Unfortunately it is written in a slightly old-fashioned and windy journalese. The facts about Stevenson and Mr. Furnas's seemingly excellent and fair assessment of them must be approached through sentences and diction which constantly offend the eye and ear.

I find it impossible to read all 701 closely printed pages of Katherine Mansfield's letters to John Middleton Murry. When Mr. Murry first edited these letters in 1928 he abridged some and omitted others; he also included many letters to other people. Now we have her letters to him, complete and unrelieved. Their relationship, with its many rejections, reversals, and resump-tions, is presented in all available detail, from her side, at least. Readers enamored of the quarrels and calamities of authors will like this book. It is first-rate in the snatches—sometimes only a sentence or two—when Katherine Mansfield was not worrying about the state of her soul or about how she felt or did not feel toward Murry. An old woman, a summer night, a fall of rain—these she could turn into a series of lovely fragments delightful to contemplate. Her sensibility brought something new to English writing, though I doubt that she was as important an artist as the editorial comment assumes. But the rest, that is, roughly, three-quarters of the book, is painful without any of the expected rewards of pain. Even if one reminds oneself regularly that Katherine Mansfield was often a sick woman, the epistolary "scenes," the long-drawn-out analyses of feelings which are often not clearly understood despite the clarity with which they are stated, the chronicle of a life which was largely a pilgrimage to some shrine impossible of access grow, in short time, embarrassing, then annoying, and then tedious.

ERNEST JONES

A Precious Brew

JAPAN IN WORLD HISTORY. By G. B. Sansom. Institute of Pacific Relations. $2.

THE Japanese have an expression, nani mo gozaimasen ga, which loosely translated means something like "I haven't anything at all to offer you and what I have is awful stuff, but"—please eat heartily, drink my beer, take over my house, etc., etc. To a people steeped in the lore of super-salesmanship this is ridiculous. Who will drink your beer if you tell him it is no good?

Since "Japan in World History," a composite of lectures delivered by Sir George Sansom in Japan, is saturated with the psychology of nani mo gozaimasen ga, it will not appeal to an American audience. The usual reaction will be, I think, "Well, this is certainly not Sansom at his best." Admirers of the fluent style, the deft touches of humor, the bold and sweeping intelligence characteristic of the author's "Japan: A Short Cultural History" and "The Western World and Japan" will be disappointed. They will find this book rambling, repetitious, sometimes unconvincing. They will be annoyed by the excessive humility: "I have no right . . . to pose as an authority on Japanese history. . . . We [foreigners] must think ourselves fortunate if Japanese historians will take the trouble to instruct us . . ."; "I ask your pardon"; "[my] rambling observations"; "these crude reflections." They may even be offended by an "excusing" of Japanese past blunders—for example, Yamagata's institution of the evil practice of reserving the posts of War and Navy Ministers to officers on the active list.

Nevertheless, this book provides us an opportunity to observe in action a man who knows Japan and the Japanese as few Westerners know them, making a contribution—very small, he would say—to the restoration of good relations between Japan and the West. He emphasizes as particularly important in this task the building of individual freedom, liberal scholarship, and general tolerance in Japan, in whose defense the Japanese failed so miserably during the 1930's.

His way of doing this is most interesting, and surely discomfiting to those who have advocated and practiced "high-pressure" methods of "reeducat-ing" the Japanese. For there is no high pressure in Sansom. He is no high priest of democracy pontificating virtue to those who failed. As an Englishman he admits to citizenship in a country with a long democratic tradition, but he refuses to be smug on this score. Western democracy, he feels, owes as much to luck as to wisdom. "Quarrelsome, violent, disorderly people," goaded by food shortages out of feudalism into capitalism and trade, unable to organize themselves because neither king nor barons nor clergy nor merchants proved strong enough to impose one will on an entire country, finally arrived at a "defective and partial tolerance," "the only hope of understanding between nations as between persons."

The Japanese, not being so peculiar or so isolated as Westerners have thought, came a long way in this direction. That they did not come farther may be due more to their strengths than to their weaknesses—a prevailing sense of duty, the lack of religious strife, no desperate need for trade, the "miracle" of Tokugawa order and discipline. At any rate it was not due to any lack of political sense or capacity or virtue in the Japanese people. Sir George finds no people better fitted for "cultivating the arts of peace," endowed as they are with courage, determination, industry, a high regard for duty, and a strong aesthetic sense. "The great tradition of humanism is not a monopoly of Western thought." Obviously totalitarianism—or democracy—could have happened anywhere, to any people.

Thus does Sir George Sansom, without arrogance or insult, hand his Japanese audience the cup of freedom and tolerance and ask them to drink deeply. They should understand, even if Americans do not, that this brew is precious in inverse ratio to the humility with which it is presented.

HILARY CONROY

Books in Brief

THE WORLDLY MUSE, AN ANTHOLOGY OF SERIOUS LIGHT VERSE. Edited by A. J. M. Smith. Abelard Press. $3.50. Mr. Smith, not as well known as he ought to be this side of his native Canadian border, is a bright gay poet who has here brought together many different kinds of bright gay pieces to form an altogether delightful anthology. Too bad this one could not have had a little more pre-Christmas publicity. Hardly to be recommended as Lenten fare, but comes the springtime and a few friends having birthdays, you could hardly find a happier present; it would also be a very good gift for yourself, any time.

NORTH WITH THE SPRING. By Edwin Way Teale. Dodd, Mead. $5. Mr. Teale, well known as a writer and naturalist, here describes how he realized a common dream: following the spring from Florida northward to the timber line. A strenuous man as well as a lively and exceptionally well-informed one, he made a journey of seventeen thousand miles, and took the trouble to climb mountains, penetrate swamps, and talk with natives all along the way. He tells us informally about what he saw, and being versed in the whole field of natural history, he is always ready with the facts or the parallels which will explain what everything means. Anyone planning such a trip will find him an indispensable guide, and for those of us who cannot go an imaginary trip in his company is the next best thing. Birds, beasts, plants, and insects are duly noted, as well as those grand features of the landscape which are all the ordinary traveler is aware of. Like Thoreau, Mr. Teale is always amazed to discover "how much is going on" in any field or wood. There are also expert photographs by the author.

Drama

VERY few attempts have been made to revive the plays of Eugene O'Neill on Broadway. Many of them were commercially successful as well as highly esteemed, but there has always been a minority which refused to admit that O'Neill's virtues were genuine or that they would long seem so.

The company at the City Center has now opened the question with a first-rate production of "Anna Christie," and the result is strong evidence on the side of those who have sturdily maintained O'Neill's claim to be, of all American playwrights, the one most likely to last. In the Times Mr. Atkinson remarked that though this particular play is perhaps not its author's best, it is certainly better than any new play current. This is an obvious fact, and, what is possibly more important, a capacity audience was delighted with it.

There is of course an unimportant sense in which every old play—even a classic—is "dated." In that sense Aeschylus and Shakespeare are "dated." Their techniques are no longer currently practiced; they reflect once current intellectual and emotional preoccupations where the emphasis is not quite ours. In fact, a classic might be defined as a work of art which has become superficially dated while remaining essentially valid. The important thing is that its conformity to a mode should be only an incidental rather than a fundamental cause of its original popularity. And that proves to be precisely the case with "Anna Christie." If it had been written today by a playwright of O'Neill's gifts it would not be precisely what it is. Thirty years ago tales dealing with the dregs of society were coming into fashion. A heroine who had served her time in a bawdy house seemed a more romantic and possibly a more significant figure than she would seem today. Yet in watching a performance of this particular play one is hardly aware of this aspect of it. It is simply an absorbing tale and genuinely "strong," not merely something which seemed so because it was the sort of thing called "strong" at a particular time.

The present production is excellent not merely in the playing of the individual parts but in its whole conception. The very fact that O'Neill's plays are full of violent emotions directly presented always tempts to overplaying, and the temptation is probably even harder to resist in the case of a revival which may seem to present the problem of "putting over" a dated play. Wisely, this production is subdued rather than overemphasized, and the result is to give full effectiveness to the strong colors of the script itself. Celeste Holm gives a quiet, relaxed performance of Anna; Art Smith, a very effective one in the difficult role of her father; Kevin McCarthy, a really outstanding interpretation of Mat Burke, the flamboyant Irish "playboy of the Western world" who finds himself called upon to face a near-tragic dilemma. It is no secret that O'Neill's dialogue is his weakest point and that it is sometimes difficult to make it seem convincing as real speech, but I have seldom seen any production of any of his plays which succeeded better in making that dialogue fit the mouths of the characters who speak it.

As one watches the play unfold again one realizes clearly enough both why it was one of the most popular of its author's works and why he himself always resented the fact. What he obviously wanted to write was a tragedy about the sea as one embodiment of the irrational force to which the most imposing human beings fall possessed and willing victims. What happens is that the simpler story of a man's relation to a woman takes over. It is in this man and this woman, not in the metaphysical idea, that the audience becomes interested. The father's last denunciation of the sea passes almost unnoticed because Anna and Mat have become reconciled. Thus what was intended as a mystical tragedy becomes a love story with a happy ending. In other words, "Anna Christie" is a lesser work than O'Neill wanted to write, but it is also one which probably pleases its audiences better. Perhaps these audiences are right as well as wrong.

"PAL JOEY" in revival has been dressed up with dance numbers and elaborate settings, but the additions are appropriate as well as smart and the basic line has not been changed. Vivienne Segal plays the part again of the older woman. She is the star of the show, and her singing of "Bewitched, Bothered, and Bewildered" is as good as ever. So is the song. Helen Gallagher as Gladys the night-club girl is the second star. Harold Lang dances his part well, but he is simply not Pal Joey. Though he tries hard he never loses the air of the male ingenue, the innocent, well-brought-up youth who strives to please. I'm afraid a real Pal Joey would look upon this impersonation with a quizzical and irreverent eye. M. M.

BACH'S St. John Passion is beautifully sung by the Robert Shaw Chorale, Collegiate Chorale, and soloists conducted by Shaw (RCA Victor). The performance is reproduced not only with beauty of sound but with admirable balance and clarity, except in one instance where the chorus can't be heard clearly behind the solo bass. I question Shaw's reason for using English instead of German: neither for all the singers nor for all the listeners is this a performance "to affirm and quicken a faith," requiring that the story be "carried in the living language of the singer and listener" (and does the use of Latin make the Mass less effective in affirming and quickening the faith of Catholics?). Also, as a mere lay listener I find myself questioning a few details of the performance—the solemnity of Pilate's "Behold the man!"; the driving tempos of some of the chorales. And as a mere lay listener I am as usual moved not by the arias (except "Es ist vollbracht") but by the recitative and arioso passages, and most of all by the choral portions—especially the magnificent opening chorus and the chorales.

"INDIAN SUITE"

By Edward MacDowell

Ever since its first performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1896 this lovely and melodic suite has been a great concert hall favorite throughout the world. Each of the fascinating five sections is based on genuine Indian themes—legends, festivals, war dances, romances and sorrows. 10" A.R.S. recording.

"2nd SYMPHONY"

By Walter Piston

Composed in 1943, performed by the Boston Symphony, NBC Symphony, N. Y. Philharmonic, Philadelphia Symphony and other leading orchestras—winner of the New York Music Critics Circle Award in 1944-45, this richly rhythmic score has won international fame for its composer. 10" A.R.S. recording.

SINCE the last war a great musical awakening has electrified the music-loving world—a sudden realization that the foremost music being written today is American music—and that American composers have been writing enjoyable melodies, important music for the past 200 years! In all the great concert halls the most famous orchestras, conductors, soloists, chamber groups are performing this music for delighted audiences.

And now an outstanding non-profit institution has embarked on a program of creating high fidelity recordings of 200 years of American music! Every form of musical expression is included in this program—symphonic, choral, instrumental and chamber works, folk-music, theatre music... music of America at work and at play; music of America growing, laughing... music born of the love of liberty and the love of fun, the love of good living and the love of God. Whatever your tastes—here is music for you!

HOW THIS MUSIC CAME TO BE RECORDED

Recently, the directors of the renowned Alice M. Ditson Fund of Columbia University awarded a substantial grant to create the non-profit Ditson Musical Foundation, whose sole purpose is to record and release each month a new full-frequency recording of American music, on Long Playing records.

ARE THE RECORDS EXPENSIVE?

No, the contrary. Because the Ditson Musical Foundation made its recordings available at once to the American Recording Society (sole distributing agent for the Foundation's records) they are priced below most L.P.'s of comparable quality—only $4.35 for 10" records, and $4.95 for 12" records. The American Recording Society Philharmonic Orchestra engages the finest available conductors and artists, and all recordings are made with the latest high-fidelity equipment, and pressed directly from a limited number of silver-sputtered masters.

HOW THE SOCIETY OPERATES

Your purchase of either of the Long-Playing records offered above for only $1.00 does not obligate you to buy any additional records from the Society—ever! However, we will be happy to extend to you the courtesy of an Associate Membership. Each month, as an Associate Member, you will be offered an American Recording Society recording by a famous American composer, at the special Club price. If you do wish to purchase any particular record, you need merely return the form provided for that purpose.

FREE RECORDS OFFERED

With each two records purchased at the regular Club price you will receive an additional record of comparable quality ABSOLUTELY FREE. However, because the number of records which can be pressed from silver-sputtered masters is necessarily limited, we urge you to mail the coupon at once!

(Bach Guild) also has impressive choral passages, including another magnificent opening chorus, and in addition an engaging soprano aria. His Easter Oratorio (Bach Guild) has a buoyant and radiant opening Sinfonia and closing chorus and a good Adagio for oboe and strings, but longer stretches of uninteresting solo singing. The performances of these works by the Vienna Akademischer Chor, soloists, and a chamber orchestra under Prohaska's direction are excellent.

After the beautiful music by Vivaldi that I know the unfamiliar oratorio "Juditha Triumphans" (Period) is disappointingly uninteresting; but there is more interesting life in his "Dixit" (Period). Both works are excellently performed by Italian soloists, chorus, and orchestra under Angelo Ephrikian's direction.

The same musicians give us equally good performances of a group of fine pieces by Monteverdi: "Laudate Dominum," "Ut Queant," "Beatus Vir," and an unidentified work that follows "Beatus Vir" (Period).

Another disappointment to me is the group of Purcell works—"Te Deum," "Bell Anthem," "Jubilate" in D, and "Oh Sing Unto the Lord"—that are not made more attractive by the Purcell Performing Society of Cleveland directed by John Reymes King (Allegro). A sustained organ note between the words "His pasture" and "O go your way" in the "Jubilate" seems incorrect.

The same group—whose members are not good enough for solo singing, but sound better together except for the shrillness of the sopranos—is heard on a record, Sacred Music of the Seventeenth Century (Allegro), in several beautiful pieces by Orlando Gibbons, a few moderately interesting ones by Matthew Locke, and some uninteresting ones by Peter Philips.

Byrd's Mass for five voices (Allegro) is lovely, though less impressively so than the one for four voices that I reported on last year. Perhaps the difference is in the less lovely vocal sound produced by the Nonesuch Singers of Bristol, England, under Roland Dale Smith's direction—the sopranos being shrill. On the same record are a few pieces of Byrd's keyboard music, most of them not very interesting, and played by John Reymes King on the organ, which doesn't seem to be the best instrument for the purpose.

On another record, Choral Masterpieces of the Renaissance (Period), the Nonesuch Singers sing two fine sacred pieces by Victoria and a couple of less interesting ones by Josquin; the French Circle Choir of Bristol, a good chorus directed by P. R. Banham, sings a few charming French secular pieces; and the Open Score Society, a chorus of men and boys that is good except for the altos, is directed by Francis Cameron in a beautiful sacred piece by Byrd, a couple of good ones by Farrant, a couple by Gibbons that are fair, and an uninteresting one by Redford.

Victoria's Masses "Quam Gloriosum" and "O Magnum Mysterium," of which the first is the more impressive, are sung by the Welch Chorale, whose sopranos are not good (Allegro).

I would skip Buxtehude's Missa Brevis and other pieces, the singing of the Hastings Chorale whose sopranos are shrill and tenors are coarse, and recording which produces a strong hum (Allegro).

Benjamin Britten's early "Te Deum," sung by the Washington Cathedral Choir of men and boys, and his later Hymn to St. Cecilia, sung by the Chamber Chorus of Washington, are more engaging than his Ceremony of Carols, sung by the boys of the Washington Cathedral Choir (WCFM). The solo boy soprano voices are not agreeable; otherwise the singing under Paul Callaway's direction is good.

A mere listener like myself to a work like Alban Berg's "Der Wein" can say only, as I did in my review, that the performance seems good. It takes someone like the reader who has written me about that statement to feel able to assure me "that the performance of 'Der Wein' is quite bad. I know the work intimately, have analyzed it, and have followed the recording several times with the score. As in Janssen's recording of the Suite from 'Wozzeck,' a great many points fail to come through clearly which are important for the music to make any kind of sense; there is pointless editing (as in the 'Wozzeck' recording, where some thirteen measures of the last section are missing); and Miss Boerner manages to sing the correct notes of the opening phrase, but from there on it is catch-as-catch-can to the point of singing wrong words (seinen for meinen, etc., etc.)." My correspondent, a composer who is a practitioner of the twelve-tone technique, also comments on Alfred Frankenstein's explanation of the twelve-tone-row procedure of Berg's piece, which I found insufficient, and his analysis of its structure, which I found questionable, contending that they "can be little else, since Frankenstein's lecture is based not upon his own observations of what is actually taking place in the music, but upon René Leibowitz's 'questionable' and 'insufficient' books." As for the music itself, in which I found no expressive relation to the words, my correspondent, an admirer of Berg's powers and certain of his works, thinks "Der Wein" is "dull and completely unsuited to the text and the medium."

Progressive Education Condemned

Dear Sirs: In commenting on your recent series Battle for Free Schools, I should like to point out that, like many other issues of the day, that of "progressive education" suffers from clear-cut definitions and postulations. . . . In discussions with teacher colleagues, who consider themselves champions of "modern education" or "progressive education" I am cavalierly assured that the Activity Program as now practiced is not really the Activity Program; that when they, the progressives, speak of the Core Curriculum, they do not mean the "thing" which is now masquerading as such; that we do not now have in our schools an even reasonable facsimile of what they intended.

In this manner the proponents of progressivism have made themselves invulnerable. The weaknesses revealed in the implementation of their program are attributed to forced deviation from the ideal, while the good points arise in spite of conservative teachers and inadequate supplies.

Let there be no mistake about it. I am very much concerned with a professional problem. If, as some of the progressives charge, criticism of their program plays into the hands of the enemies of the public school, we have to take this calculated risk. It is more important to have a sound educational program than to present a united front to the enemy.

The heart of the progressive doctrine is "Consider the whole child." However, as long as this ideal means all things to all teachers, we will continue to have perfect agreement on the desirability of change, but little or no agreement on the direction of change.

We, of the "traditional" camp, postulate the indispensability of the fundamental skills. Without the essential learning tools the child is helpless and compromised, and the boast of "keeping him happy" becomes a grim joke. It seems gratuitous to state that no one objects to a well-integrated child enjoying his learning experiences. The traditional teacher might be characterized as one who insists the schools exist primarily for learning. To the best of his ability he makes the learning experiences happy ones. The "modern" teacher, on the other hand, is willing to sacrifice learning to keep the child well-integrated and happy (sometimes with the consoling thought that learning may come later). Here I too am guilty of oversimplification, but obviously I cannot develop the full thesis in this letter.

Unless and until the progressives can successfully integrate the fundamental skills into their program, the program is educationally unsound. I am aware that some of the progressives claim that their products are well-versed in the essential tools, even superior to the traditional product. However, there is daily evidence that runs counter to this claim.

One of the stranger aspects of the whole controversy is the fantastic charge that progressive education makes for regimentation and statism. My criticism is that with their excessive emphasis upon the individual's progress, the progressives willingly sacrifice the interests of the larger group. It is a common experience today to have in a class a pupil retarded by one or two years in arithmetic slowing up the progress of the class as a whole, all for the purpose of keeping the child with his age group.

This leads logically to the doctrine of "no failures" and, ultimately, to 100 per cent promotion. With one wasteful stroke the elementary school has freed itself of all troublesome problems. That the problem reappears in aggravated form in the high schools doesn't seem to trouble the progressives in the elementary grades at all. Unless a miracle occurs to galvanize high-school teachers into spirited action, the fundamental skills may become college subjects.

Shippers' Costs

Dear Sirs: Aleine Austin in her article The Revolt Against Joe Ryan, which appeared in your December 1 issue, points out the difference between our contract and that of the International Longshoremen's Association on the East

A MOTHER writes from Sing Sing's DEATH HOUSE:

"We said, and we say again, that we are victims of the greatest type of political frame-up ever known in America."

—Ethel Rosenberg.

SHOULD THEY DIE — Or Are They Innocent?

Ethel and Julius Rosenberg, parents of two small children, are the only persons ever sentenced to death by a U. S. civil court for alleged espionage. Axis Sally, Tokyo Rose and other self-confessed traitors were spared their lives. Are the Rosenbergs victims of McCarthy-like hysteria? Did a brother help to convict a sister to save his own life?

TIME IS SHORT — Get the Facts Now!

In a pamphlet published by the National Committee to Secure Justice in the Rosenberg Case, Mr. William Reuben, a crusading journalist who "broke" the Trenton Six case, has cast grave doubt on the government's case against the Rosenbergs. The Rosenbergs may never see another winter if their appeal is denied.

DO THESE THINGS—TODAY

1. Write for copies of the pamphlet, "To Secure Justice in the Rosenberg Case."
2. Write or call for speakers.
3. Write President Truman and Attorney-General McGrath asking that justice be done in the Rosenberg Case.
4. Send funds to the Committee for legal and publicity expenses.

Coast. But from this she draws what seems to me the erroneous conclusion that it costs more to do business on the West Coast and that, therefore, "the employers have everything to gain by maintaining the status quo on the Eastern docks."

It is difficult for us to lay hands on cost figures for the industry. However, a California Senate Fact-Finding Committee on San Francisco Bay Ports has just issued its final report, in which are presented the following figures for stevedoring costs:

Port	Loading	Discharging
Philadelphia	$5.69	$6.12
New York	5.28	6.00
Norfolk	4.81	5.85
Baltimore	4.44	5.92
San Francisco Bay	4.30	4.95

According to this report stevedoring costs in San Francisco are lower than those for any one of the four major East Coast ports shown, both for loading and discharging.

I would conclude that despite what are probably the lower labor costs on the East Coast, shippers actually are stuck for a higher cost owing to the loading racket and other similar added costs. This is not to say that East Coast employers have everything to gain by tossing out the racketeers and substituting a decent set-up such as we have on the West Coast. I am simply trying to set the record straight.

In general, the article is a good one.

It might have been useful to analyze the composition of the fact-finding board which is now holding hearings in New York. I believe that such an analysis would have shown that the cards are stacked against the strikers in the board as well as elsewhere.

An Appeal for Struik

Dear Sirs: As The Nation so well remarked in its excellent article of November 24, Honor Thy Informer, by Joseph E. Garland, a fire has indeed been started in the native state of the late Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes. The case of Professor Dirk J. Struik, internationally known mathematician and a member of the faculty of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology for twenty-five years, has aroused his fellow-citizens to take decisive action on his behalf.

Professor Struik, as Nation readers know, has been indicted, under a 1919 state law never previously invoked, for allegedly advocating the violent overthrow of the governments of Massachusetts and of the United States. Believing this indictment to be a potential threat to freedom of expression, we, the undersigned, have joined with over forty others—professors, clergymen, and other citizens of Massachusetts—to form a defense committee whose purpose is to raise funds for Professor Struik's legal defense.

Costs of the trial alone are expected to run into many thousands of dollars. The need for funds is therefore urgent and must be met through private contributions. We appeal to all freedom-loving people to give to this cause as generously as possible. Contributions may be sent to Mrs. Mary M. Leuc, 258 Mt. Vernon St., West Newton 65, Mass., or to Dr. George Sarton, 5 Channing Place, Cambridge 38, Mass.

Hannah Bloom Commended

Dear Sirs: Your readers may be interested to know that recently the liberal caucus of the Los Angeles Democratic County Central Committee passed unanimously a resolution which read in part

Whereas, in The Nation magazine for December 29, 1951, there appears an article by Hannah Bloom in which it is revealed that Alexander Schullman and A. L. Wirin, having proclaimed a continuing of their struggle for justice for all, are being attacked and pilloried by many forces, among these being organizations whose own rights have in the past and will in the future be concerned, and for which they should be commended rather than censured, now

Be it resolved that the liberal caucus of the Los Angeles Democratic County Central Committee does hereby extend deserved recognition and commendation to Alexander Schullman and A. L. Wirin as the principals, and to Hannah Bloom and The Nation for disseminating the information as a great service to the public.

Cooperative Hospital

Elk City, Oklahoma

A LAW suit pending in the District Court of western Oklahoma brings into sharp focus inherent differences between a prepayment plan for medical services and the fee-for-service theory of most private physicians. Brought by the Farmers' Union Hospital Association against the Beckham County Medical Society, the suit is the climax of twenty years of struggle among the doctors serving the 20,000 people of the area.

The Farmers' Union Hospital Association operates the Community Hospital in Elk City, a typical plains town of some 8,000 people. A cooperative venture, the hospital was started over twenty years ago by Dr. Michael Shadid. A prepayment plan was the essential difference between this hospital and other hospitals in the country at the time. As it has evolved, a family owning a $100 lifetime membership in the hospital pays dues each year according to the number of persons in the family, the maximum being $40. For this, members receive free medical care whether or not they are patients in the hospital or clinic, as well as certain discounts on dental, laboratory, and X-ray work, on room and board in the hospital, and on nursing.

The Community Hospital stands as the first successful attempt to combine prepayment of medical bills with group practice of doctors in an organization financed and operated by the patients who use its services. This idea was so foreign to the thinking of most physicians in 1930, and is today, that they have been fighting the plan all the years of the hospital's existence.

Elk City and the surrounding territory late in 1929 was a grim place. Merchants along Main Street were little better off than the tight-lipped farmers who came to their stores asking again for credit. If illness hit these people they often found themselves wiped out financially. Doctors, what few there were, had patients living thirty to forty miles from their offices. Many farm families actually had no access to a physician's care; to consult a specialist they must go to Oklahoma City or Amarillo, Texas, a hundred miles away.

Seeing these conditions, Michael

Shadid, a Syrian-born doctor who had been in the area for twenty years, became obsessed with an idea. He wanted to establish a cooperative hospital where members could pay in advance for illness and therefore budget their medical expenses. He was encouraged to go forward with his plans by a group of progressive farmers and was later given additional support by the Farmers' Union in Oklahoma.

Beginning with a small one-story building and 300 member families, the Community Hospital-Clinic has grown in a little over twenty years to a well-equipped seventy-five-bed hospital, with a new adjoining out-patient clinic building containing thirty examining rooms, X-ray machines, a laboratory, a blood bank, a pharmacy, and a polio ward. The staff consists of seven physicians and two dentists. There are now 2,600 member families.

From the very first Doctor Shadid realized he would get no help from other local doctors. As his plans progressed and the hospital became a reality, their indifference changed to bitterness and then to a professional boycott. Soon after the hospital opened its doors, the Beckham County Medical Society, of which Doctor Shadid had been a member for many years, dissolved and some months later formed again without him. No other member of the hospital's staff has since been admitted to the county society, membership in which is a prerequisite to membership in the A. M. A. Staff doctors have also been barred from postgraduate courses because they were not members of their local society.

The Community Hospital has always had difficulty in obtaining doctors because of the boycott, but the local society has never brought any charges against the quality of the medical care given by the hospital. What the society objects to is the dues plan and the payment of salaries to staff doctors.

Medical economics, as well as the art of medicine, has undergone great changes in this century. Until 1900 both were represented by the "family doctor," an individual enterpriser who undertook to treat all types of human ills. He gave his services to his patients as they needed it and collected what they could afford to pay. But this simple economic system became inadequate as the art of medicine advanced. The vast accumulation of knowledge caused the growth of specialists who developed great skills in a limited field. Now a patient may find it necessary to consult several doctors during the course of one illness. He may have to make use of technicians, laboratories, and hospitals. The old financial arrangement has been continued, however, and for each service the patient receives a separate bill, the sum total of which may leave him in debt for years. The Community Hospital has combined all these services under one roof and offered them on a prepayment plan.

Unfortunately it did this years before the idea of medical insurance was generally accepted. Today there is nothing startling about the prepayment plan on which Dr. Michael Shadid founded the first cooperative hospital in the country. Blue Cross and similar schemes are known to everyone, and most physicians have come to accept the idea of medical insurance in some form. Nevertheless, the boycott against the Community Hospital has continued, as a penalty, doubtless, for being a pioneer in the field. The younger doctors on the staff have suffered from this boycott, and it was largely in their interest that the Farmers' Union Hospital Association, which operates the Community Hospital, finally brought suit against the Beckham County Medical Society.

The American Medical Association, which has long been the champion of the fee-for-service plan, has been fighting the Community Hospital since its inception. The association's attitude is based on the idea that the doctor will, in part at least, have been removed. The role of the American Medical Association will be more clearly defined as that of the guardian of medical standards and ethics, not of medical economics.

THE SYMBOLIC SIGNIFICANCE OF THE FLAMES that spread through Cairo last Saturday was not lost on the commentators of press and radio. There has been much talk since then of how to quench the "fires of nationalism" so as to protect the Suez Canal and the safety of the Western world. But the blaze may have done more than destroy foreign-owned property and demonstrate the lawlessness of the mob. For while it consumed the faded, Victorian-Oriental grandeur of Shepheard's Hotel—as perfect a symbol of the end of empire as could well be devised—it also illumined the whole Middle Eastern scene, making visible broad political contours which have been obscured by detail, by emphasis on treaty rights, and the safety of the Canal. Seen from Washington, the blaze clearly revealed, for instance, that no defense strategy based on Africa—no ports or bomber bases, no pacts—will be worth their weight in sand while nationalist passions run unappeased. It revealed, too, the uselessness of trying to secure these things through deals made with compliant governments: the rulers themselves are in equal danger from the flames. Finally, it revealed the folly of continuing to support the desperate, rear-guard efforts of imperialism in retreat—in Egypt, but in Tunisia too, and presently in Morocco, to mention only its African battlefield. *

THE WAY IS NEITHER PLEASANT NOR SAFE, though hardly more ugly or dangerous than the way of the French in Tunis or the British in Ismailia. It involves acceptance by the Western Allies of certain facts that cannot be altered by force or money or reason. It means recognizing nationalist rebellion and deciding to work with it, even though it is directed against the West. What Britain did with timely wisdom in India, Britain and France will have to do in North Africa, and under much less favorable circumstances, for once the mob is in the streets any pacific gesture looks like capitulation. But experience has shown in India and Israel how fast hatred disappears when the "oppressor" turns friend, and the same change could take place in Egypt. Counsels such as these may be written off in Washington as unrealistic, jeopardizing security and surrendering to open violence. To urge such a course on an ally is doubly difficult. But what is the alternative? Force to the limit? Full-fledged war against Egypt? War spreading across North Africa? It would seem as though no outcome could so completely wreck the grand strategy which our policy is designed to support.

SENATOR KEFAUVER'S ANNOUNCEMENT that he is a candidate for the Democratic nomination for the Presidency and will campaign on the "paramount issue" of peace will be greeted with enthusiasm by all voters anxious to have as wide a choice as possible in the 1952 election. Senator Kefauver is an excellent politician, with a good sense of timing, a rough-and-ready realism, and the all-important will to win. Thanks to his boldness, it seems likely that the democratic situation will be clarified far enough in advance of the convention to make possible a significant test of trends within the party. If it had not been for Senator Kefauver, President Truman would probably have remained noncommittal as long as possible. Now there is a real stir of activity at Blair House, and much talk that Governor Adlai E. Stevenson may be induced to become a Truman-blessed candidate. In Senator Kefauver, Governor Stevenson, and Justice William O. Douglas the Democratic Party has three potential candidates well above the level of leadership represented by Mr. Truman and more acceptable to liberal elements within the party. We hope that Governor Stevenson and Justice Douglas will follow Senator Kefauver's lead and give their friends a chance to support them.

LAST WEEK WE SUGGESTED THAT JUSTICE Douglas was available as a possible Democratic nominee. This view has been circumstantially confirmed by the Justice's bold and challenging talk to the Overseas Press Club in New York on January 24. "We are looking disaster in the face," he warned. "You can win Asia with affection, but you can't buy Asia with dollars or get it with guns and bullets." In direct criticism of the State Department, Justice Douglas charged that it had identified itself "with forces that are against the great masses of people in these countries." Calling for assistance to the Asian masses "at the village level" and for measures to improve their living standards by 1 or 2 per cent, he said: "We must make Point Four an entering wedge of an American management revolution. . . . Unless we stop the Communist tide that way, we are going to drift into a situation where the political balance will get into Communist hands. . . . All they have to do is to wait and they will win by a default." The United States, he insisted, had missed a great opportunity when it sent Premier Mossadegh home empty-handed: if we had given him support we would have made "every little goatherd in Persia love America." Asked to comment on the significance of recent happenings in North Africa, Justice Douglas replied: "I would certainly tie my kite to some of those Moroccan fellows rather than the French." Finally, to round out this fine talk, he declared, in reply to a question, that he thought Winston Churchill was responsible for our rebuff to Mossadegh. After this speech all we can say is that if Justice Douglas is not available for the nomination, then the art of communicating political intentions has been given a new twist.

THINKING HAS ALWAYS BEEN SUSPECT IN high places, and with some reason, but when it is banished from the schools then the citizens should, we think, sit up and take notice. A case in point is the recent action of James T. McGeough, principal of East High School in Pawtucket, Rhode Island, suspending the charter of UNESCO Thinkers, a student club formed to study the work of the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization. Mr. McGeough moved promptly when he read in the pages of the Providence Visitor, official publication of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Rhode Island, that UNESCO may be under "atheistic control." This horrid possibility arises from the fact that a scholar assigned to prepare a history for UNESCO is, in the Visitor's opinion, an "atheist." When his attention was called to the fact that UNESCO enjoys the official support of the United States, McGeough retorted: "This is a Christian country, and do you think it is a good thing for students to be involved with an organization that denies the existence of God?" It is pleasant to be able to report that McGeough's bigotry has met with the firm opposition of Monsignor Frederick G. Hochwalt, general secretary of the National Catholic Educational Association, who not only defended the "high moral tone" of UNESCO but reminded its critics that the preamble and constitution were largely the work of Jacques Maritain, noted French Catholic philosopher. McGeough, a former teacher and athletic coach in the school system, is said to owe his appointment to the local Democratic machine, which, as The Nation reported last summer (June 16), tells the Pawtucket school authorities what to do.

ROBERT A. (MR. REPUBLICAN) TAFT, THANKS to his gyrations on the subject of McCarthyism, is rapidly forfeiting the reputation he once enjoyed as a forthright and upright man, concerned about the decencies of public life, and is revealing himself as just another politician. In March, 1951, he disgusted many of his former admirers when he said that "whether or not Senator McCarthy's charges went too far, an honest government would have probed them to the bottom." Last October he seemed to be having second, and better, thoughts. "I don't think," he said, speaking of his Wisconsin colleague, "that one who overstates his case helps his case." But now, hunting delegates in Wisconsin, he has slipped again. "Certainly McCarthy's investigation," he assured a meeting at Beloit on January 21, "has been fully justified by repeated dismissals of employees of doubtful loyalty, by revelations regarding the insincerity of the State Department's Loyalty Board, by the dismissal of Service, and by other evidence." And to show his own complete surrender to the spirit of McCarthyism, Mr. Taft went on to make the fantastic charge that "this Administration has been dominated by a strange Communist sympathy," a revelation which will certainly be news to the Kremlin. At Beloit, according to a New York Times reporter, Mr. Taft's references to McCarthy were greeted with mild applause; at Monroe, where he repeated them the next night, the audience was silent. Perhaps McCarthyism is not such a winning card even in Wisconsin.

INCIDENTALLY WE LEARN FROM NEWSWEEK that the Loyalty Review Board is worried about the leaking of its secret minutes to Senator McCarthy. Apparently some member of the board, instigated by the Senator, is committing the very offense for which the board recommended the dismissal of John Stewart Service—the disclosure to an unauthorized person of classified information. We hope Mr. Taft will investigate.

The Budget

THE budget for 1952-53 submitted by the President to Congress on January 21 takes the nation still farther into the financial stratosphere. Expenditure is set down at $85,400,000,000—about two-and-a-half times Britain's total national income, as the London Times points out. Revenue is estimated at $71,000,000,000 on the basis of present taxes, so that although this sum exceeds any war-time tax bill, we still face a prospective deficit of $14,400,000,000.

As soon as these monstrous totals were made known, the air of Capitol Hill rang with the sounds of knife-sharpening and ax-grinding. This, however, is an annual ritual which it is difficult to take very seriously, since one Congressman's pet economy usually turns out to be another's "pork." Moreover, very little analysis of the budget is required to show that drastic surgery is impossible without drastic revision of the whole defense program—a fact Congress shows little inclination to face.

Of the proposed total expenditure $65,100,000,000, or about 76 per cent, represents the cost of the "major security program, including foreign aid and atomic development." All other government functions, including some "defense-connected" projects, will take $20,300,000,000, almost a billion dollars less than in the current fiscal year. Just about half of this total is required for interest on the public debt and for veterans' services and benefits—the first an untouchable item, the second hardly less so. That leaves about $10,000,000,000 for everything else—general administration, tax collection, the Post Office, social welfare, agriculture, development of public resources, rivers and harbors, and so forth. If all these functions were abolished—and even Senator Byrd hardly goes to such lengths—we should still be in the red.

Of course Congress may succeed in trimming the deficit to some extent, but if it does, the probability is that it will cut in the wrong places. In an election year, for instance, it is unlikely to turn down the President's request for larger appropriations to support farm prices, although agriculture would seem well able to prosper without government aid under present circumstances. On the other hand, proposals for more expenditure on public health and more aid for education, for which a strong case can be made on the basis of the appallingly high percentage of selective-service rejections because of physical unfitness or illiteracy, may well be turned down in the name of economy.

Many Congressmen are promising to scrutinize sharply defense as well as civilian expenditures, and undoubtedly they can find fat there which can be trimmed. But at best they will save millions rather than billions. For one thing, most of the money that will actually be spent in fiscal 1953 has already been appropriated, and on July 1 industry will have in hand orders for military equipment totaling some $60,000,000,000.

Thus even if Congress decided to cut down the defense program, it would find it difficult to diminish appreciably total expenditure for the coming fiscal year. But it can influence expenditures in future years by giving careful consideration to the Pentagon's plans for expansion of the armed forces which the President endorsed in his message. These plans call for an air force of 143 wings—48 more than at present authorized by Congress—an army of 21 divisions instead of 18, and a navy of 408 "major combatant vessels," with 16 carrier air groups against 392 vessels and 14 air groups. It is the duty of Congress to review these proposals and decide whether such an enlargement of our forces is in fact vital to security. For once it approves this Pentagon blueprint, it will find it has lost all control not only of the current budget but of those for several years ahead.

Arab Refugees: A Long Step Forward

THE United Nations resolution on Arab refugees is a long step in the right direction—provided the intentions of the U. N. Works and Relief Agency are brought to practical realization.

For the first time since 1948 the emphasis has been shifted, by the resolution, from relief to resettlement. A fund of $250,000,000 was voted of which $200,000,000 will be used for reintegration and $50,000,000 for relief; it is to be raised by voluntary contributions of member states. The refugees are to be settled in the countries where they are now found, and a number of projects, agricultural and industrial, will be undertaken as part of the economic-reintegration program. A time limit of three years is set for accomplishing the resolution's objectives.

Whether this is the final word on the Arab-refugee problem remains to be seen. Well-wishers of the project have reason to be concerned about several aspects of the resolution as adopted.

First, there is its reiterated emphasis on the right of the refugees to repatriation—which means in Israel. There is no chance whatever that this can be brought about, since the former homes of the Arabs are occupied by Jewish immigrants. In any case a fundamental contradiction exists between voting a fund of $200,000,000 for resettlement and insisting, under Arab pressure, on repatriation. Insistence on repatriation could give a wholly tentative character to the reintegration program.

Second, the resolution provides that reintegration shall take place in the countries now sheltering the refugees. This means that countries with comparatively small economic resources will bear the principal burden, while countries with large possibilities will play either no role or a minor one. Iraq and Syria, given the necessary funds, could most easily absorb the refugees since both countries are underpopulated, but they will not be expected to take many—a regrettable fact from the standpoint both of the refugees themselves and of the economic future of the two countries.

Iraq, for example, with some 4,000 refugees, is not included in the plans of the U. N. Works and Relief Agency. Yet this country, with the richest natural resources of any Middle Eastern state, must double its population through immigration in order to develop them. The International Development Advisory Board has expressed the view that Iraq alone could absorb all the Arab refugees were its possibilities developed. Second in its capacity to absorb immigrants is Syria, where only 80,000 refugees are to be found. Syria needs at least 3,000,000 more settlers to develop its land alone.

Under the present U. N. plan Jordan, with a refugee population of some 465,000, and Lebanon, with 170,000, will carry the principal burden, though they have far more limited resources than either Syria or Iraq. The economic fate of some 200,000 refugees on the narrow land strip of Gaza, held by Egypt, is problematical if the present proposals are literally adhered to.

The third question is: Will the refugee population at the end of the three-year period be able to stand on its own feet, considering current conditions in the Middle East, unless plans are made simultaneously for developing the area and raising the living standards of the native population? There is no provision for the latter under the present scheme.

In our judgment the proposal submitted to the United Nations in December by a group of nineteen distinguished Americans, since joined by 131 other leaders of American opinion, offers at once a more practical and a more imaginative solution. It eliminates the basic contradiction in the U. N. plan by demonstrating the impossibility of repatriation and the necessity of permanent resettlement. It proposes resettlement in countries which would themselves benefit by receiving the refugees. It opens large vistas of opportunity for economic development and improved living standards. It makes the permanent solution of the Arab-refugee problem a joint responsibility of the international community, the Arab states, and Israel. Under this plan an expenditure of $300,000,000 is proposed for resettlement and of $500,000,000 for developing the natural resources of the countries involved. Such bold and imaginative planning seems necessary if friction is to be minimized and stability increased.

It is shocking to find the delegates of Syria and Iraq still openly urging, without challenge, a "second round" against Israel in the very council chamber where the refugee fund was voted. Even more disturbing is the vacillation of the State Department. The United States will have to contribute at least $50,000,000 a year for the next three years to this $250,000,000 fund. It should be clear to the State Department that the Arab world, for all the growing nationalism and xenophobia in the Middle East, is not yet able to stand on its own feet. It needs financial and technical aid which only the Western world and particularly the United States can provide. But it knows how to bargain for what it wants, while we seem to minimize the value of what we have to offer; the habit of selling ourselves short still persists. It was up to the United States to say firmly that it wished to see a final solution of the Arab-refugee problem, that it was prepared to assure the necessary funds for a solution which would also benefit the native populations, and that it would withhold its aid unless the Arab states stopped making a political football of the problem. The United States should still take this position if it wants the money to be appropriated to serve both the refugees and the ends of peace in the Middle East.

Japan: Recovery and Reaction

BY T. A. BISSON

AS JAPAN throws off direct occupation controls, the outlines of two broad developments grow steadily clearer. A vigorous economic comeback is under way, and at the same time democracy and the public welfare are being sorely buffeted. The reactionary trend should cause no surprise. When, some years ago, the occupation authorities shelved the reform program as a luxury, they willed the result we are now witnessing. More recently General MacArthur's successor applied the finishing touch.

On May 3, 1951, the fourth anniversary of the adoption of Japan's democratic constitution, General Ridgway authorized the Japanese government "to review existing ordinances issued in implementation of directives from this headquarters, for the purpose of evolving through established procedures such modifications as past experience and the present situation render necessary and desirable." Thus four months before the conclusion of the treaty, which some observers had hoped would underwrite at least the basic occupation reforms, General Ridgway in effect invited the Japanese authorities to scuttle reforms that had become "inappropriate."

Since Japan is still controlled by a set of bureaucrats and business men indistinguishable from the pre-war lot, the invitation was eagerly accepted. The great difference between the present ruling coalition and that which governed the country before the war is the absence of the militarists. Even under a treaty that places no limits on Japan's rearmament, some time must elapse before the militarists can come back in a big way. A large Japanese military establishment is not in the offing unless the United States is willing to pay for it. Next year's estimates include an expenditure of 315 billion yen—37 per cent of the total budget—for military purposes. Of this Japan's contribution to American military costs will take 180 billion yen ($500,000,000); the rest will be spent on its own armed forces.

Japan is able to sustain this sizable military expenditure for two reasons. The United States-Japan payments agreement effective July 1, 1951, transformed previous occupation costs of 100 billion yen into a much-reduced domestic charge of 35 billion yen (Japan's military contribution) and a nice credit of $160,000,000 (United States payment to Japan for facilities provided American forces). No less important is the current high level of economic activity and foreign earnings. Unlike Britain, Japan added to its foreign-currency holdings in 1951. On March 31, under the weight of heavy import charges, the Japanese reserve fell to $447,000,000 as against $519,000,000 at the end of 1950. On August 31 it had risen to $590,000,000, on September 30 to $667,000,000, and preliminary figures for October indicated $730,000,000 or better.

A year or two ago few could foresee that Japan would emerge from the occupation era paying its own way. Both policy and accident have contributed to the result. In 1949, after far too long a delay, the occupation authorities finally compelled the Japanese leaders to adopt an economic program that stopped inflation and insured maximum returns from large imports of aid from the United States. In mid-1950 the Korean war brought a steady stream of American dollars into the country. In mid-1951 imports from the United States ended and Japan stood on its own. How well it is succeeding in supporting itself may be gathered from the accompanying table.

At first glance it may appear that Japan slipped badly in 1951, but this is not so. The trade totals are far larger, in spite of much smaller aid imports. Imports had to be increased early in 1951 to compensate for a lag in the last half of 1950. By July this excess was paid for, and trade figures for later months show a continuing positive balance.

JAPAN'S FOREIGN-EXCHANGE ACCOUNT
(in million dollars)

	1950 Jan.-June	1950 July-Dec.	1951 Jan.-June	1951 July-Sept.
Exports	300.1	472.7	653.9	323.0

U. S. aid imports	213.0	148.0	75.0	0.0

Korean war procurement largely accounts for the striking gain in Japan's invisible trade receipts. But normal merchandise exports stand at more than twice the 1950 level. Since July the $160,000,000 annual United States payment—not included in the foreign-exchange account above—has further strengthened Japan's foreign-exchange position.

While the end of the Korean war would place a strain on Japan's dollar-payments position, its ability to earn dollars in other ways is improving. If invisible trade receipts are estimated at $700,000,000 for 1951, about $300,000,000 will be earned on non-procurement items, the major sources being foreign spending in Japan and steadily growing receipts from shipping. The American forces in Japan will continue to pay $160,000,000 annually, on a conservative estimate, for various Japanese facilities. Payments for Japanese goods and services directed to Korean reconstruction will be in dollars. Continued moderate increases in Japanese exports to the United States may be expected unless tariff barriers are raised.

Japan can also save dollars by shifting imports away from the United States. The new sterling-payments agreement with Britain forces Japan to spend all sterling balances in the sterling-area, and Japanese trade officials are looking for sterling-area imports to replace purchases of American goods. China would provide a more substantial alternative; Japan's 1951 trade gains were achieved without benefit of China, either as market or supplier. Lack of Chinese coking coal and iron ore, nearby and therefore cheap, has severely handicapped Japan's iron-and-steel industry. Higher steel costs are spreading into the machinery, metal, shipbuilding, and other trades, leaving textiles to carry an undue share of the export burden and thereby intensifying competition with Lancashire. Japan is well aware that its foreign trade can hardly be increased—even in 1951 it was less than half the 1934-36 volume—if trade with China fails to develop on a considerable scale.

MERELY to maintain the trade position gained in 1951 is not enough. Living standards are below the pre-war level, and the population is multiplying rapidly. In 1953 Japan must face added charges of some 50 billion yen on such items as renewal of foreign-bond service, reparations, and compensation for Allied nationals' property losses. Above all, its economy needs a large infusion of new capital. A severe power shortage in the fall of 1951 showed that the high industrial production was pressing on the fuel and power output. Coal mines have been newly equipped only in part. The electric-power industry, recently returned to private ownership, is in poor shape.

It is clear, then, that further increases in Japan's foreign trade are necessary if pressing requirements are to be met. But meanwhile the Japanese leaders give no indication that their domestic economic policies are devised with a view to the general welfare. On the contrary, they have consistently manipulated government policies in the interest of their own narrowly based group.

In 1950 industrial production, along with farming, forestry, and fisheries, was nearing 1934-36 levels. Population was at 120 per cent of the figure for those years, and the living standard at 82 per cent—the urban standard, however, was only 73, the rural standard being 93. During the first six months of 1951, though industrial production was soaring far above the pre-war level, the urban living standard fell to 67 per cent. Profits rose steeply during the same period in cotton spinning, chemical fiber, and some other industries, though not in basic industry. In August official staple food prices rose 18 per cent and electricity rates 30 per cent, with further increases expected in gas and water rates and in the official prices of salt and sugar. When a tax cut was promised as an offset, the Nippon Times (August 7) said editorially: "If tax cuts are to have any real meaning, they must be made on the foundation of a stabilized economy which will not wipe out their benefits."

Joseph M. Dodge, the occupation's financial adviser, on being hurriedly recalled to Japan last fall seems to have made much the same point to Finance Minister Ikeda, who is reported to have "talked back" sharply. One result, however, was an announcement by the government that it would postpone the projected measures to decontrol rice and other food staples which had called forth embittered comment in the Japanese papers. Editorials argued that the urban family, with rationing abolished, would pay still higher food prices, and that the gain to the millions of small farmers would be problematical—they would have to sell their meager surpluses at harvest time, and the rice dealers would reap the benefits of price fluctuations. While Mr. Dodge sought to deal with the Finance Minister, the head of SCAP's Labor Division, Robert T. Amis, was deploring a swing "toward the right" in labor relations marked by coercion of workers into company unions and denial of collective bargaining.

Their confidence now fully restored, Japan's business leaders have become quite frank about occupation reforms. Reporting an interview with Ryutaro Takahashi, who entered the Yoshida Cabinet on July 4 as Minister of International Trade and Industry, the Nippon Times of July 6 said: "He called the anti-monopoly law passé. It needs to be changed, he added, as there is no more use for its restrictive provisions under the present economic society. . . . Another regulation, he said, which might just as well be junked is the trade-association law." He told Japanese business men, the paper continued, to "prepare themselves for a return to the international market. To attain this end he asked for all-out attempts to trim costs."

Occupation-sponsored labor legislation is due for a thorough overhauling. Foreign traders might do well to follow the revision of the Labor Standards Act. The president of a Japanese chemical company has said: "If real improvement of working conditions is desired, it will be necessary to give some flexibility to the application of the law. Some lowering of standards, too, may be needed" (Oriental Economist, May 26). Abolition of the Labor Ministry is scheduled for 1952.

The land reform has already been seriously undermined. The Yoshida Cabinet destroyed the law's chief protective features when it voided the price-and-sale restrictions on farm lands. In the opinion of the Nippon Times, this "could very easily lead to a revival of the former system of large land holdings controlled by a few individuals." The same editorial (September 25) noted that former landlords have "lost some of their excess holdings, but they are comparatively well-to-do and are taking a leading role in the affairs of their villages." Under the free-market conditions now being so rapidly restored, many of the new farm owners may find they hold their land on short tenure—for the period that an agricultural crisis can be staved off.

SIGNS are no less ominous in the political sphere. A projected control law applying to the press, demonstrations, general strikes, espionage, and illegal organizations has raised a loud outcry, but the Diet is expected to pass it. Nihon Keizai, a conservative paper, commented editorially on September 25: "Excessive control might lead to revival of a fascist or ultra-nationalistic trend. Democratic labor or social movements and any opposition to the government are liable to be suppressed in the name of the control of Communists."

Under a new Ministry of Public Security which, with its special-investigation force, marks a long step toward revival of the Home Ministry abolished in 1947, a centralized national police force will be reconstituted along the old lines. The move became a certainty last fall when hundreds of local communities, discouraged by their inability to raise adequate funds—lucrative tax sources being controlled by the center—voted to give up their autonomous police forces. Tokyo Shimbun, while admitting (July 26) that more effective police enforcement would result, nevertheless deplored "creation of a centralized police system which might help cause a relapse into the police state of the past." If control of education is also returned to the center, as is probable, two big gashes will have been torn in the occupation-sponsored fabric of local self-government.

Around 1947-48, when the occupation turned from reform to recovery, the point was made that democracy could not grow in an impoverished country. True enough, and the occupation might have acted even earlier to mitigate the hardships suffered by an inflation-ridden populace. But did the argument mean that democracy would be the natural fruit of economic recovery, no matter under whose auspices it came? It now appears that there was nothing automatic about the result. For economic revival to bring democracy it was necessary that the economic program should be in democratic hands and used to strengthen, not jettison, political and social reforms. Otherwise one might well ask: economic recovery to what end?

A strong statement by President Truman that the United States stands behind the reforms introduced under the occupation would help to stem the tide now running in Japan. Such action is necessary if the good-will generated by the constructive measures of the occupation is not to be lost at a time when it is desperately needed to bolster American prestige in Asia.

The Economic Consequences of Mr. Dulles

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

REFERRING to discussions of "grave problems affecting our two countries in the Far East," the communiqué issued at the close of the Truman-Churchill talks said: "A broad harmony of view has emerged . . . for we recognize that the overwhelming need to counter the Communist threat in that area transcends such divergencies as there are in our policies toward China."

Among these "divergencies" was one that had been causing not a little discord in exchanges between the State Department and the Foreign Office—a difference of opinion about future relations between Japan and China. The British thought that this question had been settled last summer when in the course of negotiations on the Japanese treaty John Foster Dulles and former Foreign Secretary Herbert Morrison reached an agreement to the effect that Japan was to be left free to decide whether it would recognize the Peking government or Chiang Kai-shek's Nationalist regime or neither. However, when Mr. Dulles visited Tokyo in December he apparently strongly urged Premier Yoshida to negotiate a treaty with Chiang. According to Frederick Kuh, Washington correspondent of the Chicago Sun-Times, the British ambassadors in both Tokyo and Washington protested that these pressure tactics violated the Dulles-Morrison agreement. As a result, the question was put on the agenda for the Truman-Churchill talks and was threshed out in detail by Secretary of State Acheson and Foreign Secretary Eden.

Mr. Acheson asked that the British agree to allow the Chinese Nationalist government to sign the Japanese peace treaty for Formosa. Mr. Eden demurred on the ground that the long-term interests of the Western powers would be served best by permitting the Japanese to decide the matter for themselves—in other words, by honoring the previous Anglo-American agreement. Thereupon Mr. Acheson apparently produced a clinching argument that must now have an ominously familiar ring to British diplomats: unless Chiang was brought into the picture, the Senate might refuse to ratify the Japanese treaty.

The reluctant acquiescence of the British is confirmed by a letter from Premier Yoshida to Mr. Dulles released in Tokyo on January 16. Dated December 24 and apparently held back pending the Washington talks, this letter declares that the Japanese government has no intention of concluding any bilateral agreement with Communist China but is willing to sign a treaty with the Nationalist government of China—"applicable to all territories which are now or may hereafter be under [its] control"—reestablishing "normal relations between the two governments in conformity with the principles set out in the multilateral treaty of peace."

We shall probably be told that this decision represents a free choice by the Japanese government, but any such assurances must be taken with ample salt. As long ago as August 30, according to the Associated Press Washington bureau, Mr. Dulles told Senators who were troubled by the omission of Nationalist China from the list of governments invited to San Francisco that in due course Japan and Nationalist China would make a separate pact. In Tokyo recently he probably had only to hint that failure to take action of this kind would imperil United States ratification of the treaty. The Japanese government, anxious to recover its sovereign status and still dependent on American financial aid, could easily see the wisdom of helping the State Department appease the Senate.

WITH both Britain and Japan persuaded to toe the line, the die has been cast. Let us consider some of the probable consequences.

There will undoubtedly be repercussions in England when Parliament reassembles on January 29, and some blunt questions will be put to Messrs. Churchill and Eden. They will be reminded that during the debate on the Japanese treaty on November 27, Peter Thorneycroft, president of the Board of Trade, assured the House for the government that there was no reason to suppose that the United States government would "do otherwise than leave it to the Japanese government to decide on its own relations with other governments." The same point was stressed by Herbert Morrison, former Foreign Secretary, and Kenneth Younger, former Minister of State, who had represented Britain in the negotiations preceding the treaty. Japan's freedom of decision in regard to China, said Mr. Younger, had been made clear at San Francisco. "Since then I have seen suggestions that some people in the United States would like to make the United States' ratification of the treaty dependent on a prior decision by Japan to recognize the Chinese Nationalist authorities. I hope no such situation will arise. The long-term relations between the two most important countries in Asia must be left to them exclusively."

There are two reasons why so much emphasis was given to this issue. In the first place, the British government has never agreed with Washington about China. It considered—and apparently still does despite the change in its political coloration—that excommunication is a futile policy. It does not like Mao's regime, but it recognizes Mao as the de facto ruler of the Chinese mainland, and it is not prepared to place any bets on a discredited Chiang Kai-shek who is wholly dependent on American subsidies. It believes the effect of American policy has been to cement relations between Peking and Moscow and fears this cement will be hardened by a Japanese treaty with Chiang, which Peking is bound to treat as a hostile move.

The second reason why Britain wished Japan to settle its own relations with China was economic. Britain and Japan have long been commercial rivals in Southeast Asia, and British merchants dread the return of the full force of Japanese competition. A number of members of Parliament, particularly those representing Lancashire textile areas, opposed the treaty because it did not contain restrictions on Japanese production and controls designed to prevent "unfair" competition. The British government agreed with Washington that it would be unwise to hamper Japanese trade in this fashion. On the other hand, it did not wish to see Japan prevented from selling goods to mainland China, its natural market and nearest and cheapest source of raw materials. With that outlet blocked, the result would be redoubled pressure to sell Japanese manufactures in Southeast Asia to the detriment of British trade. However, if the Japanese were allowed to make their own choice, the British thought the clear advantages to be derived from trade with China would induce them to keep open the channels by refraining from permanently antagonizing Peking. Consequently, British defenders of the Japanese treaty sought to soothe its parliamentary critics by making much of their understanding with Washington. Now those critics will have the right to complain that the large majority favoring the treaty was secured on false information.

Many Americans, no doubt, will consider the British attitude selfish and immoral, but two things must be kept in mind. In the first place, Britain's need to expand its exports is desperate: if it fails to do so, it faces national bankruptcy and a catastrophic fall in living standards. Moreover, with an increasing proportion of its metal industries, the mainstay of its export business, diverted to rearmament, it must depend more on sales of textiles, pottery, and other consumer goods—exactly the lines in which Japan derives an advantage from its low labor costs.

Again, Americans should not forget that they are quick to resent Japanese competition in their own commercial bailiwicks. In fact, now that Japanese china, glassware, sewing machines, toys, and other specialties are returning to the American market in growing volume, cries of "unfair competition" and calls for higher tariffs or quotas or both are loud and numerous. Shipping interests are demanding steps to check the revival of the Japanese merchant marine, although a larger fleet becomes an economic necessity as Japan is forced to reach for more distant markets. On the West Coast there is strong agitation against rising imports of Japanese tuna fish, and the House of Representatives has already been persuaded to pass a bill imposing a 3-cents-a-pound tariff on frozen tuna. What line, one wonders, will Senator Knowland of California, who has actively sought to block Japanese trade with Communist China, take on this measure when it comes before the upper house?

ties in the American market, Japanese business men will certainly stress the point that they are being forced to sacrifice much more substantial interests in the China market. For the time being, criticism may be subdued, because Japan, as T. A. Bisson explains on page 101, is now enjoying a boom based on American procurement of goods and services for the Korean armies. As a result, Japan's dollar reserves are increasing despite a deficit in normal trade with the United States. Even so, the purchase of food and raw materials from America at much higher prices than the same goods would cost in China is a serious handicap to Japanese industry. For instance, Manchurian coking coal, recently imported in comparatively small amounts, has cost about $20 a ton. American coking coal, which is being bought in large quantities as a substitute, costs at least 50 per cent more, owing chiefly to heavy freight charges. When the present abnormal flow of dollars into Japan is stemmed, premium payments of this nature will be very difficult to bear. We should not be surprised, therefore, if before very long the Japanese say to us: "At your behest we have cut off our noses to spite Mao's face. What are you going to do to stop us from bleeding to death?"

"Bombs Bring Us Together"

BY STETSON KENNEDY

Jacksonville, January 22

THE terrorists' bomb which on Christmas night killed the militant Negro leader Harry T. Moore at Mims, Florida, and subsequently caused the death of his wife has galvanized Negro leaders all over the South to dedicate themselves to achieving the democratic goals for which Moore gave his life.

On January 19 and 20, 200 delegates representing 100,000 members of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People in fifteen Southern states met in Jacksonville and adopted a fighting "declaration" which may profoundly affect the future of the South. Florida was deliberately chosen, as one delegate put it, because "bombs do not frighten us; they bring us together."

Addressed to "the world at large, to the South, and to Florida in particular," the Jacksonville Declaration, while adopted in the name of Harry T. Moore, scored STETSON KENNEDY, author of "Palmetto Country," has discussed the bombing outrages in Miami and the murder of Harry T. Moore in Mims in previous articles.

"the new technique of lynching as exemplified in the killing of Samuel Shepherd and the wounding of Walter Irvin" in Eustis. It pledged the N. A. A. C. P. to continue the fight for: (1) the right to security of person against the organized violence of lawless mobsters or irresponsible law-enforcement officers; (2) the right to vote as free men in a free land; (3) the right to employment opportunities in accordance with individual merits; (4) the right of children to attend any educational institutions supported by public funds; (5) the right to serve unsegregated in the armed forces of the country; (6) the right to travel unrestricted by Jim Crow regulations; (7) the right to go unmolested among fellow-Americans as free men in a free society.

The Florida Times-Union of Jacksonville devoted all of two inches to the conference. On the same day this paper gave a full column to the rantings of the "Reverend" Lloyd King, who in a nation-wide Liberty Network broadcast emanating from Leesburg charged that a "racial-hate organization" (the N. A. A. C. P.), was "stirring up trouble in Florida."

The fighting spirit of the delegates was an inspiring thing to see. As was to be expected, it was strongest in the young and the workers, but there were notable exceptions. One laborer said to me, "The trouble with this organization is that the business people who are on top don't reach down often enough to help the workingman in the ditch." On the other hand, William P. Milner, business manager of a funeral home in Bartow, declared on the floor, "As business men who get our money from little people we ought to be willing to spend some of it to help justify our position as leaders." Roy Wilkins, national administrator of the N. A. A. C. P., addressed the delegates as "laborers, workers, and even business men." But the number of limousines parked outside bore testimony that the leadership continues to be weighted with business and professional men who refuse to step aside. Wilkins was heard to say later, "If everybody over forty-eight would drop dead, we young folks would solve this race problem overnight."

THE most violent militant was A. J. Clements, Jr., a Charleston attorney, who roared, "To hell with these social gradualists, these time-not-rippers who say to take it easy! I'm not willing to follow any man who wants to go easy for me winning my freedom!" Mrs. A. W. Simpkins, state secretary from South Carolina, declared, "Like Atlas, we must reach down and touch the earth to gain new strength." The women delegates had been noticeably denied leadership status but displayed exceptional ability from the floor.

Something new in "Southern revolts" broke out when Kelly M. Alexander, vigorous N. A. A. C. P. president for North Carolina and a member of the national board, called upon the conference to "take a look at the list of our national board and see how inadequately represented the South is. As the chief battleground of the struggle the South needs and is entitled to more representation on the policy-making level; we're no Charlie McCarthys!"

As a non-partisan organization, the conference confined itself to attacks upon hate-mongering Dixiecrat politicians. But informal talks with delegates in the corridors revealed that a profound disillusionment with President Truman has set in. Most of the delegates I questioned felt that American Negroes had bet on Truman once too often. Accustomed as they are to broken promises Negroes are as bitter about the "scrap of paper" known as Truman's civil-rights program as they were once convinced of its sincerity. I could not find a delegate who was at all impressed with the wrist-slapping FEPC which the President hastily appointed after federal authorities had failed to make arrests or invoke jury probes in the Florida terrorism.

Wilkins outspokenly placed the real blame for the terrorism upon the governors of Georgia, South Carolina, and Alabama. He also referred to the racist fulminations of certain Southerners in Congress. "It is their inflammatory remarks which lead the little imitation Talmadges to conclude that they can go out and bomb and kill with impunity," he declared.

With the Jacksonville police chief and the Duval County sheriff sweating it out in the audience, J. M. Hinton, N. A. A. C. P. president in South Carolina, said: "It's a peculiar thing how the police can always track down every Negro bootlegger and numbers writer, but whenever a Negro is killed by white men they rush in and say 'tell us the story'; and then they close the book. You may be sure that if a white family had been bombed to death, the next morning they would have had a hundred Negroes in jail—any hundred." Pointing out that the white people of America should be delighted that fifteen million Negro Americans are eager to cooperate in building a real democracy, Hinton declared: "The future of this world no longer rests in white hands—it is being decided in India, China, Japan, and Africa."

In the same militant vein delegate Lawson of Savannah, a youthful member of the national board, asserted: "Just because Jackie Robinson has been admitted to the ball barks, and Ralph Bunche and Marian Anderson have crept through a crack in the wall, doesn't mean that we're all satisfied. We are standing before the wall of segregation and we will not be moved until it comes tumbling down! If the Talmadges and Russells do not have sense enough to get out of the way, it will just have to fall on their stupid heads! Harry Moore is dead because some of us have not stood up." Wilkins hit this nail on the head again when he said, "Too many white people in the South—and nation too—embrace the formula: 'Uncomplaining Negroes plus unchallenged whites equal peaceful race relations.'"

QUITE properly the conference stressed political action as the basic means of combating terrorism, discrimination, and segregation. A committee composed of the N. A. A. C. P. presidents in fifteen Southern states was set up to correlate the job of doubling the number of Negroes registered as voters. "We must fight for our political rights on the local level," Mrs. Simpkins insisted. "You can't hit a man unless he is close to you. While it's a fine thing to be able to vote for President, we need to help elect the sheriff and chief of police too." The Reverend Mr. Mann, vice-president for Georgia, described how he had successfully overcome fears by inaugurating a "Meet Me at the Courthouse" campaign, in which he called upon every member of his congregation who would meet him at the courthouse the next morning to register to stand up and be counted. Almost all who promise follow through, he said. A minister from Montgomery, South Carolina, told of launching a registration drive. Officials in his state identify Negro registrants by putting a small "n" after their names, and this Jim Crowism is being turned against itself by the N. A. A. C. P. chapter, which consults the books to determine which Negroes have qualified. Emory O. Jackson, editor of the Birmingham Daily World, reported that some Alabama counties open the registration books only during the plowing season and that in others the registrars often go fishing on registration days. A delegate from Richland County, Georgia, said that a Talmadge henchman had locked up the books "pending further legislation."

When one of the Arkansas delegates extolled the N. A. A. C. P.'s organization of his state on a city and county basis, without any white representation, Attorney Clements retorted, "I resent the presentation of that kind of plan to this kind of organization. The N. A. A. C. P. opposes segregation, and yet some of its chapters still go in for segregated political action."

Rebuilding Shattered Korea

BY WALTER SULLIVAN

Paris, January 21

NO COUNTRY has ever been more completely laid waste by war than Korea. So states J. Donald Kingsley, who has been assigned by the United Nations to repair the damage. Before the war the Korean Peninsula was one of the three most intensively industrialized areas of the Far East—the others being Japan and Manchuria. Korea under the Japanese had the biggest complex of chemical industries in non-Soviet Asia, submarine shops, and many other large manufacturing enterprises. Today these industries are totally ruined.

The loss of life has been appalling. United Nations experts estimate that one out of every nine men, women, and children in North Korea has been killed. The maimed are seen everywhere. High on the U. N.'s list of requisites for Korean reconstruction is a factory to make artificial limbs. In South Korea roughly 5,000,000 people have been displaced and 600,000 homes destroyed. Official reports describe 100,000 children as "unaccompanied." Two-thirds of them are wandering on the highways facing Siberian winds and winter snow.

There are small consolations. Since ground fighting

WALTER SULLIVAN, New York Times correspondent in Korea in 1950, is now in that paper's U. N. bureau. This is the third of a series of articles on the problems of peace in Korea. Next week Yongjeung Kim will discuss the internal political difficulties, and Owen Lattimore and W. McMahon Ball the international aspects of a settlement.

"We have got to act purely as citizens in a democracy."

Much attention was devoted to the problem of increasing N. A. A. C. P. membership, but no one suggested that this might be directly related to program. In the conference's host city of Jacksonville, with 112,000 Negroes, there are but 250 N. A. A. C. P. members, and no N. A. A. C. P. office is listed in the telephone directory. Mrs. Ruby Hurley, national organization chairman, frankly argued that the new drive should not be intrusted to the established membership committees of the branches, which she said "are in the habit of doing nothing all year." She even told of finding branch presidents who had not yet opened their N. A. A. C. P. Christmas-seal packets for 1950. No very promising method of gaining new members was suggested.

Yet all in all, the South-wide N. A. A. C. P. meeting called as a memorial to Harry Moore was an impressive affair; its undercurrents were strong and its promise for the future was great.

for the past six months has been confined to the vicinity of the Thirty-eighth Parallel, other areas have been granted a breathing spell, and under the pressure of military requirements the transport system has been patched up. It may even be more efficient than before the war, what with temporary bridges, highways widened or straightened by American bulldozers, and the port of Pusan dredged by the United States army engineers. Grounds for hope are also found in the plans of United Nations relief and rehabilitation experts, who expect to spend $250,000,000 in the first year after the army turns the job over to them—perhaps even more now that transport recovery has made the Korean economy more capable of absorbing aid.

But numerous questions darken the future. When will the army let go its hold on the South Korean economy? When will the complementary economics of North and South Korea be reunited? Will the South Korean regime allow ineptitude, corruption, and runaway inflation to block recovery? Will peace really come to Korea with a cease-fire, or will Syngman Rhee's government be shaken as before by guerrilla activity and internal dissension?

Korean unity now seems a long way off. It may not come until the end of the cold war. Meanwhile the United Nations Korean Reconstruction Agency (UNKRA) has no plans for sending aid to North Korea, though there is nothing in writing that forbids it to do so. UNKRA was conceived at Lake Success more than a year ago on the eve of General MacArthur's ill-fated "home-by-Christmas" offensive. In the discussions in the Economic and Social Council the Soviet Union favored a relief program in whose formulation "Korean representatives" would take part. Its views were not accepted, and it opposed the final plan for Korean reconstruction. This plan assumed that most if not all of Korea would be under United Nations control. U. N. relief machinery was expected to move north gradually, taking over from the army. UNKRA's directive provides that its area of operation shall be determined by what is technically the highest United Nations authority in Korea—the U. N. Commission for the Unification and Rehabilitation of Korea (UNCURK). UNKRA has been informed by UNCURK that it can operate in areas under the administration of the South Korean government. Presumably it will also be allowed to work in the strip north of the Thirty-eighth Parallel but south of the new cease-fire line.

THE "Statement of General Policy" guiding UNKRA is in many respects similar to the regulations governing American post-war aid. Inspection by U. N. personnel of warehouses, distribution facilities, and records is stipulated. Korean authorities are required to publish the source of the aid, keep records, and make whatever reports are demanded by UNKRA. It was because of such provisions that the Eastern European countries first rejected Marshall Plan aid. The Democratic People's Republic in North Korea would probably also refuse to comply with them.

The division of the Korean Peninsula will make the task of reconstruction more prolonged and expensive, as the American representative on the Economic and Social Council pointed out at Lake Success last year when unification by military means seemed near. The South has more rice paddies than it needs; the North an excess of power plants. The rail and highway networks were built for a unified country. There is still some talk of exchanging southern rice for northern power if the deal can be arranged, but otherwise it appears that the division along the cease-fire line will be unbridged, the Western nations caring for the South and the nations grouped around Moscow aiding the North.

United Nations planning is entirely in terms of South Korea's needs. The capital loss due to war damage south of the Thirty-eighth Parallel cannot be estimated with accuracy, but J. Donald Kingsley, head of UNKRA, puts it at close to two billion dollars. Priority, according to the UNKRA directive, must be given "to the provision of basic food, clothing, and shelter for the population of Korea and measures to prevent epidemics."

Of the millions of Koreans displaced in the fighting, probably a majority, anxious to salvage what they can of their property, have drifted back to their burned-out homes. Still uprooted are the 150,000 peasants evacuated from a twenty-mile belt behind the front lines. The countless ruined villages are the most terrible and universal mark of the war on the Korean landscape. To wipe out cover for North Korean vehicles and personnel, hundreds of thatch-roofed houses were burned by air-dropped jellied gasoline or artillery fire.

The countryside has been almost stripped of wood, but clay, mud, and straw for rebuilding the villages are at hand. The needed machines, generators, rolling stock, mining equipment, and livestock must be shipped in. Roughly 200,000 draft animals have disappeared in the past eighteen months, most of them slaughtered for food by soldiers or refugees. The absence of oxen seriously impairs food production, and UNKRA wishes that 20,000 new animals—mostly oxen and breeding stock—could be imported before spring planting. In many areas the irrigation system on which rice cultivation depends has been badly damaged; where the ditches are still sound, there may be no water because the pumping stations get no power. Fertilizer, formerly Korea's chief import and necessary to rice production, is in extremely short supply.

ORIGINALLY UNKRA was not to start its program until the army said the fighting was over, but last July, in view of the prolongation of the war, it obtained General Ridgway's consent to a limited amount of work. While relief remained in the hands of the Eighth Army's Civil Assistance Command and the army also continued to rebuild railways, electric-power systems, and other facilities important to its operations, UNKRA was allowed to send in a small team of experts for long-range planning, high-level technical assistance to Rhee's government, and certain other projects approved by the army. The shifting masses of refugees—sometimes a million on the move at one time—are still an army problem. Almost the entire population of Seoul fled when the fighting drew near. In their absence half the homes, three-quarters of the office buildings, and more than 80 per cent of the factories were leveled. Now the former residents are pouring back by the thousands and setting up shop in shanty towns, presenting a serious problem for a city without water or lighting utilities.

The army did not consider the refugee problem critical as long as the refugees were orderly, out of the way, and not a health threat to the troops. United Nations officials say that within that framework the army has done a good job. There have been no major epidemics. About 6,000 refugees are in the emergency hospital at Seoul, some with smallpox, some with typhus, but scattered outbreaks of these scourges have been checked. Health teams stationed along highways have inoculated the tide of humanity and dusted them with DDT. A third of these medical workers are from specialized United Nations agencies and the Red Cross. Most of the rest belong to the army medical corps; there are some civilians and Scandinavian volunteers. The army has also been handling several of the biggest jobs undertaken by E. C. A. before the war—for example, the distribution of fertilizer, cotton, and lumber.

Once fighting has stopped, the army is supposed to turn over the relief job entirely to the U. N., but there are indications that the brass may not consider the combat phase permanently ended by a cease-fire. U. N. relief officials anticipate American military occupation for a considerable period but hope the army will loosen its grip on the economic structure of the country and let civil agencies take over. They feel that the change-over from military to civilian control must be abrupt and complete. The U. N. must have freedom to use the ports and railways and be given custody of relief supplies now stockpiled in Korea or en route. Otherwise, it is argued, there will be a dangerous gap in relief services.

Perhaps the greatest difficulty faced by the relief program in Korea is inflation. As a brake on spiraling costs the E. C. A. required Rhee's government to deposit in a "counterpart fund" sums equivalent to the value of all relief imports. This is also required by UNKRA, but inflation is as much a danger as before. "We are ground between two millstones," a relief official complained recently, "the army and inflation."

Mindful of E. C. A. experience in South Korea, the U. N. General Assembly a year ago spelled out in bald terms what the government must do. Adequate measures, it said, must be taken by the Korean authorities to see that relief was effectively employed. "Special attention should be given to measures to combat inflation, to sound fiscal and monetary policies, to the requisite pricing, rationing, and allocation controls." There should also be "prudent use" of Korean foreign exchange and, the directive added hopefully, "efficient management of government enterprise." (Kingsley said recently that he hoped some of South Korea's state-owned industry could be reorganized on mixed public-private lines or into co-operatives.) Relief was not to be used as a political weapon. "All classes of the population shall receive their equitable shares of essential commodities without discrimination as to race, creed, or political belief." The directive also declared that the program was intended to strengthen Korea's political independence and must not be used "for foreign economic and political interference in Korea's internal affairs."

UNKRA's problems are parallel in many respects to those faced by UNRRA after World War II. A number of former UNRRA employees are now in UNKRA. Kingsley served for some time as head of the International Refugee Organization. These men believe that, given a free hand, they can put the Korean economy on its feet in five years. At present they are trying to get permission from the army to undertake the most urgent tasks—cattle imports, restoration of the fishing fleet, dredging of small harbors, building of power plants, schools, and housing, and care of orphans. Kingsley believes that the first-year allocation of $250,000,000 for his agency will permit restoration of roughly half the damage to utilities, fisheries, and transport, 40 per cent of the damage to forests and agriculture, and 18 per cent of the damage to industry and mines.

THE relief program will play a vital role in the country's political future. As in the period before the war, South Korea is bound to face keen economic competition from North Korea. Though the destruction is probably greater in the North, the North Koreans can be expected to work fast, and they will undoubtedly receive aid from China and the U. S. S. R. In addition, the spirit of the workers, the elimination of corruption, and the Spartan governmental discipline will give a strong boost to recovery.

American officials in Seoul conceded before the outbreak of hostilities that North Korea had far outdistanced South Korea in economic achievements. The South was forever floundering in inflationary crises, rice shortages, and a drastically unfavorable trade balance. In North Korea on the other hand, exports were in excess of imports, prices were stable, and industry was expanding at a steady pace. The lead of the North certainly represented more than that region's initial advantage in industrial development. The shops at Inchon, seaport of Seoul, where submarines were built under the Japanese, hardly turned out a dinghy under the South Korean government. The morale of South Korean workers was undermined by the activities of the Taehan Youth Corps and the police. The tuberculosis rate in some factories was put officially at over 80 per cent, and American advisers complained that skilled miners could not be trained because their life expectancy was only about two years.

Although the United States has spent hundreds of millions to bomb, burn, and lay waste Korea, Congress refused to approve the $162,500,000 pledged by the United States toward the first-year relief fund of $250,000,000. Instead, it allocated $50,000,000 or less of unexpended E. C. A. funds, and even this sum is not yet available to UNKRA. Canada, with its far smaller resources, has given $7,000,000. The attitude of some Congressmen seems to be: "We protected them from aggression, let someone else do the relief job." Others argue that the money will be wasted by corrupt and inefficient South Korean officials. These are not valid reasons for skimping on our aid. To the same degree that the United States assumed responsibility for the fighting, it should undertake the reconstruction. To fail in this respect will only strengthen the lingering memory among the people that much of the devastation was caused by American arms.

BOOKS and the ARTS

NOTES BY THE WAY

BY MARGARET MARSHALL

THE most rewarding thing about "Winds of Morning" by H. L. Davis (Morrow, $3.50) is its evocation of Western country, morning, noon, and night. In comparison, both the plot and the characters seem rather inconsequential, and the action which held me to the end was the progress of a bunch of scruffy horses from a settlement cluttered with fences and railroad tracks to open country, where they would have room to run. The time is early spring, and Mr. Davis has written a fine documentary of the land and the season.

The principal character, Old Hendricks, has possibilities to begin with. He is one of the original settlers of the region but has been away for years, having skipped the country to get away from his progeny. As the book opens, he has returned to look things over, both the country and the people. He has fallen into the job of herder of the horses, for his keep; when their owner throws up title to the bothersome animals, Old Hendricks comes into possession of them. In the course of the trek to the high country Hendricks intervenes in the affairs of various people—most of them related to him in one way or another—and always for their good. The conception is sound enough but smugness creeps in, the wise old-timer turns into a mere do-gooder, and Old Hendricks tends to become an old bore.

The young deputy sheriff, Amos Clarke, who accompanies Hendricks and is also the narrator is a likable chap and pretty convincing—except that one never quite credits, though one is grateful for it, his astounding capacity for summoning up a landscape, complete with sights and sounds and the quality of the air itself. Amos, that is to say Mr. Davis, also has a wonderful command of Western images and sayings. They sometimes give the impression of having been a little too self-consciously laid in, but for the most part they lend strength and distinction to the writing, and their tangy, often puckering flavor lingers like the taste of a chokecherry.

IN "CHOSEN COUNTRY" (Houghton Mifflin, $4) John Dos Passos invokes the American past to explain the present and to intimate the future of his two main characters, Lulie Harrington and Jay Pignatelli. Once again he uses the device of parallel panels. In this case the lives and backgrounds of the progenitors of Lulie and Jay are interpolated at length while the main story waits. This device always seemed to me an irritating substitute for integration and still does, but the "prolegomena" are extremely well done. Indeed, the history of the first Pignatelli and his wife, Katherine Jay, is the best part of the book, and these two people have a stature and substance that young Jay and Lulie never achieve, just as the historical characters in the short biographies of "U. S. A." had more life than the contemporary fictional characters, especially the fictional men in that book. But the characterization in "Chosen Country," of men as well as women, is in general more successful, and the reason, I think, is that it is ridden by no single thesis—in "U. S. A." it was the single over-all conception of our society as a money civilization—to which the fates of the characters have to conform. "Chosen Country" is therefore richer in that unpredictability of behavior and event which creates the basic suspense of good fiction.

From the title one might expect that Dos Passos had gone in for patriotism of the cruder sort—especially since his disillusionment with the radical hopes and activity of his youth has been well advertised. As it turns out, the title is rather arbitrary. The point of the story, as I read it, is that this is not so much the country his characters have chosen as the country they happen to inhabit and are therefore irrevocably involved in. The book is infused, to be sure, with a love of country and of place—it is somewhat similar in this respect to Mr. Davis's "Winds of Morning." But then this element has always been palpable in Mr. Dos Passos's books even when they were most critical of what was going on in his country. Dos Passos recounts, as part of the experience and education of young Jay, the story of his own thirty years' war—the principal episodes of left-wing politics, of enthusiasms and betrayals—but his mood is more historical than polemic. Finally, the story ends happily, with Jay and Lulie resolving to make "this wilderness our house," but the "message" seems to be not that this country is perfect but that its very variety, infinite and as yet unordered, offers reason for hope as well as inducement to despair.

Alternative to War

CAPITALISM AND SOCIALISM ON TRIAL. By Fritz Sternberg. Translated from the German by Edward Fitzgerald. The John Day Company, $6.50.

STERNBERG'S analysis of modern history not only makes the street cries of world politics seem shallow but casts doubt on the penetration of many who pass for informed statesmen. His well-stocked and fertile mind draws lessons from the continents and the centuries. He gives enough facts, from a wide range of sources, to permit the reader to judge of his conclusions, but primarily this is a work of interpretation. It bundles up in a single volume much that the author has thought and said in a life of learning, observation, and conscientious report.

The superiority of the book lies in the thesis that world events can best be understood in the light of the development of capitalism, including for many countries, but not for the United States, imperialism. Yet Sternberg does not so much enforce a doctrine as use it to illumine the paths he treads. Though he is alarmed at "the danger that a large part of the industrial apparatus of the world will be destroyed, . . . the danger of a long period without history, the danger of a decline into barbarism," he is far from concluding that "things past redress are now with me past care."

He feels that the only chance of checking and ultimately quieting the mortal antagonism between the two world powers—the U. S. S. R. and the United States—lies in building "a progressive, democratic Socialist Europe." United and reconstructed, these countries would be industrially and militarily stronger than Russia, "and yet would have not the slightest reason or desire to attack her." This Europe, combining economic progress with political and personal liberty, would be a "third force" between the present two. If given time, it could infiltrate the Soviet Union with principles of individual freedom and beckon the United States along the road of cooperative institutions. A demonstration, in a United Europe, "that a democratic Socialist society can exist and maintain itself" might prove that "the totalitarian Soviet State is not the inevitable alternative to the capitalist system."

This is not a novel prescription, but the author, by elimination of any other solution, and by positive support, invests it with new meaning. The book, however, is anything but hortatory. It is rather the solemn and feeling testimony of a European (now American) who has abundant means of knowing whereof he speaks. BROADUS MITCHELL

New Forms in Art

ABSTRACT PAINTING. Background and American Phase. By Thomas B. Hess. The Viking Press. $7.50.

SEASONALLY," the author writes in his foreword, "new abstract painters appear with unfamiliar forms, created with new ideas, deriving from living traditions. That such appearances recently have been made in America, and in fact that they constitute one of this country's major contributions to contemporary culture, is the subject of this book."

The eighteen painters selected for discussion are, without exception, of expressionist persuasion. Eleven of them were grouped by Ritchie, in the catalogue of last season's American Abstract show at the Museum of Modern Art, as Expressionist Geometric (Tobey, Hofmann, Motherwell, Tomlin, Reinhardt) or as Expressionist Biomorph (DeKooning, Gorky, Baziotes, Brooks, Rothko, Pollock). A twelfth (Balcomb Greene) would surely have been similarly grouped if he had been represented by a recent example of his work; likewise the remaining six (Tworkov, Gatch, Bloom, Gottlieb, Kline, Vicente), if they had been represented at all. While I am not happy about classing abstract painters by double abstractions—and Hess is too much interested in the individual artist to bother with such matters—these citations will indicate the direction that the most interesting abstract painting has been taking.

Ritchie's catalogue was limited to a survey of the earlier history of abstract art in America and the grouping mentioned above; the present book bravely embarks on criticism, a criticism which is based on enthusiastic interest. Supplemented by over one hundred reproductions, including twelve color plates of excellent quality, this is an important contribution both as an estimate of the painters and as the debut of a discerning, witty, and courageous critic.

In his lively introduction Hess intimates, without falling into clichés, that abstraction is as old as art itself and that the enduring value of any art lies primarily in its formal values. But he is sometimes dogmatic and, I think, wrong when he denies any artistic worth, in past art, to "species of subject . . . or the moral, political, or subconscious motive of the artist." Is Masaccio's moral grandeur irrelevant, then, and the thematic astringency of Piero? We do not need to pick the bones of Renaissance art to make it intelligible.

The second section, called Background and Paris, sets the stage for the third, called Foreground and New York. These are of equal length: everything considered, the balance of emphasis seems to me to be about right. The inevitable but indispensable survey of European developments is full of bright observations. Bonnard is not so much a belated Impressionist as "an Expressionist of pleasure—as great and heroic a position as is being one of pain." Chirico achieves a "waxy" light. Mondrian's forms are so firmly established that "one of the ironies of modern art will be the refusal of a child in 1982 to see anything in a Mondrian but the façade of a famous building."

I note, in passing, that much of the fine criticism that Hess lavishes on the European precursors is firmly grounded in a sympathetic acceptance of their subject matter and its implications.

In the final section (Foreground and New York) Hess turns perversely general, though he includes enough biography to distinguish individuals and an adequate account of their artistic development to date. The over-all estimates are incisive and sensitively written, but I miss the trenchant analysis of individual paintings which marks the earlier section. My disappointment is not unlike that produced by Greenberg's book on Miró—the criticism sets a fine, heady momentum up to the point of climax, and then unaccountably wobbles.

Turkey and Iran

THE UNITED STATES AND TURKEY AND IRAN. By Lewis V. Thomas and Richard N. Frye. Harvard University Press. $4.25.

THAT the Middle East has become an area vital to the American national interest, few will any longer contest. That this has been wholly a post-war manifestation, many are prone to overlook. That the United States policy of containing the U. S. S. R., as applied to the Middle East, has failed, almost everyone by now is convinced.

about which most Americans, in and out of government, have acquired either a body of misconceptions or an emotional partisanship. Neither is helpful in developing an informed public opinion, without which even policies maturely conceived may founder. In post-war Washington, however, there has been anything but mature reflection on the Middle East, and in the wake of the current Iranian and Egyptian crises and the lingering Arab-Israel tensions ■ sense of frustration emanating from Washington has overtaken ■ growing segment of the public.

Turkey and Iran are the only Middle East countries which abut on the U. S. S. R. They are—or should be—of equal concern to the United States and its Western allies in the cold war. Nevertheless, the first major break at the European end of the Western wall of containment along the extended periphery of the Soviet orbit begins at the Turkish-Iranian frontier. The question immediately arises as to why Turkey has been absorbed into the Western defense arrangements and Iran has not. It is to answering this question that Thomas and Frye essentially address themselves in their respective sections on Turkey and Iran.

Still their book, like all the others in Harvard's American Foreign Policy Library series, is not limited to United States interests in and relations with the countries under review. Thomas and Frye competently and succinctly describe the geography, natural resources, demographic trends, and cultural forces, and then admirably outline the history of Turkey and Iran. Within this context, which forms the bulk of the volume, the authors evaluate the problems and prospects of American responsibilities and policies toward the two Moslem lands. This mechanical treatment is perhaps inevitable, for until a decade ago Turkey and Iran lay entirely outside the sphere of United States national interest.

American missionaries, it is true, have been active in the two countries for well over a century. Until Pearl Harbor, however, the Department of State reflected our isolationist policy toward Europe and western Asia by scrupulously eschewing any entanglements in this Moslem region.

Even during World War II, when Turkey and Iran for the first time were thrust upon Washington's attention, no long-range American programs emerged. The United States government tended to regard Turkey—like the Arab lands to the south—as falling within the British sphere of influence, and such American policy as was articulated aimed primarily at shoring up British defenses and "incidentally [at] exploiting Turkey's neutrality in our own interests." In the case of Iran, United States policy centered on expediting the transport of lend-lease supplies to Russia.

In the final months of World War II and the early post-war period Turkey and Iran became the objects of Soviet aggression, as the Kremlin attempted to chip off the Shah's northwestern provinces and obtain a controlling interest in an Iranian oil concession, and laid claim to bases in the Turkish Straits area and to the northeast districts of Kars and Ardahan. While the United States contributed to the defeat of Russia's immediate designs, it was only with the Truman Doctrine, observes Thomas, that Turkey came into its own in American strategic thinking.

Precisely because the Turkish government and people were united in their hostility to the Soviet Union was there established an immediate identity of purpose between Ankara and Washington. Thomas also notes that American policy did "not involve us in important differences with our English-speaking allies." This was so, he might have added, because Britain enjoyed no special status in Turkey, and American intervention, by keeping the U. S. S. R. out of Turkey, was helping Britain to shield its elaborate interests and privileges in the Arab world from direct contact with the U. S. S. R.

American economic and military grants earmarked for Turkey amounted to some $700,000,000 by 1950. In sharp contrast, American aid to Iran in resisting Soviet pressures in 1946-47 consisted exclusively of diplomatic and moral support. This was indeed indispensable to Tehran in thwarting Russia, and United States prestige reached its height in the fall of 1947, when, with Ambassador Allen's advance public indorsement, the Iranian Majlis, or legislature, rejected the provisional Soviet-Iranian oil agreement. Thereafter, despite promises of substantial economic assistance, less than $15,000,000 were allocated to Iran, the bulk of it in the form of credits for the purchase of American war surplus.

Frye tells us that even the Shah, Iran's most persistent advocate of close relations with the United States, finally "criticized the slowness and meagerness of American aid." This Frye believes to have been ■ capital American failure. While he does not explain the reasons for Washington's parsimony, these may be inferred from his analysis of Iran's ambivalence to the U. S. S. R., the existence of the well-organized and growing pro-Soviet Tudeh Party, and the dependence of Iran's economy on Russia. Even more important was the presence of the British—a factor which entirely escaped the author's notice—who through the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company not only exerted powerful pressures on the Iranian government but resented American meddling. On the other hand, Frye lucidly presents the Iranian viewpoint in the developments leading up to the oil crisis in the spring of 1951.

A summary chapter, written jointly by Thomas and Frye, would have enhanced greatly the value of the study and brought into sharp focus the effects and implications of the contrasting United States policies in Turkey and Iran. Despite this omission the book is a must, for it provides a sound introduction to American problems and responsibilities in these two Moslem lands.

THE STRUGGLE FOR SURVIVAL.

A Chronicle of Economic Mobilization in World War II. By Eliot Janeway. Yale University Press. $5.

HISTORY may be a fable agreed upon, but until the fable takes final shape the deep moans round with many voices. The bits and pieces which will some day make up the story of "the war effort" of the 1940's are still coming in, and the latest contribution is Eliot Janeway's brilliant and often exasperating "The Struggle for Survival."

Mr. Janeway sees some things very clearly, and he pounces on one truth which ought to go into all textbooks on American government: a President who has large affairs to direct does not need to be a good administrator—is, indeed, probably much better off if he is no administrator at all.

As Mr. Janeway abundantly demonstrates, Franklin Roosevelt was an excessively bad administrator. From the start of the struggle with the Axis, the administrative set-up in Washington was terrible, and F. D. R. was forever making it worse—brightly, airily, and for the best of reasons. But Roosevelt was also one of the greatest of Presidents. He saw what had to be done and he got it done expertly, caring not a fig for administration but relying, as Mr. Janeway aptly says, on "the unorganized momentum of American democracy." It could probably be argued—as the author comes close to doing—that great leadership in the White House succeeds, not in spite of administrative ineptitude, but in large part because of it. After all, Hoover was the Great Administrator.

In any case, Mr. Janeway examines the steps by which government was organized to create a victorious war economy—the forgotten War Resources Board, the NDAC, OPM, and SPAB, the War Production Board, and all the rest. The virtue of his book is that he makes clear what was so very hard to see at the time—that the real job was to take the wraps off and release "the anonymous energies of the millions behind whose momentum Roosevelt followed." The machinery was bad and much of it was atrociously operated, but the work did get done—faster and better than the wildest optimist would have dared to hope.

To an extent this study is excellent. What makes it exasperating is what can only be described as the streak of Time-Life-Fortune omniscience that runs through it all. Mr. Janeway is never in doubt; he never has to peer through a glass darkly. He can see unbroken patterns everywhere: the fathomless designs of Justice Frankfurter, the devious plots of Harry Hopkins, and the diabolically benign machinations of F. D. R.

Actually, it was never quite that simple. Also, Mr. Janeway is preoccupied with his pet villain, Donald Nelson, for whom he can find no adequate denunciation. If the military finally took control, if reconversion was halted, if greed and reaction finally steered the nation blindly into a post-war era where a world was waiting to be remade—if these deplorable things happened, as indeed they did, Mr. Janeway can see no reason but Nelson's incompetence, duplicity, shortsightedness, and timidity. Really, there was more to it than that.

As a minor matter, Mr. Janeway's fondness for phrase-making now and then betrays him—as when, describing the defense boom as a step in the Roosevelt revolution, he remarks that "it saw Negroes move about in their own Cadillacs, farmers in their own airplanes, hillbillies in their own shoes, and the rich in their own kitchens." That may be fine in the slick-paper magazines, but it hardly belongs in a history.

And it is history to which Mr. Janeway is contributing. His contribution has value, but it needs to be read with a good deal of reserve.

COLLECTED POEMS." By Marianne Moore (Macmillan, $3): Here be, as the old maps say, jerboas and pangolins, the plumet basilisk, the tuatera, the aepyornis and the apteryx, pin-swins and wood-weasels, a host of curious specimens, animal, vegetable, and mineral; also artifacts, and quotations from Montaigne, George Shiras III, Alphonse de Candolle, Dostoevsky, Richard Baxter, Xenophon, and many, many others, famous and obscure. Here are also precision and wit, a passionate interest and a reserved manner, irony, craft, an elaboration that counterpoints succinctness, a muting of music and rhyme that sets off the occasionally imperious tone, the ne plus ultra of Alexandrian poetry. And do not make the mistake of thinking there is no emotion. Take probity on faith? A rare experience in our time. It is offered us here, and we should be grateful. (At a bargain price, too; for the earlier presentations are some of them out of print.)

"The Third Eyelid," by Frona Lane (Alan Swallow, $2), continues the promise of this house to present in its New Poetry Series interesting "first collections" in compact form. As a matter of fact, Miss Lane carries the compactness pretty far, relying, for effects of wryness and terseness, on omission of articles and considerable use of the imperative mood. Her work with snapshot and flash bulb, as in Clothes-Line and a Balcony, or Niobe-Night, is more successful than her attempt at mural painting, as illustrated by the last poem in the book, Ritual of Purification, which is over-italicized, and OVER-CAPITAL-

IZED. A pleasant little poem, Family Letter, shows what Miss Lane can do by way of variety when she is not being too ambitious.

"First Love, and Other Poems," by Edwin Rolfe (The Larry Edmunds Bookshop, Los Angeles, $2.75), testifies, with elegiac eloquence, to the author's devotion to the people of Spain, his memory of their heroes, whether native or volunteer: there are chants in praise of Chaplin and Dreiser. Mr. Rolfe's range extends from a controlled sadness, with a good deal of reservation in the statement, as in, for instance, Recruit, to the Latin rhetoric of the next to the last poem in this collection, Elegia, which seemed as authentic in its first appearance, the Spanish translation made by J. Rubia Barcia, as it does in Mr. Rolfe's own English.

Speaking of Spain, if anybody cares to remember, the Beloit Poetry Journal has issued as Chapbook No. 1, in paper covers, priced at $1, the "Romancero Gitano" of García Lorca, translated by Langston Hughes. There is an introduction by Robert Glauber, and some illustrations (pretty horrible) by John McNee, Jr. It is high time that these fifteen ballads, Lorca's greatest work, were presented as the unit they are. Mr. Hughes's translations are scrupulous and careful, perhaps even a little too modest; through close fidelity to the line of the text, he sometimes verges on prosy statement, whereas a bit more freedom, a greater concern with line music and resonance, would have come closer to the spirit if not the letter of the original.

In lighter vein, we have "Green Fingers, and Other Poems," by Reginald Arkell (Harcourt, Brace, $2). These are about gardening; their author has won laurels as the creator of a quaint character known as Old Herbaceous. I am, I suspect happily, unfamiliar with the antics of this citizen, but if he reflects at all the author's verse tendencies, he is, I conclude, soapily sentimental and cute enough to puke a buzzard.

Readers interested in the Vassar days of Edna St. Vincent Millay might do well to inquire of the Vassar Alumnae Magazine whether reprints of the memorial essay, Vincent at Vassar, by Elizabeth Hazelton Haight, are available to the general public. Professor Haight was Miss Millay's Latin teacher and friend, and this memorial essay is tender and loving without being excessively saccharine. It is also copiously, and charmingly, illustrated, with photographs of the poet that range from school days in Camden, Maine, to the time when she returned to campus as a distinguished alumna reading her poems.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

Books in Brief

THE STORY OF THE ROCKEFELLER FOUNDATION. By Raymond B. Fosdick. Harper. $4.50. During the last half-century the philanthropic trusts established by the Rockefellers have expended nearly a billion dollars for public welfare, particularly health and education, and for the most part the money seems to have been spent with the same shrewdness and foresight that characterized its accumulation. This excellent book by a former president of the Rockefeller Foundation describes the underlying principles on which these world-wide philanthropies have been based, the techniques of selecting and carrying through the programs, and the results in terms of social betterment and human progress. The senior Rockefeller said, "A man should make all he can, and give all he can." Reading this book one is convinced that, on balance, the world benefited from his success in both endeavors.

THE MARSHALL STORY. By Robert Payne. Prentice-Hall. $5. Another book—and this time a good one—by that fabulously prolific young Englishman now teaching in Alabama who already is the author of forty volumes on the most diverse and unrelated subjects. Written in haste, as all Payne's books must be, and without first-hand knowledge of its subject, it is nevertheless a lucid, readable, and objective study of General Marshall's life, character, and accomplishments, with an especially interesting section on how and why the General was tripped up in trying to solve the Chinese problem.

THE GREAT RASCAL. By Jay Monaghan. Little, Brown. $4.50. The subtitle reads: "The exploits of the amazing Ned Buntline, king of the dime novelists, Buffalo Bill's promoter, soldier, sportsman, Western trader, roué, political manipulator, adventurer extraordinary." Judson (Buntline was his pen name) was a hare-brained complete rascal of the last century whose ways of making money were almost as numerous as those of Panurge, and no more scrupulous. Mr. Monaghan's research was thorough, his style is journalistic, his book a slight but interesting addition to the history of low life in America.

THE SHRIKE" (Cort Theater) is a rather odd sort of play which begins where Strindberg's "The Father" leaves off. It begins, that is to say, with the arrival in a psychiatric ward of a man whose wife has managed to get him sent there, and it then goes on to the point where he is finally discharged in her custody. This means, so the implication is, that he is right back where he started from, since any time that he rebels against her authority she can have him committed all over again. The total effect is, nevertheless, not quite so Strindbergian as this sounds, because the play turns out to be approximately one-third melodrama, one-third "documentary," and one-third protest against official mis-handling of our mental invalids. The author may possibly have read Strindberg, but he has obviously been more influenced by such things as, say, "The Snake Pit" and Mr. Kingsley's pioneer documentary "Men in White." The end result may be a rather grisly sort of entertainment but entertainment after a fashion it is certainly intended to be, and there is a fair chance that it will be accepted as such by a satisfactorily large audience. After all, no other age since the Elizabethan has been so interested as ours is in the madman, and no inconsiderable part of the vast current literature about psychiatry has been marketed as good light reading.

It is as documentary melodrama that this play succeeds best. All the scenes take place in one or another of the wards of a city hospital, and the first, which begins when the victim of attempted suicide by phenobarbital is rolled in and the machinery of the hospital begins to move, is tense and arresting. Presently the wife comes in all tears; the husband finally recovers consciousness; and gradually one begins to realize that the wife is a villain, that she has driven her husband to desperation, and that, consciously or unconsciously, her persistent intention is to get him back into her clutches. The psychiatrists, who appear to be remarkably stupid and more fanatically committed to the social, sexual, and matrimonial proprieties than one has been led to think psychiatrists usually are, never get to understand what the audience soon sees very clearly; they cooperate beautifully with the villainess; and the victim does not get out until he decides to play the hypocrite. He tells the doctors what they want to hear, stages a reconciliation with his wife, and then is left at the final curtain desperate with the realization that he will never be a free man again.

José Ferrer, who generally plays sane men rather wildly, plays this madman with subdued effectiveness, and there is also a skilful presentation of the hypocritical wife by Judith Evelyn. The trouble with the play is that the documentary interest wears out early in the second act and that the hopelessness of the victim's situation is never entirely convincing; so that the whole is not quite real either as tragedy or as social protest. The present reviewer is no lawyer, but he hopes he is not wrong in believing that the commitment in the wife's custody is not unlimited either as to duration or as to the powers which it confers. An old New Yorker cartoon showed a lawyer explaining to an indignant lady that she cannot get a divorce exclusively on the ground of insubordination, and I fancy that the point is relevant. My advice to the husband would be to bear up as well as he can for a year or two and then to move into his own apartment. I doubt that he could be summarily sent back to an insane asylum without a hearing or that at such a hearing inability to get along with his wife would be considered sufficient and prima facie evidence of certifiable madness. In other words, the hero of this play is in rather a tough spot, but the author does not succeed in convincing me that it is quite so bad as, for melodramatic purposes, he asks us to believe that it is.

As for the title, which is never referred to in the course of the play, one may explain for the benefit of non-ornithologists that a shrike is a small bird which kills rodents and sometimes other birds, which it either eats immediately or hangs up for future use on a thorn or a barbed-wire fence. I suppose the fact that one would never suspect from its appearance that it has any such bloody habits is the reason for the implied comparison with the wife in this play. Even so the appropriateness is not too striking.

HAGGIN

THE newest recording of Bach's great Passacaglia for organ (MGM) provides another disappointment. Carl Weinrich plays the work straightforwardly on the organ of Princeton University Chapel; and it must be the acoustic defects of the chapel that cause the opening statement of the theme to come off the record with a counterpoint not written by Bach, and his own lines of counterpoint often not to be clear in the variations and fugue. There is a similar lack of clarity in the A minor Concerto after Vivaldi on the reverse side.

On the other hand Robert Noehren's performances of Bach's Canonic Variations on "Vom Himmel hoch da komm' ich her" and Chorale and Variations on "O Gott, Du frommer Gott" on the organ of Grace Episcopal Church in Sandusky, Ohio (Allegro), come off the record with admirable clarity. ercises of prodigious technique with no interesting musical results; the second, which he wrote at the age of seventeen, is engaging, with a remarkable and moving chromatic slow variation.

Clearly reproduced also are Helmut Walcha's performances of Bach's Schübler Chorale Preludes on the St. Jakobi organ in Lübeck, and five other Chorale Preludes on the Schnitger organ in Cappel (Decca). Of the Schübler group the best-known, "Wachet auf, ruft uns die Stimme," is the most impressive; of the others I find "An Wasserflüssen Babylon" beautiful and "Nun freut euch, lieben Christen g'mein" engaging, but "Fuga sopra il Magnificat," "Vom Himmel hoch da komm' ich her," and "Valet will ich dir geben" less interesting. The performances are good.

Fernando Valenti's harpsichord playing seems to me the finest, in its treatment both of the instrument and of the music, that is now to be heard, and lends interest to two otherwise uninteresting works of Bach—the Toccata in D minor and the Prelude, Fugue, and Allegro in E flat—that are on one record with the fine Toccata in E minor (Allegro).

The Haydn Piano Sonata No. 46 issued by the Haydn Society is the one that EMS issued as No. 43, and one of his best. Virginia Pleasants plays it with effective tempos, clarity, sensitiveness, and repose—as against the more turbulent pianistic brilliance of Rosen's EMS performance, No. 49, on the same Haydn Society record, I find uninteresting. And I would skip Soulima Stravinsky's performances of six other Haydn sonatas, most of them uninteresting (Allegro).

Friedrich Gulda's performances of Beethoven's Sonatas Opus 110 and Opus 27 No. 2 on one London record and Opus 106 ("Hammerklavier") on another are like the one of Opus 111 at his first recital in New York—remarkable for the accuracy and beauty of sound with which his clearly outlining conceptions of the music are executed, but with those outlines lacking the intensification and projective force that maturity may bring, and with the works lacking the strength that Beethoven's music should have. The inadequacy is greatest in Opus 106, least in the tranquil opening movement of Opus 110. And I should mention that Gulda's unusual treatment of the repeated A in measures 5 and 6 of the Adagio of Opus 110 doesn't work for me. The piano is well reproduced; but in addition to the audible hall resonance peculiar to London recording, the side with Opus 110 produces on my machine a pounding noise which it does not produce on a machine with limited bass.

Schumann's "Carnaval" (Columbia) is played well by Gyorgy Sandor; the recorded sound is glassy, and metallic in loud passages. The less familiar "Faschingschwank aus Wien" (Vanguard), played well by Jacqueline Blancard, I find uninteresting; and the Brahms Variations on a Theme of Schumann, on the reverse side, even more so.

Chopin's Ballades (Allegro) are played well by Leonid Hambro; even with bass enormously stepped up the piano sound is shallow (Casadesu's performances are even better, and are better reproduced). The Nocturnes (RCA Victor) are played by Rubinstein very beautifully in the traditional mannered style. Firkusny's performance of the great Sonata Opus 58 (Columbia) is something to skip.

Debussy's Etudes (REB) offer elaborations of the various elements of his piano style—most of them interesting only in that respect, a few engaging and impressive as music. They are played well by Charles Rosen.

With Henry Cowell's performances of a number of his piano pieces (Circle) comes a separate little record with his spoken comments on them, which would be more useful printed on the envelope. Cowell has devised ingenious ways of manipulating the strings of the piano directly to produce the sound of a harp, the wailing of a banshee, and other things of that kind; but the pieces achieve nothing of interest beyond their approximations of the sounds of the harp, the banshee, and so on. And I find myself not interested much more by the pieces whose substance is produced by the normal method of depressing the keys.

A reader thinks I gave a slightly misleading impression, in my discussion of the New York City Ballet's repertory, with the phrase "the inferior ballets of other choreographers." He points out that while these ballets are inferior to Balanchine's, "one, 'Illuminations,' is quite fine, and at least three others, 'The Duel,' 'Cakewalk,' and 'Mother Goose,' are slight but respectable—i. e., not the actually shoddy stuff that you find in other companies."

Of Vital Importance to Every Parent and Teacher

SPECIAL INTERESTS with selfish motives are fighting today for control of the minds of youth. In a democracy, this is everybody's concern; and everybody should know the facts. They are presented in a pamphlet, THE BATTLE FOR FREE SCHOOLS, made up of eight articles by able and fearless educators. These articles describe the serious crisis faced by our schools, show that the attacks on democratic public education are increasing to an alarming extent, and discuss other problems vital to teachers, parents, and school boards. Edited by Dr. Theodore Brameld, professor of educational philosophy at New York University, they appeared recently in The Nation. They include:

- I. FEVER SPOTS IN AMERICAN EDUCATION
By Morris Mitchell, director of the Putney (Vermont) Graduate School of Teacher Education.
- II. TEACHERS AND THE "THING"
By Goodwin Watson, professor of education at Teachers College, Columbia University, author of "Action for Unity," and other books.
- III. BIG BUSINESS AND THE SCHOOL SYSTEM
By J. Austin Burkhart, teacher of political science at Stephens College, Columbia, Missouri.
- IV. THE FOOT IN THE DOOR—ORGANIZED RELIGION IN AMERICAN SCHOOLS
By Jerome Nathanson, leader at the Ethical Culture Society, chairman of Federal Aid to Education, and author of "John Dewey: The Reconstruction of Democratic Life."
- V. MINORITIES IN EDUCATION
By Horace Mann Bond, president of Lincoln University, and Morton Puner, former editor of Reader's Scope, free-lance writer now with the Anti-Defamation League.
- VI. MONEY, CHILDREN, AND EDUCATION
By Frederick C. McLaughlin, author of the recently published book "Fiscal and Administrative Control of City School Systems."
- VII. DIRECTIONS FOR EDUCATIONAL PROGRESS
By Kenneth D. Benne, professor of education at the University of Illinois, president of the American Education Fellowship, author of "A Concept of Authority" and other books.
- VIII. A WORKING AGENDA FOR SCHOOLS OF THE PEOPLE
By Theodore Brameld, editor of this series, author of "Patterns of Educational Philosophy" and other books.

HAROLD L. ICKES, IN SPITE OF SOME ILL health in recent years, was vigorous and effective almost to the day of his death. His articles in the New Republic were shrewd, salty, and penetrating. He followed events with unflagging attention, and when you talked to him you always sensed the long knowledge that lay behind his most casual comments. Not that his judgments were infallible. Far from it. Often infuriatingly wrong-headed and arbitrary, he would stick to his position with a passion worthy of a better cause. But when the better cause came along you could count on Harold Ickes to fight for it without any concern for his own interest or convenience. Republican Spain, for example, had no better friend in America; and his opposition to the policy of conciliating Franco was expressed with an open contempt for the expediencies of cold war and the threats of the witch hunters. Ickes's eminence as Secretary of the Interior is unchallenged. Not only did he enforce the standards that ruled out the possibility of new Teapot Domes; he also established so firmly the doctrine of public control over public resources that it will be hard, we believe, for any succeeding Secretary to abandon it altogether. Throughout his years in office he was not so much a good administrator as a dynamic leader who imbued his subordinates in the multifarious bureaus and divisions of the monstrous department with a new sense of direction, a social and political goal. His resignation was a misfortune for which the President was plainly responsible, but it gave Mr. Ickes a few years of freedom to devote to his family and a wide variety of personal and public interests. His going will leave a big gap in American life, for Harold Ickes was one of those rare persons who could be fought or followed but never for a moment ignored.

REPORTS FROM LONDON CONFIRM ANDREW Roth's account of Chiang's Guerrillas in our issue of January 26. On January 19 the Observer's crack correspondent, Rawle Knox, cabled from Rangoon that "one of Chiang Kai-shek's best battalions from Formosa has recently reinforced Kuomintang General Li Mi's 93d Division in [northeastern] Burma, according to indisputable authorities"—meaning, apparently, the British embassy. "There is indisputable evidence that Americans are helping the 93d Division. Two Americans accompanied it in its ignominious offensive last autumn, and when retreat followed, a Thai [Siamese] police helicopter was sent to evacuate them from Mongnyen. It crashed and was burned by its crew; the two Americans walked out into Thailand. . . . Over Kengtung town [in north-eastern Burma's Shan States], Constellations are frequently seen flying at about 10,000 feet. . . . Misdirected parachute drops have been found, which include American small arms manufactured since the war. Surrendered Kuomintang men say they have been helped into Burma by an American organization in Bangkok. . . . There is quite sufficient evidence . . . to show that an independent American agency is helping Kuomintang troops and material through Thailand to Burma, a maneuver for which, in present Asian circumstances, foolhardy is a temperate word." Reports of this kind help to explain John Foster Dulles's statement before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on January 21 in which he said that to produce "a change in China . . . will require determination to promote freedom and independence in Asia, and action consistent with that determination as opportunities arise" (italics ours). ✱

IT WAS INEVITABLE THAT THE ATTACK ON free schools should eventually be directed at a college. This is the prime significance of the recent attempt of the Hearst press, aided by Allen Zoll, Louis Budenz, the American Legion Magazine, Counterattack, and a local Legion post, to breach the walls of academic freedom at Sarah Lawrence College. The attack follows the familiar pattern of the razzle-dazzle campaigns launched against the public schools in Pasadena, California, Englewood, New Jersey, and a score of other communities since 1949. "Charges" are irresponsibly aired; then a local group "demands," under direct threat of financial reprisal, that the institution deliver up certain heretics; finally, to give the campaign meaning, the public threats are neatly synchronized to give the impression that they represent mass opposition rather than the ravings of a small group of fanatics egged on by self-seeking organizations and institutions. In this instance the plot has failed because the trustees of Sarah Lawrence have declined to be placed in a defensive position. In a fine statement the trustees declared: "An educational institution must teach its students to think for themselves by giving them the knowledge upon which to base judgments. . . . In carrying out this responsibility faculty members are expected to deal candidly and honestly with controversial questions. Teachers who meet the test of candor, honesty, and scholarly integrity may not be deprived of any rights they hold as citizens of this country, including the right to belong to any legal political organization of their own choosing. . . . The idea that a member of the faculty should take intellectual or political dictation from any quarter is alien to everything Sarah Lawrence stands for. Prejudiced or politically inspired teaching would quickly reveal itself, and would be rejected by the students and by the whole college." If the trustees stand by this statement, there will be no rout of freedom at Sarah Lawrence.

THE FBI WAS GIVEN A TASTE OF ITS OWN medicine in Hawaii when the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union broadcast over Station KHON the recorded conversation of two FBI agents with David Thompson, the union's educational director. Calling at Thompson's home, the agents tried to persuade him to help them convince Jack W. Hall, a union official now under indictment for violation of the Smith act, to become a government witness. Unknown to the agents, a tape recording was made of the interview. With remarkable frankness the agents offered a variety of "deals," including a reduction in the number of counts in the indictment against Hall, if he would "go along" with the government. The agents scoffed at the notion that the persons indicted in Hawaii for violation of the Smith act constituted "a clear and present danger" to the security of the islands. "They just don't rate," one of them said; "they would make poor Communists in the lowest cell in California." It is too bad that the playback of the recording could not have been heard over a national network or at least by a Congressional committee. If this is a fair sample of the political police activities of the FBI, it is high time Mr. Hoover was asked a few questions.

NOW THAT EVERYBODY IS INVESTIGATING everybody else it is no surprise to find Frank E. McKinney of Indianapolis, so recently chosen by President Truman to help purify the Democratic Party, himself the object of an inquiry in connection with the bankruptcy case of Frank Cohen's Empire Tractor Corporation. The trustees of that defunct company want to find out whether its failure was caused in part by the huge, quick profits paid to Mr. McKinney and his friend Frank M. McHale, Democratic National Committeeman from Indiana. They also want to know whether those profits can be recovered and turned over to the company's creditors. In an effort to protect the reputation of his new National Chairman, Mr. Truman has refused to make available the report on the Empire Ordnance Company, a related Cohen enterprise, made by the Truman committee in 1942. The President said it is "not in accord with our American traditions" to parade the names of individuals before the public "for scorn or ridicule without regard to their guilt or innocence." These are praiseworthy scruples. But Chairman McKinney's name is already before the public, and enough questionable doings have been connected with it so that the full facts can only help him—unless they are still more questionable. Readers who recall Irving Liebowitz's article, Frank "Midas" McKinney, in The Nation of December 29, will agree that evasive tactics will no longer serve the Democratic National Chairman, or the President.

MEANWHILE, MR. GABRIELSON, MCKINNEY'S Republican counterpart, and Mr. Boyle, his Democratic predecessor, are in trouble too. Both have been accused by the Senate investigating subcommittee of dubious conduct in connection with several RFC loans. But Mr. Gabrielson at least has found a champion. Senator Joe McCarthy, whose feeling for the niceties and scrupulous regard for the rights of the accused are well known, entered a lone dissent from the subcommittee's report. His comment should be included in all future collections of McCarthiana. "The report, in my opinion," he said, "must stick strictly to the facts as proven and not indulge in supposition."

THE RECENT APPOINTMENT OF LUIGI GEDDA to head Catholic Action in Italy is proof that the Vatican is getting ready for a showdown with the anti-clerical elements in the Christian Democratic Party. Gedda is the man who in 1948 organized the Catholic "Civic Committees" which turned out the Christian Democratic vote and coincidentally made Catholic Action, the temporal arm of the church, very influential within the party. He is an extreme conservative who has consistently urged closer cooperation between the Demo-Christians and the extreme right. When the appointment was announced, Monarchist and neo-Fascist legislators promptly expressed approval. A Demo-Christian spokesman limited himself to declaring that his party would not become subservient to church policies, but it is evident that a real fight for control is in prospect. The Vatican newspaper, L'Osservatore Romano, in an angry editorial aimed at refuting the criticism which both the left and the center have leveled at Gedda, declared that "all these influences are fanciful" since "Catholic Action is not a political organization or a political party." The Osservatore denied that the church was applying any pressure to the Demo-Christians, although in the same breath it declared that there could obviously be no division of policy between that party and the clergy. The first indications of how successful Gedda has been will come in the spring, when thirty-three provinces, mainly in southern Italy, will hold administrative elections. If Gedda and Catholic Action succeed in forcing the Demo-Christians to collaborate with the Monarchists and the neo-Fascist Italian Social Movement, the result might not only split the government party but confirm the victory of political clericalism.

ALGER HISS, CONVICTED OF PERJURY TWO years ago by the second of two juries to hear his case, has moved for a third trial based on newly discovered evidence. The motion is supported by affidavits strongly suggesting that the famous Woodstock typewriter, which figured so prominently in the trials, may have been a specially built or fabricated machine and not the machine that Hiss once owned. Its serial number indicates that it was built in the second half of 1929, whereas the admitted Hiss letters and the Chambers documents appear in a typeface that the Woodstock Company had abandoned at the end of 1928 or early 1929. The motion also relies on sworn testimony by Lee Pressman, formerly chief counsel for the C. I. O., which directly contradicts Chambers's testimony that Hiss once belonged to a Communist "apparatus" that included Pressman. Pressman's statement was not available at either trial, since he had not then decided to testify before the House Un-American Activities Committee. Of great interest also is a wealth of new evidence cited to prove that Chambers had broken with the Communist Party and gone into hiding at a date which would make it impossible for him to have been a pillar of the Communist espionage system late in the spring of 1938. The motion contains, in addition, two affidavits from witnesses who, without qualification, contradict the testimony of the "surprise" witness, Edith Murray, whose testimony was largely instrumental in bringing about the conviction of Hiss at the second trial. Both trials were conducted in a social, if not a courtroom, atmosphere that was highly prejudicial; it is to be hoped, therefore, that this motion for a new trial will be weighed with the greatest care and objectivity.

AN INVESTIGATION OF BLACKLISTING practices in the radio and television industries by the Federal Communications Commission was proposed in these columns on December 1, 1951. We are now pleased to report that the Author's League of America has instructed its president, Rex Stout, to ask the commission for a hearing on the blacklisting of writers and others by radio and television licensees. In view of the great public interest in the question and the clear threat which blacklisting offers to American institutions, the FCC should grant the request. Properly conducted, such a hearing could dispel "the black shadow of fear" from television and radio studios.

While the Supreme Court Pussyfoots

FACED with an opportunity to strike a final blow at segregated public schools, the Supreme Court has not only dodged the issue but in effect ruled that the right of Negro children to equality of education must be vindicated in each school district of the South. The nub of the ruling in the Clarendon County, South Carolina, case is that the court prefers to force the admission of Negroes to "white" schools on a case-by-case basis rather than rule that the "separate-but-equal" doctrine is a contradiction in terms.

In recent years the Supreme Court has gradually broken down the pattern of segregation in the tax-supported graduate and professional schools of most of the border and a number of Southern states. Last year the N. A. A. C. P. decided to strike at segregation in the public schools. Negro parents in Clarendon County brought suit in the federal district court, asking that their children be admitted to the regular "white" school on the ground that segregation is per se unconstitutional.

Over the vigorous dissent of Judge J. Waties Waring, the special three-judge court sitting on the case decided that segregation was constitutional but that the Negro school in Clarendon must be made "equal" to the white. School officials were accordingly ordered to report back within six months on the steps taken to achieve this objective. In the meantime, however, the petitioners appealed to the Supreme Court, which has now ruled that the lower court should have considered the report of the school officials—a ruling which will delay final decision on the crucial issue until well after the November election. As Justices Black and Douglas pointed out in dissents, the Supreme Court had all the information needed for a judgment if it had been willing to pass on the question of segregation itself. For if the court had faced this issue, it would not have mattered whether the Negro school was equal or even better than the "white."

When the case again comes before it, the Supreme Court will doubtless order Negro children admitted to the schools of Clarendon County; but the victory will be a narrow one indeed since it will be based solely on conditions of inequality found to exist in that one county. If the fight against segregation must go on until Negroes have captured every educational hedgerow, it will continue for many summers. It was for this reason that Governor James F. Byrnes hailed the decision as a victory for the South.

Apparently the Supreme Court—Justices Black and Douglas dissenting—intends to kill Jim Crow by as many pinpricks as there are school districts in the South. If this is its strategy, then we should like to go on record as saying that the court is likely to provoke a great deal more trouble than if it were to decide, once and for all, that segregated schools are unconstitutional. The facts recited in Len Schroeter's piece on page 124 indicate clearly enough that while the Supreme Court pussyfoots, the opposition is exploding bombs and blasting away with shotguns. By temporizing with these forces, the court only encourages further resistance and thereby arrests the pace of social progress. Further reprieves are pointless: Jim Crow is dying, let the final blow be struck!

Mr. Butler's Tourniquet

LAST week Britain's Chancellor of the Exchequer, Richard A. Butler, brought forward the second installment of a Tory austerity program calculated to make his fellow-countrymen look back longingly to the spacious days of Cripps. Two months ago Mr. Butler announced a reduction in import licenses for European goods, particularly foodstuffs, intended to cut imports by £350,000,000, together with the halving of tourists' foreign-exchange allowances. Now imports from other areas are to be reduced by £150,000,000, and the tourist allowance is again cut in half, bringing it down to £25 annually, not more than enough for an economical week in Paris.

Supplies of home produced as well as foreign goods are to be restricted. Quotas of most kinds of hard goods, including bicycles, radios, television sets, vacuum cleaners, and other household appliances, are to be a third less than last year. This will free capacity in the metal-working industries for export orders and defense, as will the proposed severe restriction of all non-essential building and investment in plant and machinery. It is also expected that these measures will lead to some unemployment and thus assist recruitment in the undermanned defense industries.

The reduction in the supply of goods available to British consumers must be matched by measures to cut down purchasing power if it is not to create new inflationary pressures. To this end Mr. Butler announced a cut in civil-service personnel and the modification of the National Health Service by the imposition of a small uniform charge for each prescription supplied and of fees for dental work, hitherto free. But these are obviously small beginnings; a much heavier attack on spending power is likely when Mr. Butler presents his budget on March 4, five weeks earlier than usual.

In the House of Commons the Labor opposition replied to the government's proposals with a motion of censure which declared that the new austerity program was "inadequate, inappropriate, and unjust" and urged that there could be "no confidence in a government whose present policy is in such marked contrast to the optimistic statements on which it was returned to power." That was a legitimate debating point, since when the Tories wooed the electorate with visions of fewer controls and more food, they were well aware that Britain's tottering balance of payments would not permit any thing of the sort. However, the Labor Party's spokesmen were handicapped by the fact that, like the Tories, they were committed to giving priority to rearmament. Had a Labor government been returned to office it would have been compelled to take very similar action unless it had decided to reduce defense expenditure.

Only the Bevanite group, therefore, was in a position to attack the government on the ground that it was sacrificing the social services and the workers' standard of living to rearmament. Bevan himself intervened effectively to point out that part of the proposed saving in imports was to be achieved by reducing reserves of food and materials—an act of "criminal lunacy" if there was really danger of war. However, the rebel leader appeared to be biding his time, expecting, perhaps, that his real opportunity would come when the budget appears, especially if the Chancellor confirms persistent rumors by abolishing the food subsidies.

While some of the Tories' belt-tightening measures are debatable, it is beyond dispute that Britain, in co-operation with its partners in the sterling area, must find means to end the drain on its gold and dollar reserves. In the second half of 1951 these reserves fell by $1,578,000,000 and now total only $2,335,000,000, which is not very much above the irreducible safe minimum of about $2,000,000,000. For some time both Britain and the principal sterling-area countries have been living above their incomes. If they continue to do so and there are further substantial drafts on the reserve, the sterling area is likely to collapse and Britain itself will be threatened with bankruptcy.

This danger was recognized at the recent conference in London of Commonwealth Finance Ministers, who agreed that each member of the sterling group should take appropriate measures to rectify its trade balance. Mr. Butler's program represents part of Britain's response to this challenge, and in the near future other members of the Commonwealth are expected to announce plans for curbing imports and investments and stimulating exports.

Such steps are probably inevitable in view of the present crisis. The difficulty is that they are essentially restrictionist and thus apt to be self-defeating. British curbs on imports from Europe, together with restrictions on tourists, must, for instance, create balance-of-trade difficulties for other countries, which in turn may find themselves forced to block imports from the sterling area. The result may be a concentration of British and European sales efforts in this country, where there is no balance-of-payments problem to serve as an excuse for limiting imports. Yet, if successful, such a sales drive would probably lead to strong protests from manufacturers here whose own production is being curtailed by defense requirements. Again, the restriction of investment must prevent the realization of one of Britain's prime needs—the improvement of its industrial plant. Without that it will not be able to raise its productivity and in the not very long run will find exports lagging because costs are too high.

Restrictionism, in short, is like a tourniquet. It may prevent a country from bleeding to death, but if retained for long it stops circulation. Britain has to find means not merely to check the economic hemorrhage which threatens its life but to end it. The real question facing Churchill's government, therefore, is the one that Mr. Bevan and his friends continue to press: can this cure be effected so long as the country is arming beyond its means?

The Speech Nobody Made

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Paris, January 30

FOR two months the press of the world has been publishing detailed accounts of the proceedings of the General Assembly and the various U. N. committees. But though the speeches have been accurately reported and the comments ample and intelligent, people have not got the real picture of what has been happening—of the change from the high expectations of the opening sessions to the sense of frustration now prevailing. To fill out the story, historians of the Assembly need a speech which is not in the files because it was never given aloud, though it was frequently whispered into the ears of delegates and journalists. It would have caused a great sensation if some representative of a small Western nation had had the courage to rise up and deliver it from the floor. It would have run, I believe, something like this:

Mr. Chairman: The country I represent belongs to what is usually called the "Western" or "Christian" world. As such it will be called upon to do its share in defending the West in case of Communist aggression. This gives me the right, I think, to appraise the forces on our side and the way they are being utilized. Since I speak in this tribunal I shall naturally emphasize the use the United Nations is making of them.

At San Francisco the United Nations pledged themselves to wipe out fascism. Their whole policy during the war was directed to that end, and no one imagined the task was accomplished when the last shot was fired. It was recognized that a continuing political effort, based on an accord among the five great powers, would be required. There is no use asking sadly or indignantly why this fundamental postulate of post-war policy was so soon forgotten. The fact is that the accord among the Big Five no longer exists, that it has been replaced by two antagonistic alliances, and that the United Nations, instead of trying to forge a new unity, is apparently bending every effort to prevent the great powers from getting together to negotiate an agreement. As a result the United Nations has lost all power to secure the peace. The give and take of negotiations has been abandoned for the adoption of resolutions by a not always convinced but usually obedient Western majority.

Countries which can contribute men or arms or experience in aggression are rated higher than those which, like mine, can only offer devotion to the principles of the Charter. Thus a Germany more and more dominated by the surviving exponents of Nazism, by pre-war generals and industrialists, exercises more influence here in the Palais de Chaillot, even before its formal admission to the U. N., than a country like India, which insists on conciliation; Uruguay with its long tradition of democracy is less courted than Franco's Spain.

While the propaganda front is one of the most important fronts of the cold war, the matter of effectives must also be considered. Besides the German and Japanese divisions which N. A. T. O.'s high command is planning to recruit, it must raise and equip French, English, Belgian, Scandinavian, South American, Greek, and Turkish troops. America, meanwhile, prepares Franco Spain for its role as ally and undertakes the rearming and training of the defeated forces of Chiang Kai-shek. The strain on the Western countries is tremendous. Post-war reconstruction is interrupted; consumers' goods are becoming scarce; living standards, already low, are declining; plans for the economic development of backward countries must be put off; trade barriers between East and West are multiplied; raw materials are stockpiled and channeled into the manufacture of armaments; bankruptcy is staved off only by fresh transfusions of dollars. I do not imagine these things. They are all described in the reports of the U. N.'s experts, and some have been discussed in the present Assembly. The trend in this direction was started by the U. N.'s famous resolutions—those creating the Interim Committee, the Acheson plan ("Uniting for Peace"), and other similar "collective" measures. And behind all these resolutions stands the transfer of the functions of the Security Council to the Assembly, where our "Western" world has a firm majority and no veto can be exercised. Have we, by these means, accomplished our aims?

In private conversations it is admitted that our plan has not worked. Though the resolutions were passed by overwhelming votes, the conviction which would have given them moral force and insured their effective implementation was lacking. The chief thought was that the enemy must not get the impression of any division in our ranks. We have repeatedly proclaimed the success of collective action in Korea, but there has been no military decision and so far no armistice to mark the successful application of military sanctions. The truth is that the handling of the Korean affair has antagonized all Asia.

The refusal of the Assembly to consider how to bring the Korean war to an early end has further damaged the prestige of this institution. When Mr. Vishinsky offered to discuss Korea, the Assembly, in my opinion, should have seized the opportunity either to unmask the Soviet proposal if it was only a maneuver or to make use of it if it was genuine. The man in the street simply does not understand—and, indeed, it is difficult to understand—why the United Nations must permit the war in Korea to drag on and on, apparently forever, without lifting a finger to finish the bloodshed. The argument that discussion in the U. N. might endanger the truce negotiations in Korea seems pure nonsense to the ordinary citizen. He knows only that the talks have been stalled for weeks and that if they collapse the U. N. troops may bomb China proper. Confronted with this gloomy prospect, he says: Well, after all, this is a United Nations war; if the United Nations is unable to finish it, what is the use of having a United Nations?

Our disarmament resolution had no practical value since it was opposed by the countries we wanted to see disarm. Our resolution on German unity was rejected by half of Germany. We voted for economic aid to underdeveloped countries knowing such aid would not get beyond the paper stage. When for once a miracle occurred in the Political Committee and a Russian resolution calling for simultaneous admission of the fourteen applicant nations was approved by twenty-one votes to twelve with twenty-five abstentions, the American delegation immediately initiated a drive to kill it in the Assembly, where a two-thirds' majority is required.

That is the record within the U. N. Outside, spokesmen for the Arab states have emphasized the failure of Western policy in the Middle East, and events have surely borne them out. Not only Aneurin Bevan but Winston Churchill has described the British economy as "ruined." The Americans try to reassure us by saying that the task of creating positions of strength has caused difficulties which will disappear as the rearmament program approaches completion. But what guaranty have we that the United States, after building up these positions of strength, will consider it necessary or advantageous to negotiate with the Russians? May not the desire to deliver an ultimatum overrule its allies' demand for a negotiated settlement? That question haunts us and overshadows every other calculation.

It is essential that we Westerners restore the prestige of negotiation. After all, public opinion in all our countries, however great the ideological opposition to communism, would be less offended by the sight of Soviet representatives around the council table than they are at the prospect of conferring with Hitler's former generals, or the men who planned Pearl Harbor, or Franco's pro-Nazi Falangists. Let us give frank and public expression here to the doubts voiced privately by so many delegates. Let us shape out of those doubts a policy of conciliation, and refuse to permit the United Nations to be converted into an instrument of "containment" or ultimate showdown in the struggle for power we have seen carried on in this Assembly. For that would mean its death.

Murder in the Mines

Washington, January 31

CLOSING his testimony on the Neely-Price mine-safety bill before a Senate labor subcommittee, John L. Lewis reminded committee members that in ancient Egypt there were men who tended the Houses of the Dead. "Those men were a breed apart. The effluvia of death always seemed to emanate from their bodies. I sometimes wish, when I have time to meditate between explosions, that some great anthropologist or profound student of genealogy would tell me whether our present-day coal operators are not descendants of the men who worked in the Houses of the Dead. In no other way can I account for their callousness, their indifference to death among their employees, their pseudo-defense of the killing, the maiming, the wounding of men."

The language was violent, although Lewis's manner was restrained, and Harry Moses, a veteran spokesman of the mine operators, blenched visibly. But the testimony of the operators themselves proved that the denunciation was justified. Witness after witness representing the coal industry declared that enforcement of federal mine-safety regulations would be "impracticable," that it was "unconstitutional," that it was fraudulently designed to promote, not safety, but "nationalization" of the mines.

Until 1941 mine operators were able to prevent federal inspectors from entering their pits. It would be "unconstitutional," they argued for an agent of the federal government to pass judgment on miners' working conditions. They were finally forced to allow federal safety inspections, but they blocked all attempts to give the Bureau of Mines and Department of the Interior the power to close down unsafe mines.

Since inauguration of the safety-inspection service not a single major mine disaster has occurred without prior warning of unsafe conditions. The Centralia, Illinois, mine in which 111 men died five years ago had been the subject of protests by federal inspectors and a committee of the miners. The Orient mine No. 2 at West Frankfort, Illinois, which killed 119 men just before Christmas, was criticized by federal inspectors as recently as last July 31.

WILLARD SHELTON was formerly The Nation's Washington correspondent.

BY WILLARD SHELTON

John J. Forbes, director of the Bureau of Mines, testified that four consecutive reports of federal agents in two years had warned the Chicago, Wilmington, and Franklin Coal Company that Orient No. 2 was dangerous and had spelled out the major hazards in capital letters.

While theoretically it should be possible for mine safety to be insured by the several states, the record of 93,000 deaths in fifty years shows that the states have not done the job. In Illinois, Governor Adlai Stevenson had a new safety code drafted, but the General Assembly refused to consider it. Even the members of the legislature from the West Frankfort area showed no interest.

The major objection to strict safety laws is economic. It costs money to protect mines against natural hazards—to use rock dusting to keep down the explosive potential of coal dust, to instal ventilating shafts, to buy "permissible" equipment (approved by federal inspectors) and maintain it in "permissible" operating condition. Moreover, if one state passes a rigid safety code, its mines are handicapped in competition with those of other states. The coal lobbyists scarcely have to lift an eyebrow in any state capital to discourage crusading about mine safety.

In spite of these facts not a single representative of the coal industry who appeared before the Neely subcommittee had the decency to admit frankly that the time had come for federal action. Harry Treadwell, vice-president of the company operating Orient mine No. 2, double-talked to the committee and the press. He told the committee, in response to repeated questions from Senator Murray, that he favored any law "that would stop accidents so we can continue in business," but he confided to reporters afterward that he was "not necessarily" in favor of the Neely-Price bill. The miners killed in the West Frankfort disaster left 301 dependents, but Treadwell is "not necessarily" in favor of effective measures to prevent future disasters.

Ed Schorr, representing the Ohio and some western Pennsylvania operators, warmly indorsed federal legislation in principle, but insisted that the whole federal mine-safety code—a highly technical document requiring expert interpretation—be written into law by Congress, so that day-to-day administration would be removed from the Bureau of Mines. Schorr also proposed that if the bureau closed down a mine, the operator be given the right of immediate recourse to a federal judge, who could suspend the order.

Robert E. Lee Hall, a lawyer who appeared for the National Coal Association, argued that the safety record of mines was steadily improving and that to transfer "primary responsibility" to the federal government would be unconstitutional and would create "uncertainties." Walter Thurmond expressed the opposition of the Southern Coal Producers' Association; an engineer from Pikesville, Kentucky, one O. S. Batten, who appeared for Kentucky operators, charged that the Neely-Price bill and the mine-safety code were equally insincere and fraught with menace to the Republic.

A curious note was introduced into the hearings by Thomas E. Shroyer, Senator Taft's representative on the staff of the Senate Labor Committee. Shroyer—and he was later echoed by Taft himself—exhibited concern for the constitutional question of whether coal mining is an aspect of interstate commerce and as such properly subject to federal regulation. Forbes, of the Bureau of Mines, insisted that fewer than 5 per cent of existing mines would be exempt from federal regulation on the ground that they operated wholly in intrastate commerce, but Taft and Shroyer seemed dubious. Apparently in their view the coal industry is clearly in interstate commerce when John L. Lewis is to be hit with a court injunction prohibiting a strike but just as clearly out of it when mine safety is the issue.

A word must be said about the hot dispute between

Lewis and Taft over the effects of the Taft-Hartley law on the authority claimed by miners' safety committees to shut down unsafe mines. Taft argued that a mere suit for damages under Taft-Hartley did not mean that the union would lose. As he expressed it, drawing on his memory of catch phrases from law school, "You can sue the Bishop of Boston for bastardy but you can't collect." The facts in the case of the Blackwood Fuel Company of Virginia appear to sustain Lewis. The miners' safety committee protested conditions in the Blackwood mine, and one of the members of the committee was fired when he refused to work. The rest of the men quit in retaliation, but a federal Taft-Hartley injunction drove them back to the pits. Whether or not the company wins its lawsuit against the union, the safety committee was unable to shut down the mine.

Sponsors of the Neely-Price bill feel confident that the measure will be approved by the Senate Labor Committee. Its fate may depend on Representative Graham Barden of North Carolina, chairman of the House committee. It may also depend on whether the operators profit from a strategy of delay, hoping that memory of West Frankfort will fade, or another unsafe mine blows up soon—and blows the bill through Congress.

P. S. While the Senators debated, six more miners were killed in an explosion in the Carpentertown mine No. 2 in Greensburg, Pennsylvania. Last year federal mine inspectors had reported to the owners that the pit was "gassy" and directed their attention to serious hazards. Will this new tragedy move Congress to act?

Force and Violence in Illinois

BY LEN SCHROETER

CAIRO, ILLINOIS, one of the last communities in the Northern states in which segregated schools still exist, was scheduled to capitulate to democratic principles on January 28, when seventy Negro children in a town of 12,000 people were to be admitted into the previously all-white public schools. That night shotgun blasts rocked the home of Dr. James C. Wallace, a leader of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the first Negro candidate for the Cairo school board, and the recognized leader of the local campaign to obtain integrated schools. Unlike his Florida counterpart, Harry T. Moore, Dr. Wallace was not killed.

The next night a bomb exploded in the home of Dr. Urbane F. Bass, another prominent local Negro, wrecking one of the bedrooms. On both these nights fiery crosses burned in the Negro section of town. No Negro child has yet been enrolled in the white schools of this southernmost Illinois community, which is now in the grip of an organized reign of terror.

Illinois law provides that no pupil shall be excluded or segregated in any public school on account of race or color, and the recently passed Jenkins Amendment denies state-aid funds to any school district that violates this law. Cairo, however, situated at the junction of the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers, almost one hundred miles south of St. Louis, is as Southern as Paducah, Kentucky, in its social and economic structure. The capital of Illinois, at Springfield, seems far away.

As in most Southern communities, segregation has meant that Negro students are denied decent educational opportunities. The Negroes and whites have three grammar schools each, one junior high school, and one high school. A special committee of the Illinois House of Representatives investigating Cairo's school system last spring reported that a comparison of the two school systems makes it "evident that the pattern of segregation prevents equality of equipment, teaching facilities, and educational opportunities for colored children."

The campaign to force Cairo to conform to state law met vigorous opposition. The District Superintendent of Schools, Leo S. Schultz, a bitter foe of integration, was supported by the school board, which is composed of the town's leading business men, including the presidents of the two banks. Resistance to the change was also encountered from some elements in the Negro community who had accommodated their lives and careers to segregation. Foremost in the fight against integration were the principals of the Negro schools, who used every means at their disposal to prevent children from seeking a transfer to the white schools.

A CONCERTED effort to get Negro children and parents to apply for transfers began immediately after the burning of a fiery cross in the nearby town of Brookport, Illinois. This demonstration was directed at Negro workers in Brookport who were working in the atomic-energy plant at Paducah, Kentucky. Despite vicious opposition N. A. A. C. P. field secretaries June Shagaloff and Lester Bailey organized neighborhood meetings, arranged for radio broadcasts, and distributed handbills to tell parents they should ask for transfers. The response of most of the Negro community was enthusiastic. Negro spokesmen urged cooperation and obedience to state law on school officials.

On January 17 the first group of students and parents presented applications for transfer. By the following afternoon seventy applications, complying with every technicality, had been filed. It was announced that the applications could be processed in twenty-four hours and that the children would be admitted at the beginning of the new semester, January 28.

On January 21 the N. A. A. C. P. leaders met with the City Council, the sheriff, and the chief of police, and asked for help in preparing the community for the transfers. Local officials refused to make a public statement that Negro children had a legal right to be admitted to the schools. Nor would they take any action to ease the transition, though they conceded that the law compelled integration.

Rumors of violence began to seep through the town. David Lansden, a white lawyer who had been consulted by the Negro group, had the windows of his house broken. The N. A. A. C. P. leaders sent word of the expected transfers to the state law-enforcement agents, who in turn notified the local United States Attorney and the local FBI agents. No one seemed interested. On January 23 the first crosses were burned in Cairo.

Prominent white citizens met secretly to devise measures to maintain segregation. Attorney General J. Howard McGrath was informed that tension was high and violence might be feared. The national office of the N. A. A. C. P. was also warned.

On January 25 Roy Wilkins, N. A. A. C. P. administrator, sent an urgent telegram to Governor Adlai E. Stevenson of Illinois: "We fear some form of outbreak and wish steps to be taken to guarantee safety of children and parents when they present themselves at schools Monday morning. Feel certain you would not wish any racial disturbance in Illinois, and therefore we request state to take all necessary steps in situation." The Governor did not reply, but he sent Russell Babcock, director of the Illinois Commission on Human Rights, to Cairo to look over the situation. Babcock reported that there was nothing to worry about.

When the children went to the white schools on Monday morning, they were told their transfers had not been processed, although the city had had ten days to do what was necessary to comply with the law. On Tuesday they were turned away again. The next day there had been so much violence and the crowds were so threatening that no child ventured to appear.

None of the persons responsible for the intimidation and violence has as yet been arrested. Affidavits have been presented to Lucy T. McPherson, County Superintendent of Schools, stating that the unreasonable delay in processing transfers was an act of discrimination, and she has said that state-aid funds will be discontinued. This same technique was used last spring but was abandoned when the authorities said that Negro children were free to seek transfers and that they did not have a policy of discrimination.

Once again it appears that white supremacists, by force and violence, can disregard the law with impunity. But unlike recent outbreaks in Florida, these tactics were used after local, state, and national authorities had been warned to take precautions against them. Little can be expected of bigoted officials who refuse to prevent law-breaking they know is being planned. The federal government has displayed an utter disregard for the rights of Negroes in case after case of violations presented to the Department of Justice and the FBI. But more energetic action might have been looked for from the liberal Governor Adlai Stevenson.

The Cairo disorders point up what the killing of Harry Moore and the wave of bombings in Florida, Texas, Georgia, Alabama, and North and South Carolina make clear. In Walter White's words, "The bomb has replaced the lyncher's rope." We have entered a new phase in the struggle for Negro rights. Until now the emphasis has been on passing laws that destroy the legal basis for Jim Crow. Those victories have been won. Now they must be translated into social reality. No one recognizes this new phase more clearly than the people who are the beneficiaries of white supremacy. Seeing that they can no longer preserve their social and economic power legally, they resort to extra-legal acts. Their weapons are the bomb and the fiery cross. Their spokesmen are not a lunatic fringe but the Governors and Senators of Southern states and the sheriffs, mayors, and police chiefs of Jim Crow communities. They condone, encourage, and plan violence as an instrument of policy.

Tunisian Tinder Box

London, January 30

YOU must see Bourguiba in action to understand Tunisian nationalism," said the Arab who had led me through the narrow streets of the Arab quarter of Tunis to show me the brass plaque, "Habib Bourguiba—Avocat," on the door of the nationalist leader's office. That was in the summer of 1950, and the place had already become something of a shrine.

Not long afterward I met Bourguiba in Paris, where he was hospitalized, and after talking with him I was moved to write: "In a hospital bed I have found the match that may soon set off the North African tinder box." His force of character was instantly apparent, and his lean, mobile face was alive with intelligence, its expression changing rapidly with his thoughts.

In arresting him on January 18 the French struck this Tunisian "match" against the flinty surface of their colonial obduracy. The flame of revolt flared up quickly. Crowds demonstrated, police posts were dynamited. Towns were seized, trains derailed, French soldiers shot. The so-called "soft" people of Tunisia showed that their nationalism was as militant as that of any advanced area in the colonial world. The French described their action as a "calculated risk." They thought that if they arrested Bourguiba and other leaders of the Neo-Destour (New Constitutional) Party, some "moderates" might come to the surface. It was the sort of "calculated risk" one might take in searching for a lost coin in a powder magazine with a blazing torch.

Bourguiba is certainly the last man with whom the French should want to collide violently. Massive demonstrations have made it clear that he and his party command the loyalty of all politically conscious Tunisians except a thin Communist fringe and an even thinner rightist fringe organized in the feudal Vieux Destour (Old Constitutional) Party.

Their allies are those who, in dread of being smeared or in hope of political advancement, play along with fascist terrorists.

The response of all minorities and of all Americans who cherish freedom must be to recognize the enemy and to fight him as vigorously in Illinois as in Florida, through mass organization and political action designed to elect public officials who take the Fourteenth Amendment seriously.

BY ANDREW ROTH

Bourguiba's record is amazingly clean. The French cannot hurl at him the charges of corruption which stick so firmly to many Middle Eastern leaders. Born in Monastir forty-nine years ago, he has never known comfort. He lived the life of a poor Tunisian student in Paris while getting his law degree, and it was then that he met and married his French wife. Nor can he be accused of having collaborated with the Nazis or Fascists, although the Germans released him from a French prison in Marseilles in 1942 and the Italians also tried hard to win him over.

But what annoys the French most of all is that they cannot call him a Communist. He has purged his party of every person—even a long-time friend—who has shown any tendency to flirt with Moscow or Communist-led movements; in 1950 he took the trade unions adhering to his party out of the Communist-led federation. At the same time he has the dynamism, organizational ability, and sensitivity to economic and social problems necessary to compete with the Communists. The peasant and labor organizations led by the Neo-Destour Party have far outstripped those of the Communists. And his network of party cells and fronts gives him the tactical advantages elsewhere enjoyed only by Communists.

In March, 1945, Bourguiba succeeded in breaking out of the isolation imposed on most colonial nationalists. He left Tunisia secretly and after an arduous trip by boat, camel, and on foot finally reached Egypt. In Cairo he established close links with leading Arab nationalists throughout the Middle East, although he does not share the fanaticism that inspires many of them. The London Times said of him the other day, after his arrest: "British officials might well have felt envious of their French colleagues, who had so reasonable a party to deal with."

In 1950-51 he made an extended tour which gave him a chance to put his case before Pandit Nehru, Liaquat Ali Khan, and Sukarno, as well as before high London and Washington officials. He showed his political cunning by having his visit to the United States sponsored by Irving Brown, the violently anti-Communist international representative of the American Federation of Labor. While there Bourguiba broadcast in Arabic over the "Voice of America." In London he stayed away from left-wingers, whose support he could take for granted—and was invited to broadcast over the BBC. L'Aurore of Paris commented acidly: "Do the British hope to get out of their own present difficulties in the Arab world by egging on the Arab League against the French?"

Asked by the diplomatic correspondent of the London News Chronicle what he would do if the French continued to stall in instituting reforms, Bourguiba answered, "If the French resist our demands we will organize strikes and demonstrations." And if these are suppressed? "We will fight." He also made it clear that he expected American pressure to prevent the French from precipitating an armed clash. If the French and Tunisians fought, he pointed out, "Tunisia would go through a dangerous period which would not be a matter of indifference to powers interested in the stability of the Mediterranean world." He said he would tell the Americans: "You want military bases in Tunisia? Very well. It is only from us, the Tunisians, that you can get them. Moreover, if our movement fails, the Tunisian people, in despair, will turn to the Communists, and a vital strategic area will be lost to the West."

FOR Bourguiba the use of force is a last resort because his small country of 3,500,000 people can hardly hope to defeat the troops the French can send from other parts of North Africa and France itself. Before allowing his country to be ravaged like Indo-China, he wants to be sure he cannot succeed by direct negotiation or by appealing to world opinion through the United Nations. It was for this reason that he displayed such patience in Paris in the summer of 1950 when the French government acted as if, like its Bourbon ancestors, it had forgotten nothing and learned nothing. The Quai d'Orsay spokesman who said that Bourguiba represented nobody but himself evoked a ghostly procession of die-hard colonials, including the British leader who had dismissed Gandhi as a "naked little fakir."

When Foreign Minister Robert Schuman conceded, "We cannot maintain the system of direct French rule forever," and promised that "internal autonomy," though not independence, would be established eventually by gradual political reforms, Bourguiba decided "it would be criminal not to grasp the hand stretched out toward us." But it proved to be a slippery hand. Bourguiba permitted the secretary of Neo-Destour to join the Cabinet on the assumption that it would have increased powers. The French did allow the Resident General to be replaced as head of the Cabinet by a Tunisian Prime Minister, but the counter-signature of the Resident

General was still required. In consequence almost 200 ministerial decisions were frozen in 1951. The promised proportion of Tunisian appointments was not made. Promised local self-government was blocked by the French insistence that the Tunisians give representation even in municipal governments to French settlers in Tunisia.

The 150,000 French who demand permanent political rights commensurate with their present control of the Tunisian economy and government consider Bourguiba their greatest menace. Any political reform which deprives them of an absolute veto over the future of 3,500,000 Tunisians is denounced as the "abdication" of the "French presence" in a country whose sovereignty France is supposed to be only "protecting." These colonials maintain a strong lobby in Paris, which is particularly influential in the Radical Party.

After almost a year of frustration, the Tunisian Prime Minister went to Paris last October to ask for an all-Tunisian Cabinet—now seven of fifteen ministers are Tunisians—a purely Tunisian Assembly elected by universal suffrage instead of a consultative Grand Council including an equal French section, and the more rapid introduction of Tunisians into the civil service. He was turned down through the influence of the pro-colonialist Radicals in the French Cabinet. On December 15 Foreign Minister Schuman went back on his previous slightly encouraging words and said it was "impossible to exclude" French residents in Tunisia "from participation in the political institutions of the country." Simultaneously the French Cabinet recalled the Resident General, M. Perillier, who had gone to Tunis from Algeria with a reputation for conservatism but had become convinced that reforms were overdue in Tunisia.

When Bourguiba left Paris for Tunis a fortnight later he made it clear that the Tunisians could never allow the French settlers a privileged position. "There is not a country in whose political institutions a foreigner participates if he has not integrated himself into the country by accepting its nationality. . . . Only the friendly mediation of the United Nations could bring these negotiations out of their impasse by permitting a renewal of conversations on reasonable grounds and with serious chances of success." He did not pretend France would accept this. Once home he informed the Paris

Monde: "We will resume our 1946 position: (1) we will proclaim the sovereignty and independence of Tunisia; (2) we will demand negotiation of a new treaty which will fix the date of the transfer of sovereignty, accord the foreign communities the guaranties they ask, and give France the military, diplomatic and cultural rights that it considers essential. We return to this route, that of immediate independence, only because the other, that of progressive reforms, has been blocked."

RELEASED TIME

The Parent's Right to Choose

BY EDWARD S. GREENBAUM

PLEASE excuse Johnny on Wednesday afternoons to take his music lesson." Public schools grant such requests. Parents may also have their children excused to take dancing lessons or to observe Yom Kippur or Good Friday. The New York State education law authorizes such absences, recognizing the parent's right to have a say in his child's education. No one has challenged the right of the state to comply with such requests. But if the parent requests that his child be excused from school to receive religious instruction, there are violent protests from many quarters.

The same law which permits absence for religious observances and music and dancing lessons permits absence to receive religious instruction. This part of the law, it is claimed, violates the doctrine of separation between church and state, and the issue is now before the Supreme Court of the United States. A bitter fight is being waged against it. It is said that the state has no right to comply with a parent's request that his child be excused from school even one hour a week to receive religious instruction. The parents of the 200,000 Catholic, Jewish, and Protestant children who make these requests are told: "You may not have your children receive religious instruction during school hours. We have the constitutional right to stop you." This strange position is taken by liberal organizations which usually seek to uphold the rights of the individual.

Excusing children from school for religious instruction is nothing new. The plan is called "released time" and it has been in operation since 1914. Almost every state has some released-time plan. About 2,000,000 children in the country participate in it. Here in New York we have had the program for many years. The atheists attacked its constitutionality over twenty-five years ago, but it was unanimously sustained by our highest state court, the Court of Appeals. Benjamin N. Cardozo was then chief judge of that distinguished court, which included Judges Irving Lehman and Cuthbert Pound. Judge Pound wrote the opinion for the court. After referring to the fact that a child could "take outside instruction in music or dancing without violating the provisions of the compulsory-education law, either in letter or in spirit," he held that absence for religious instruction was likewise permissible. He said: "It is impossible to say, as a matter of law, that the slightest infringement of constitutional right or abuse of statutory requirement has been shown in this case."

The released-time program continued. In 1940 the Legislature passed a statute authorizing the Commissioner of Education to establish uniform rules for the operation of the program. Governor Herbert H. Lehman approved the law. In so doing he said: "A few people have given voice to fears that the bill violates the principles of our government. These fears, in my opinion, are groundless. The bill does not introduce anything new into our public-school system, nor does it violate the principles of our public educational system."

Experience has shown that Governor Lehman was correct. The fears of the opponents of the law have proved groundless. This is borne out by an objective survey made by the Public Education Association, which has constantly objected to the released-time program. There was no evidence, the report said, that the program made for group disrespect. Only 26 of the 327 principals and teachers interviewed opposed the plan. Some believed that released time made for inter-group respect. One said: "When the Jewish children participated there was a pleasant feeling about everyone going. Now the situation is neutral." All seemed to agree that the program "is still conducted amid considerable controversy." The Public Education Association accordingly recommended that if the fight against released time were continued, the community groups who oppose it should "take some pressure off the school system in order that teachers and administrators can creatively work out the best possible program." It pointed out that the continued opposition had a "deadening" effect and might defeat whatever value the program had.

In some places the released-time program has been abused. This was the case in Champaign, Illinois. There, without the authorization of any state law, religious instruction was given in public-school classrooms during school hours. The religious teachers were engaged with the approval of the Superintendent of Schools. Enrolment cards were distributed by the regular teachers and in some cases paid for by the school. The class teacher usually remained at her desk while the religious instruction was given. The United States Supreme Court, in March, 1948, in the case of McCullum v. Board of Education, held that this program violated the provisions of the Constitution. Although the Champaign released-time program obviously differed radically from that in New York, the Supreme Court decision in the McCullum case provided fuel for another attack on the New York plan. The American Civil Liberties Union and other groups supported it. The lower courts sustained the law. They pointed out the obvious differences between the New York and the Champaign program. In July, 1951, the case reached the Court of Appeals, where its constitutionality was again upheld in a six-to-one decision. In its opinion the court enumerated the factors in the Champaign case and said that none of them were present in New York, where the instruction must be outside the school building and there is neither supervision nor approval of religious teachers by the school system.

THE court analyzed carefully the arguments that the law breached the wall between church and state and violated the First Amendment. This amendment forbids the making of laws "respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." The court said: "Neither of these prohibitions, in language or meaning, has anything whatever to do with this released-time system." It declared that the argument against the law "construes the First Amendment by ignoring its language, its history, and its obvious meaning," and that released-time programs clearly do not establish a religion or prohibit "the free exercise thereof."

On the contrary, they encourage such free exercise. Forbidding released time would prevent parents from fully exercising their rights to give their children religious instruction in the faith of their choosing. The court referred to the absolute right of parents to direct the rearing and education of their children, and quoted from a recent decision of the United States Supreme Court which said: "It is cardinal with us that the custody, care, and nurture of the child resides first in the parent, whose primary function and freedom include preparation for obligations the state can neither supply nor hinder." These rights of the parent were referred to as "true and absolute rights under natural law, antedating, and superior to, any human constitution or statute."

The court noted that the Constitution does not demand that no friendly gesture between church and state should be countenanced. It accordingly upheld the lower courts and dismissed the petition to hold the law unconstitutional. But the fight continued, and the issue is now before the United States Supreme Court.

LEGAL questions are not the only ones involved in this fight against released time. There are others as important. That we may not like the released-time program is beside the point. While we may think it preferable for our children to receive their religious instruction after school hours or on Saturday or Sunday, others may feel differently. The state Legislature has said that such absences at the parents' request may be allowed. The Court of Appeals referred to the objections in these words: "What petitioners are saying is that they dislike the whole enterprise and consider it socially undesirable. These are predilections, not questions of law."

The released-time program is the law of New York. Its constitutionality has been uniformly and finally upheld by all the courts of this state. Those of us who do not want to avail ourselves of its provisions need not do so. In New York City the parents of about 120,000 children do want it. Their children—about one-fourth of those attending public school—participate in the program. Most of them are Catholic, but many are Jewish and Protestant. It is difficult for them and their parents to understand why those who oppose released time and want no part of it have any "right" to prevent others from using it as provided by the law of the state.

That we should fight any real inroads on the vital doctrine of separation of church and state is elementary. But we should not blindly follow slogans and patterns. We should not line ourselves up on one side of a question just because other liberals, or so-called liberals, are taking that position. We should determine for ourselves whether the popular side is the right side.

Are the dangers in the New York program real or imagined? Experience of many years has failed to show their reality. Nor have we any basis for believing that this program, if properly administered, will ever constitute a threat to the doctrine of separation of church and state. But we do know that those who believe in the program deeply resent the action of those who seek to deprive them of the right the state has given them to bring up their children in the way they think proper. Bitterness and group hostility are the inevitable result.

The released-time program is not perfect. Its most ardent supporters do not claim that it is. However, they are making an earnest effort to correct its imperfections, including those which might threaten the proper boundaries between church and state. The Greater New York

Coordinating Committee on Released Time of Jews, Protestants, and Roman Catholics is devoting itself to this task. It believes that the released-time program, if properly administered, can bring valuable religious and moral instruction to many children. It seeks the cooperation of members of all religious faiths to make the plan a vital force for better group relations and increased inter-group respect.

RELEASED TIME

A Crutch for Churches

THERE is a significant difference between the occasional excusing of children from school for a music lesson, a dancing lesson, a family festival, or even the observance of a religious holiday and releasing them each week for religious instruction. Religious instruction on released time requires the public school to organize its program so that children whose parents request it may drop their regular work periodically to attend religious classes without missing any vital instruction. No matter how few those who go may be, the children who remain, and the teaching staff, are expected to suspend all significant operations while their fellows attend the church school.

What to do with the children who do not enrol in the released-time program is a problem. No advanced work may be undertaken, since this would disadvantage the released timers. Nor can the substitute activity be too interesting or valuable from the child's point of view, since this would constitute "unfair competition" with the religious instruction and be interpreted as an unfriendly act. The principals of schools in Chicago, where less than 10 per cent of the pupils were on released-time programs, received orders that "nothing significant shall be taught the children not taking religious instruction so that those taking it shall not be penalized for their absence." Indeed, the educational price paid has sometimes been so high that it has led to the program's abandonment. In Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, for example, the Board of Education observed that "in order to meet this problem, there must be a curtailment of activities in the school which often are the actual character-building agencies of the school itself."

V. T. THAYER was formerly director of the Ethical Culture schools in New York City and is at present visiting professor at the University of Virginia. He is author of "Religion in Public Education," "The Attack upon the American Secular School," and other educational works.

That the fight against released time has been carried to the United States Supreme Court is not surprising. But it is surprising and disturbing to find it made by those who usually fight for civil liberties and against intolerance. A "victory" for them—if they win—may well prove a major defeat. And it may be a crushing setback for those who seek to improve inter-group relations and protect the rights of the individual.

BY V. T. THAYER

These facts render more than pertinent the grounds upon which the United States Supreme Court, in the famous McCullum case, based its decision that the released-time program in force in Champaign, Illinois, violated the principle of separation of church and state. The core of this decision would seem to be as applicable to programs off the school grounds as to those inside the building. Said the court:

The operation of the state's compulsory educational system thus assists and is integrated with the program of religious instruction carried on by separate religious sects. Pupils compelled by law to go to school for secular education are released in part from their legal duty upon the condition that they attend the religious classes. This is beyond all question a utilization of the tax-established and tax-supported public-school system to aid religious groups to spread their faith. And it falls squarely under the ban of the First Amendment (made applicable to the states by the Fourteenth).

In sustaining the released-time program as conducted in New York City, the New York Court of Appeals by-passed the words of the Supreme Court just quoted. Not so, however, the Circuit Court of Missouri, when the Board of Education in St. Louis decided to ignore the opinion of the State Superintendent of Public Instruction and to continue to hold classes on released time but off the school grounds and, as in New York City, without enforcement of attendance by the public schools. The court enjoined this practice, stating in part:

The differences [between the St. Louis case and the McCullum case] are inconsequential. The controlling fact in both cases is that the public schools are used to aid sectarian groups to disseminate their doctrines. Whether these sectarian classes are conducted in school buildings or elsewhere can make no difference, since attendance upon them during compulsory school hours is deemed attendance at school. Failure to exercise supervision over the instruction of religion and to require the keeping of proper attendance records does not make the program legal; it merely indicates laxity on the part of school authorities. The fact that any sect may participate in this program is immaterial; the public school cannot be used to aid one religion or to aid all religions.

Whether the opinion of the New York Court of Appeals or that of the Circuit Court of Missouri is to stand is a question which the United States Supreme Court will doubtless soon decide, since the New York decision is now before it on appeal.

THAT a religious minority demands released time for religious instruction has confused those liberals who identify the wishes of a minority with the rights of an individual. This is, of course, both an absurd and a dangerous view, which leads directly along the road to dictatorship. We should remind ourselves that the strict confinement of the public schools to secular instruction is the direct application to education of the principle of separation of church and state which Americans have recognized as indispensable to religious freedom. This principle was established on the national level through the First Amendment and on the state level through state constitutional provisions and legislative acts after painful experience with a contrary policy. The American people had experimented both with a state church and with a policy of "cooperation" between government and religion on a "non-discriminatory" basis. The latter, they had learned, is as impossible to realize as the first is unjust. Consequently, they concluded, in Madison's words, that religion should be made "wholly exempt" from the "cognizance" of "Civil Society." It was not that they loved religion less but that they saw in separation the sole condition of freedom for the religious conscience.

This policy, the Supreme Court decided in McCullum v. Board of Education, now binds both the federal and the state governments. But long before the First Amendment was made applicable to the states through the Fourteenth, the basis of its restrictions in matters of religion and education was found, as Justice Frankfurter states, in "the whole experience of our people. Zealous watchfulness against the fusion of secular and religious activities by government itself, through any of its instruments but especially through its educational agencies, was the democratic response of the American community to the particular needs of a young and growing nation, unique in the composition of its people." Those who oppose religious instruction on released time recognize, to continue with Justice Frankfurter, "the need of a democratic society to educate its children . . . in an atmosphere free from pressures in a realm in which pressures are most resisted and where conflicts are most bitterly engendered."

But let us return to "the rights of the individual." Some liberals seem to assume that a parent's right to rear and educate his child is annulled unless the public school cooperates in a religious-education program. Surely this is too strained a point. There is no lack of opportunity for religious education under family and church auspices outside school hours. Indeed, as was pointed out in the Champaign case, if it were merely a matter of finding an hour for religious education, time could be set aside on Saturday or Sunday, or the school day might be shortened "to allow all children to go where they please, leaving those who so desire to go to a religious school." But this does not satisfy the religious authorities. Why? Because then it would not be possible to use the authority or the influence of the school to bring about attendance at the church school.

Moreover, we should distinguish between the parent's right to use the school for his own ends and the right of the child. Each child, irrespective of his background, is entitled to an education in the public school free from the divisiveness which an emphasis upon religious differences inevitably causes. Objective studies of released-time programs have confirmed again and again their unfortunate effects upon children. Only in the religiously homogeneous community do they operate without accentuating feelings and attitudes altogether different from those their exponents profess to value. As the Board of Education in Harrisburg pointed out when it abandoned its program, "The public school generally has been our most democratic institution, and any program which emphasizes the differences of the pupils is harmful. News items from cities where there has been 'released time' for religious education indicate that there is now more intolerance, discrimination, and disunity than previously existed in the public schools of those communities."

Experience with the released-time program in New York City is no exception to this rule. Three separate studies conducted by the Public Education Association since the inception of the program in 1941 have supplied the data upon which the association has based its consistent opposition. These studies reveal an increase in truancy in the cooperating schools while the program is in progress. They cite numerous instances in which teachers, despite instructions to the contrary, have exercised pressure upon the children to enrol in religious classes. They show the waste of teachers' and pupils' time during the absence of the released timers. And while, according to the most recent report, little evidence was found that "the released-time program, as it operates here, makes for disrespect" of religious differences, it is significant that this conclusion could be stated only negatively.

A final objection to religious instruction on released time follows from the fact that it encourages the school and the church alike to neglect its unique function in character education. Both institutions are charged with this task, but their opportunities and their contributions are not identical. It is the responsibility of the school to educate for common values—honesty and fair play, truthfulness and temperance, self-control and responsibility, respect for personality, and the like. To be sure, religious instruction can and often does promote these virtues, but there is reason to believe that they are strengthened rather than weakened when they are envisaged as independent of sectarian doctrine and theological dogma. Insistence on religious instruction—either inside the school or outside but in cooperation with the school—as an indispensable condition of moral education both detracts from the significance of the school's unique function in the area of common values and encourages teachers and administrative officers to shift their responsibility to the church.

On the other hand, the churches weaken their educational programs when they resort to the schools as to a crutch. Were the churches now providing vigorous and vital religious education they would not need to call upon the schools to act as recruiting agents. And as long as they continue to lean upon the schools they will be encouraged to postpone the day of reform. Released-time programs merely perpetuate a type of religious education that requires new blood in the interest of religion.

The comment of Dr. John Haynes Holmes seems to sum up this final point:

Here is the church rushing to the state for aid and comfort in supporting educational activities which, for one reason or another, it cannot support itself. And here is the state taking over a highly religious function of the church in giving away a precious period of time, to be used in the church's interest.

What the churches need is to be intelligent, free, militant, and united in the ethical and social aspects of their faith. When the churches meet this test, they will have no need of "released time."

Political Prospects in Korea

PLAN FOR A SETTLEMENT

BY YONGJEUNG KIM

IF AN armistice finally descends on the ruins of Korea, the world will be entitled to see it as the essential preliminary to a peaceful solution of the main problem, but unless immediate steps are then taken to settle the urgent question of Korean unification and independence, a bigger explosion can be expected.

Should Korea be restored to its unhappy pre-war political status, its future would appear bleaker than ever before. Its social and economic structure has been utterly demolished, and its people are dying of hunger, cold, and disease. "Peace" under such circumstances is a mockery. A Korea left divided as well as ruined will have gone through untold agony to no avail, and the United Nations will have fought for nothing.

Since the U. N. was created "to maintain international peace and security," it has a responsibility to provide an opportunity for the Korean people to determine their national future. If it allows the great powers to keep their underlings in the saddle, it will not only leave the festered problem unsolved and thus invite another disaster but forfeit world confidence in its usefulness.

"We dislike both Syngman Rhee and Kim Il-sung, but whom else can we support?" has been a standing question in the West. It sounds logical enough, but actually it shows little regard for the Koreans' own interests. Why should not the Korean people as a whole be helped this time instead of a particular individual or group?

It is unrealistic to look for a "good man" in the present circumstances. How could such a man rise to prominence under either of the present regimes? How long could he stand on his feet? Many a good man already has been liquidated, north and south of the Thirty-eighth Parallel. Anyone against Rhee is a "red," anyone against Kim a "reactionary." After bitter experience the Korean people, except a few who have personal axes to grind, would reject any foreign-sponsored leader if they were permitted to express their free will.

In accordance with the South Korean constitution, the National Assembly elected Rhee President. His term expires next summer. Who will be his successor is obviously a "hot" political question. Strong opposition to Rhee has been developing in the National Assembly, and his reelection will probably not be possible unless force is used. ("Force" means just that: it is possible, although unconstitutional, to imprison opposition legislators; this was done in March, 1950, with thirteen National Assemblymen.)

Aware of the difficulties ahead, Rhee's government

YONGJEUNG KIM is founder and president of the Korean Affairs Institute, a non-profit and non-partisan organization devoted to the dissemination and analysis of factual information about Korea and the promotion of friendly understanding between the Korean and American peoples. He has been connected with no political organization within or outside Korea since 1943.

recently proposed two constitutional amendments: election of the President by popular vote, and creation of an upper house for the legislature. Its motives were not obscure. Rhee would have an excellent chance of reelection in a "popular" vote under the eye of the police, the armed forces, and the terroristic Tae Han Youth Corps. Legislative opposition could be blocked by a division of the Assembly into two chambers. The proposal for popular election of the President had considerable propaganda appeal, particularly to American ears, but the National Assembly understood the real purpose of both amendments and defeated them on January 18 by a vote of 143 to 19.

IN THE interest of world peace and the survival of the Korean people, the U. N. should make every effort to obtain a final settlement of the Korean problem. We have negotiated a cease-fire—however uneasy—with the Communist military leaders. Next we can try to negotiate with the Communist diplomats for Korean unification and independence.

It may be futile to negotiate with the Communists except on a basis of strength. Nevertheless, we must not let the hope of peace die for lack of effort. While it would be unrealistic to expect either Korean regime to offer an equitable basis for unity, a solution could undoubtedly be found that would meet with the approval of the suppressed Korean people. It probably would be along the following lines:

1. Creation of a Peace Committee, on which Near Eastern, Asian, and/or other neutrals would be represented to expedite the unification of Korea and the restoration of its independence. This body should be empowered to act as an interim national authority until a central Korean government could be established through national elections. Its membership should be approved by the belligerents but not include their representatives. It might be composed of outstanding individuals nominated by Sweden, Mexico, Indonesia, Brazil, Egypt, India, Syria, Burma, and Israel but not politically accountable to their respective governments.

2. Organization of an advisory body to assist the Peace Committee, composed of one Korean from each province. These should be men of good reputation who at no time served under either of the present regimes and were not Japanese collaborators.

3. Dissolution of the two existing governments, neither of which enjoys popular confidence. Unless this is done, there will be no "free elections." If the leaders of both sides would resign voluntarily, they would render a great service to the Korean nation and to the world. They need not fear a general election if their claims of popular confidence are true.

4. Immediate establishment of local governments, chosen by local popular elections supervised by the Peace Committee, to take over civil and police functions from the present regimes.

5. Withdrawal of all foreign forces and simultaneous demobilization of all Korean troops, under the supervision of the Peace Committee, to create a peaceful atmosphere before the general election.

6. Establishment of a national government after the general election has been held.

7. Neutralization of Korea through a guaranty by the United Nations and China to respect Korean independence, sovereignty, and territorial integrity and to seek no special political or economic privileges.

8. An immediate start on the reconstruction and rehabilitation of Korea by all nations under U. N. leadership, with a schedule that envisions completion in three years as a symbol of human conscience and a fitting atmosphere before the general election.

Practically everything has to be rebuilt. The entire nation is destitute. In order to assuage and win over the troubled minds of not only the Koreans but other Asians, the Korean misery should be rooted out with a fighting zeal. Donald Kingsley, general director of the U. N. Korean Reconstruction Agency, has stated that a conservative estimate of reconstruction costs in South Korea would be $2,000,000,000 and that some estimates run as high as $8,000,000,000. He conceded that the U. N.'s proposed appropriation of $250,000,000 for the purpose in the first year is only a "drop in the bucket."

While the non-Communist world has accepted some responsibility for reconstructing Korea, the Communists remain silent on this matter. They must, however, share the obligation. On this point there should be no equivocation. Moreover, neither the non-Communist world nor the Soviet bloc should look upon its contribution to the rehabilitation of Korea as charity. It is clearly a duty.

It is unthinkable that the statesmen of the sixty United Nations cannot settle the Korean problem. But if they employ outmoded, face-saving techniques, are dominated by self-interest, and ignore basic principles which our common sense tells us are correct, we shall be surrendering our destiny to the knowing or unwitting architects of world anarchy. Not until Korea has been given an opportunity to reunite and become independent, will peace be attained and collective security realized.

"The Land Is Not Dry Yet."

MAKE PEACE WITH CHINA!

BY W. MAC MAHON BALL

PEACE with Communist China is the prerequisite to a political settlement in Korea. But peace with China is indivisible. The United Nations cannot be at peace with China about Korea if the United States is not at peace with China about Formosa.

On paper there are two possible ways of achieving this peace. The United Nations may make China feel that it faces military destruction if it refuses to accept the U. N. terms for Korea. It may hope that Communist China will be afraid to go on with a long war of attrition in Korea, afraid that increased American military aid to Chiang Kai-shek will encourage him to attack the mainland, afraid that U. N. planes will bomb bases in Manchuria; and these fears, it may hope, will help Communist China to find wisdom.

Such a policy can succeed only if the Peking government (a) knows the U. N. terms for a settlement in Korea—no one else seems to know; (b) believes that a settlement in Korea will end the threat of American support for Chiang's plans of conquest—it would hardly make sense for China to accept a U. N. decision on Korea if the actual result were merely to enable the United States to divert military help from Syngman Rhee to Chiang Kai-shek; (c) feels that the risks of thwarting the wishes of the Soviet Union are less than the risks of thwarting the wishes of the United Nations.

It seems to me unrealistic to think that in these circumstances Communist China will succumb to the fears we are trying to instil in it. I can see no chance of a peaceful settlement in Korea until the Peking government becomes convinced that the United States and the United Nations have firmly renounced all intentions to aid or abet any military effort to undermine its authority. For Peking the first priority is to survive. Before long Russia's national ambitions may well clash with China's, but this can hardly occur while Peking feels that its existence is threatened by the military power of the West.

It is idle to pretend it possible to get a satisfactory settlement in Korea that is not part of a wider settlement in the Far East. A settlement might be sought along the following lines: (1) the cessation of all military help to the Chinese Nationalists and any other group planning military attack on Communist China; (2) an armistice leaving the United Nations in temporary control of South Korea; (3) an arrangement by which after, say, a six months' cooling-off period, elections might be held under the supervision of neutral observers for a parliament for the whole of Korea; (4) the subsequent prompt withdrawal of all foreign military forces.

W. MAC MAHON BALL is professor at the University of Melbourne, and author of "Japan: Enemy or Ally?"

Even if such a procedure is possible, it will not guarantee "democracy" in Korea. Any Korean government is likely to feel it must use its police force to liquidate the opposition. A right government will dub its opponents "Communist conspirators and terrorists"; to a Communist government all opponents will be "national traitors and lackeys of foreign imperialism." But this is a problem that only the Koreans can solve.

SAFEGUARD DEMOCRACY!

BY OWEN LATTIMORE

WE ARE in real danger of a political débâcle in Korea. After a year and a half of war to defend South Korea against aggression, not a single popular South Korean military hero has emerged—not even a second-rater who merits a build-up in the newspapers. Nor is there any sign of a popular political hero who can be placed before the world as the worthy representative of a democratic cause.

We are now in a position to negotiate a military settlement based on a much stronger defensive position than the original wide-open line of division along the Thirty-eighth Parallel. But if, after such a settlement, the world finds that there is no vigorous, visibly democratic, genuinely Korean-led cause of democracy in South Korea—that only the same incompetent, tired old reactionaries crawl out of the ruins, asking America to put them back in business—then our future in Asia is black indeed.

Strong measures are needed to retrieve the situation. It should be recalled that our original intervention had the majority backing of free, non-Communist Asia because the issue was clear: a bold military aggression had marched across an internationally recognized line of demarcation. That clear issue, readily understood by the newly independent countries of Asia, sensitive about their own frontiers and their sovereign rights, was unfortunately blurred by General MacArthur's "home by Christmas" attempt to thrust all the way to the Yalu.

Only one kind of measure, I believe, has any chance at this late hour of restoring international confidence and at the same time providing for the creation of a healthy political atmosphere in South Korea. The United Nations, which should have been represented in the armistice negotiations internationally and not by the United States alone, must be fully represented at any conference determining the political future of South Korea. At the very least Canada and Australia should be included, because of their interest in the Pacific, and India and Pakistan because of their importance as non-Communist Asian countries.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Weizsäcker: Good German vs. Good European

BY H. STUART HUGHES

THE firm of Henry Regnery, in Chicago, which appears to specialize in books dedicated to the moral rehabilitation of Germany, has now brought out a translation of the memoirs of Baron von Weizsäcker, state secretary of the German Foreign Office from 1938 to 1943.* Ordinarily this position—which corresponded to that of a permanent under secretary drawn from the ranks of career diplomats—would have been one of enormous influence. It is Weizsäcker's contention that in his case this influence was almost nil, and that where it did exist it was exerted solely in the interests of preserving peace. In early 1949 an American Military Tribunal found otherwise, condemning Weizsäcker to seven years' imprisonment. The contrast of these two theses gives historical and psychological interest to what would otherwise be a mediocre book.

Both from a literary standpoint and from the standpoint of physical presentation, Weizsäcker's memoirs are disappointing. They are poorly organized, ill-balanced, episodic, and their style is graceless and frequently ambiguous. To what extent these latter difficulties stem from the original or the translation it is impossible to tell, since neither translator nor publisher has seen fit to add to the memoirs themselves even a paragraph of introduction or explanation. For a publication of historical source material, this omission is almost unprecedented. It is nearly universal practice to have some historian or other responsible specialist write an introduction setting the memoirs in their larger framework, alerting the reader to the special pleading in which even the most scrupulous statesman reminiscing on his past must occasionally indulge, and filling in the gaps and correcting the errors, calculated or accidental, in the original text. In the case of memoirs so full of booby traps as Weizsäcker's, this sort of intellectual orientation is particularly necessary. Yet we find no word explaining the circumstances under which the book was written, comparing it with the accounts of other participants in the internal opposition to Hitler—Hassell, Kordt, Schlabrendorff, and the like—or with the German Foreign Office documents now being published, or finally, and most important, analyzing the evidence presented at Weizsäcker's trial.

In the absence of such an introduction or of thorough independent research—which the present reviewer confesses he has not made—it is impossible to form an adequate estimate of Weizsäcker's book. In what follows I shall assume that Weizsäcker's account of his activities is substantially accurate and shall try to do no more than test the limitations and the internal coherence of what is essentially an argument for the defense.

Weizsäcker's major contention is that in 1938, hating Nazism and convinced that Hitler was about to plunge Europe into a war that would be catastrophic both for his own country and for Western civilization, he consented to serve under Ribbentrop as state secretary with the sole purpose of sabotaging his chief's aggressive designs. He knew that the task he had undertaken was desperately difficult and probably hopeless, and that he would get little credit or understanding for his efforts. He felt that he was making a sacrifice of his own personal reputation in the interests of peace—and that in so doing he was behaving both as a good German and as a good European.

In support of this contention Weizsäcker unfolds a record of high-principled duplicity unparalleled in the annals of diplomacy. Treading warily, ever alert to possible detection, he spun for five heartbreaking years a fragile network of intrigue, which he fondly hoped could hold back the German war machine. Unable to avow his purposes except to a few intimates, he dealt in delaying actions, veiled warnings, and calculated indiscretions to the ambassadors of potential enemies. To further his ideal ends, he stooped to an outward conformism that revolted his aristocratic soul: membership in the National Socialist Party, attendance at the social functions at which the Nazi leaders paraded their vulgarity, and even acceptance of a high honorary rank in the S. S. In early 1943, sick of a struggle that had lost any semblance of practical reality, he requested and obtained a transfer to the German embassy to the Vatican, where he spent the remainder of the war. He left Berlin having incurred nothing worse than Ribbentrop's hatred—but not, apparently, his complete distrust—and from Hitler a puzzled mixture of suspicion and grudging respect.

Despite its ambiguity, this record of tenacious foot-dragging would be most impressive—if Weizsäcker in the end had had anything to show for it. But it had all been, as he himself manfully confesses, "in vain, and even worse than in vain." As a political prognosticator Weizsäcker was nearly always wrong: in 1933 he considered the Nazi regime a transitory phenomenon; in 1934 he discounted the possibility of an understanding between Hitler and Mussolini; in 1938 he thought Britain and France would fight for Czechoslovakia; in 1939 he gravely overestimated the difficulty of negotiating the Nazi-Soviet pact; in 1940 he was "completely surprised" by the quick collapse of the French army. These errors were all common to informed people at the time. But in Weizsäcker's case their total effect was catastrophic. For they made him constantly underestimate the strength and staying power of the political forces with which he was engaged in secret combat.

Aside from a contribution to the Munich settlement—a dubious claim to the gratitude of posterity—Weizsäcker was unable to do anything tangible to preserve the peace or to limit the war. True enough, for certain of his failures the blindness of the Western Allies was heavily to blame. It is now well established that the British knew in September, 1938, that the military and Foreign Office opposition was prepared to put Hitler under arrest to prevent an invasion of Czechoslovakia, and that the Chamberlain government failed to act on this intelligence. And it is also now fairly generally conceded that the Casablanca formula of unconditional surrender was a gratuitous blunder and a heaven-sent gift to Hitler's propagandists. Certainly the British and American governments failed to take the German opposition as seriously as it deserved and in so doing left the German people no alternative but to fight on under Nazi leadership.

Yet when all this is granted, it is difficult to see—at least after 1940—how any other policy on the part of the Allies could particularly have aided what Weizsäcker was trying to do. For Weizsäcker drew a definite line beyond which he would not go in opposing his Nazi masters. He would not work for the defeat of his own country. He "could never have considered . . . the possibility of attacking the German soldiers from behind." Hence his failure, on June 18, 1941, to warn the Soviet Ambassador of the impending German attack—an act, he argues, which "would no longer have held up the disaster" and would simply have "cost the lives of German soldiers." But this was the crux of the whole matter. After the warring nations had been fully engaged, and with a compromise peace obviously out of the question, the only realistic way to work for peace was to work for the defeat of Germany. This was a hard lesson for patriotic Germans to learn, and their reluctance to recognize it was largely responsible for the long delay in carrying out the interminably planned and replanned conspiracy against Hitler's life. Eventually the inner circle of the conspirators realized that they could not avoid the risk of anti-national behavior if they were to take any action at all, and the result was the bomb attempt of July 20, 1944. Perhaps because he differed from the inner circle in this important respect, Weizsäcker evidently remained on the fringes of the conspiracy. It is significant that after the assassination attempt had failed, when hundreds of oppositionists of all sorts were being rounded up for questioning, Weizsäcker was not recalled from Rome to answer for his past activities.

An aristocrat and a former naval officer, who had joined the Foreign Service only after Germany's defeat in the First World War had cut off his naval career, Weizsäcker was basically an old-line German patriot. His book reveals, frequently unconsciously and naively, the virtues and the limitations of this attitude: devotion to the public service, sincere religious feeling, a high standard of personal morality combined with a blunt acceptance of the overriding claims of raison d'état, above all, an unquestioning loyalty to the inherited standards of nation and of class. It is a dignified, in many respects an impressive, attitude. But in the unprecedented circumstances in which Germany found itself under the Nazis, this standard of conduct failed to meet the test. In establishing service to the German state as the highest ideal it failed to provide for a situation in which a defiance of traditional national loyalty might be the only recourse against tyranny and universal destruction.

It will be many years before an impartial verdict on Weizsäcker can be rendered. His career is too ambiguous and the distinction between sacrifice and opportunism is too difficult to draw. Meantime, one thing alone is sure: on Weizsäcker's terms, from 1938 to 1943, it proved impossible to be both a good German and a good European. On balance, it was the German who had the upper hand.

The Widening Circle

THE CATHERINE WHEEL. By Jean Stafford. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.

THE CATHERINE WHEEL" is the most engrossing unsuccessful novel I have read for a very long time. It is unsuccessful because it tries to do too much and because Miss Stafford's attitude toward her subject or subjects is ambiguous. Sometimes she marshals her awareness to achieve a density comparable to that which marked the fine opening chapter of "Boston Adventure." Sometimes she clutters her writing with a multiplicity of matters ineptly crowded together.

The central symbol, for example, is beautifully worked out. The wheel of Saint Catherine was an instrument of torture named for that Egyptian martyr who was subjected to it. Here it represents the long, virginal, imperceptive, and imperceptible torment of Katharine Congreve. She is thirty-eight in the summer of the novel. Nothing has really happened to her since her heart was most conventionally broken twenty years earlier. She is rapidly approaching entire collapse. Her chief nervous symptoms are a feeling which recurs with increasing frequency of being whirled about, wheeling and helpless; and a desire for death. Yet her outer life is serene. Watched over by "her faithful servants," her beauty untouched by any flame, she presides as chatelaine of a great Maine summer house, adorned, from cellar to garret, with objects chosen by generations endowed with impeccable taste.

The everyday Catherine wheel is a kind of fireworks which gushes upward, circles about in brief splendor, and then splutters out. Like it, Katharine's "rarefied world" is an ephemeral pyrotechnical display. When, during a show of fireworks, she is burned to death, one of our last sights of her is as she "ran by herself in a widening circle, fanning the fire until it reached her waist."

But the novel is also about the initiation of her twelve-year-old cousin, Andrew Shipley, into a knowledge of the frailty of human ties. Miss Stafford is very good at recapturing what goes on in the minds of children—"The Mountain Lion" displays this power—but Andrew's difficulties are a distraction never really incorporated into the novel. And he, in turn, has twin sisters, whose blossoming, though intended as a contrast to the sterility of Katharine's life, is a further distraction.

On another level "The Catherine Wheel" is a daydream brought to a violent conclusion. The ordered life of a great house, the objects which adorn it, the way this woman lives are, in their fashion, desirable. Miss Stafford loves them all. Yet she weighs them also with a meaningless irony and, after displaying them lovingly, destroys them with meaningless violence. She seems to be saying that the nerves and the senses will have their destructive way. When she destroys what she has so tenderly re-created—her earlier novels end in similar, inconclusive, senseless catastrophes—rage rather than knowledge possesses her during the cold ceremonial preparations to kill, tritely, the thing she loves.

Occasionally she over-writes. But Miss Stafford's elegant sentences, except when they fall into lists of rare objects connoting vanished elegance, are, unlike most contemporary ornate writing, organic to what one guesses was a large design. They are the sometimes fanciful garment of intentions and perceptions which are never quite successfully organized into a whole because she never knows exactly what she thinks and feels about her subject and also, probably, because private feelings, irrelevant to her purpose, will intrude upon her fiction. She creates, constantly, the impression of seeing clear through everything she writes about to nothing at all.

ERNEST JONES

Inside Negro Europe

NO GREEN PASTURES—THE NEGRO IN EUROPE TODAY. By Roi Ottley. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

ROI OTTLEY, like other competent journalists, excels in reporting what he has seen and heard. Many incidents of his travels between 1944 and 1946 in England, France, Germany, Italy, Yugoslavia, Hungary, Greece, Czechoslovakia, Rumania, Egypt, the Lebanon, and Palestine might well be included in the anthology of "Insides." Among these are his realistic portrait of "Frisco" Bingham and his former night club in London; the black ghettos in London and Liverpool; the gay betrothal dinner of a molta bella Neapolitan girl and her colored fiance from Sugar Loaf, Mississippi; the frightening experience of an American colored girl in Germany in 1938; the all too brief etching of Tahia Koriem, the beautiful Negroid "Greta Garbo of the Arab world" and of her apartment in Cairo. Even more absorbing is Ottley's special horror, as an American Negro, in witnessing the lynch madness that still ran riot in Milan a few hours after the execution of Mussolini and a half-dozen of his henchmen. If only one selection could be included in such an anthology, I should nominate his description of the forty thousand Black Jews of Tel Aviv, most of whom live in Carmel Sug, "a neglected area very much like a ghetto."

This would have been a better book if the author had devoted all of it to his own experiences, contemporary firsthand accounts, and the immediate background of the race problem. He deemed it necessary, however, to provide a rather extensive historical background of the problem in the various countries. Much of this history, especially the brief biographies of eminent Negroes, makes fascinating reading for those not familiar with the careers of Molineaux, Aldridge, Ignatius Sancho, Samuel Coleridge-Taylor, Browning, Pushkin, the three Dumas, Eugene Chen, Tanner, and others. How much this historical treatment leads to an understanding of Europe today is debatable. It is marred by numerous minor errors, such as misspelled names, and others that are more serious. Cleopatra was certainly not "black." The Germans did not annex the Congo in 1884. Marcus Garvey did not join W. E. B. Du Bois in promoting the first Pan-African Congress, in Paris in 1919. Booker T. Washington dined, not lunched, with President Theodore Roosevelt. (It is necessary to correct this myth because, apparently, Southern susceptibilities would have been less affronted by a lunch than by a dinner.)

The author's thesis that Europe provides "No Green Pastures" for the Negro is subject to many reservations. Some of these he clearly reveals. Low man on the totem pole in France is, indeed, the North African rather than the Negro. I also concur with his comment, frequently repeated, that discrimination in public places and a distant attitude in private gatherings are based rather on caste and class than on race and color. Above all, Ottley cites numerous examples of Negroes, especially in England and France, who have no desire to come to the United States. Let one passage suffice:

In fact, Negroes in Paris constitute an élite: students, teachers, writers, painters, clergymen, officers, judges, government officials, business and professional men. . . . Negroes hold positions as plant managers, postmasters, executives, and inspectors of buses and subways, and there are Negro seamen, sales girls, street-car conductors and motormen, hairdressers, and ordinary laborers.

On the whole, however, Ottley amasses evidence to justify his conclusion that Englishmen and Frenchmen in particular have racial prejudices. The Pope, he insists, uttered "the only racially positive note I heard sounded in all Europe." The author also suggests that "in a small way, perhaps, the state of Israel is leading the way to a solution of color problems in the world." And he closes with the conviction that "what America has learned about race relations is of vital importance to a multi-colored world." In actual fact, of course, the truth lies somewhere between this optimistic view and the horrible facts revealed in "We Charge Genocide," the one-sided indictment of the United States published by the Civil Rights Congress.

My principal criticism of this book, which I read at one sitting, is that at least in some respects it is already out of date. Conditions in the Western European countries have improved since 1944-46. It is plausible to conclude that this improvement has lessened the competition for jobs which, along with the competition for women folk, is largely responsible for the plight of recent Negro migrants. While full self-government and equal integration have not been achieved, the new constitutions in Jamaica, the Gold Coast, and Nigeria and the presence of some thirty-five deputies from Black Africa and the French West Indies in the French National Assembly should be kept in mind when one evaluates Ottley's analysis of the impact of imperialism on the minds of Englishmen and Frenchmen in 1944-46. I have been in France for only two months, but I have heard several eminent Frenchmen, irrespective of religious affiliation, assert as did the Pope that "the blacks will one day live like other men." The Social Uses of Psychoanalysis

"The solemn and feeling testimony of a European (now American) who has abundant means of knowing whereof he speaks."

PSYCHOANALYSIS, MAN, AND SOCIETY. By Paul Schilder. Arranged by Laretta Bender. W. W. Norton and Company. $4.

PSYCHOANALYSIS AND POLITICS. By R. E. Money-Kyrle. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.

THE psychiatrist must inevitably ponder the connections between the troubled mental state of the individual and of society as a whole. He knows that the nervous disorders of his patients are inseparable from the tensions that prevail in his environment. He cannot avoid, therefore, casting a professional eye on the apparently irrational antics of the social group. His psychiatric thinking in such matters will naturally tend in the direction of diagnosis and therapeutic recommendations. Of course he is aware of his limitations in the face of political and economic issues that transcend the psychological sphere. Nevertheless, he feels, no doubt rightly, that his own contributions deserve serious consideration within the total scheme of things.

Taking his first tentative step toward the broader view, the psychiatrist is likely to reflect that great nations are, after all, conglomerations of individual men and women. The forces at work between small numbers are also to be found operating universally. From this basic supposition, at least, Dr. Paul Schilder took his point of departure in his recently published book.

Schilder, whose research and teaching activities in Vienna and at Bellevue Hospital in New York made him an outstanding figure, passed away some ten years ago. His widow and able collaborator, Dr. Laretta Bender, has collected many of his articles, which, together with data from his manuscripts, furnished the material for the present volume—the latest in an impressive succession of posthumous publications that still have a significant message for the contemporary reader.

The basic social unit, as Schilder perceived it, is the "body image"—a concept toward which he made important original contributions. The infant sees himself not as a separate entity but as an image which fuses and blends with those of other personalities that enter into his world—his parents, his siblings, and so on. Only gradually does the sense of the self as a distinct entity evolve, and then only to a limited degree. All through life, new associations with people are being formed in which feelings of identity—or incongruity—establish zones of mutual influence, much like chemical interactions, so that the behavior of each individual is almost always conditioned at each moment by that of others in his past and present.

Schilder next explored and described the various nervous disorders and forms of maladjustment in terms of the basic clashes that arise when there is difficulty integrating one's body image with those that prevail in a particular society. The value of deviations as well as of similarities should be recognized. Moreover, the influence of society itself constitutes a vital element in the shaping of each individual body image; a disorganized society must inevitably produce disorganized men and women.

The interplay of personalities during group therapy—a field in which he was a pioneer—gave Dr. Schilder the opportunity to study social forces in direct action. He gained the conviction that the factors which proved beneficial to the members of a small group would also be of value in larger units. The healing influence of the therapist—based on his knowledge and good-will—could be taken over by an enlightened and well-disposed government. The healthful impact which each member of the group could be induced to exert on his fellows as he came to understand them and himself better could be extended over an indefinitely wide range.

Economic problems naturally cast their inexorable shadows upon the scene. Schilder agreed, but in the end must themselves be calculated in terms of human needs and human labor. The laws that govern the human mind must enter into all social phenomena. The disturbances within a culture reveal patterns basically analogous to the neuroses of individuals. Psychological insight should therefore be invoked in treating the maladies of nations.

A similar view is taken by R. E. Money-Kyrle in his "Psychoanalysis and Politics." Money-Kyrle is an English lay analyst who served on an official commission investigating the Nazi mentality in Germany after the war. Where Schilder proceeded from the analysis of the individual to that of the state, Money-Kyrle reverses the process and undertakes to assess the state according to the character of the populace. He puts forward the interesting proposition that a government may be judged morally by the type of personality that flourishes under its regime.

This intriguing idea, unfortunately, cannot be adequately developed by the author because of the artificial and questionable constructs that he devises. For both men and nations he invents a measuring rod that purportedly extends from their primitive "authoritarian" depths to their more advanced "humanistic consciences." Authoritarianism and humanism in persons and governments alike are absolute and clearly defined entities, as Money-Kyrle conceives them, and are supposed to represent opposite ends in the order of biological evolution. To validate his ideas he invokes the controversial theorems of Melanie Klein, which have found little acceptance among the psychoanalysts of this country.

The application of these concepts to contemporary politics is scarcely convincing. On the Money-Kyrle scale the British Tory emerges—understandably enough—as an archaic relic of the authoritarian stage of development. In his unconscious he is probably afflicted with a horrible apparition of a phallic mother who manages to look very much like a socialist. The pacifist, on the other hand, is apparently an unfortunate individual who got that way because his parents quarreled so dreadfully during his childhood. Such “psyching” seems slightly amateurish and even a little on the primitive side of the Money-Kyrle scale. In fact, the impression grows with reading that the only proper outcome of humanistic evolution is a British Laborite, favorably disposed to rearmament and committed to rather definite views on a wide variety of questions.

THE FIELDS OF LIGHT. By Reuben A. Brower. Oxford University Press. $3.50.

WHAT a happy title for a book of criticism, and how happily the text lives up to the title! Mr. Brower's experiment in critical reading exacts of the student close attention and considerable use of his brains. The method requires that the design of the work under study be traced through line-by-line search for the key images, metaphors, symbols, and the links that bind these together, so that in the end the imaginative integrity that fuses the whole may be understood, and enjoyed. This book is not for the lazy; it is strenuous going, this analytic appreciation, but it leads, ultimately, as a quotation from Henry James indicates, to “the Beautiful Gate of Enjoyment.”

Mr. Brower demonstrates his system with short poems by Blake and Frost, sonnets by Donne and Hopkins, Keats's Ode to Autumn, two poems by Herbert, Marianne Moore's Roses Only, Donne again, the sonnet beginning “At the round earth's imagin'd corners” and The Extasie, Yeats's Two Songs from a Play; thence, on a larger scale, he has us work through “The Tempest,” “Mrs. Dalloway,” Pope's “Epistle to Richard Boyle,” “Of the Use of Riches,” “Pride and Prejudice,” and “A Passage to India.”

capacity for appreciation catholic, and his method flexible. Less obvious, from so summary a sketch as this, are his good manners and good sense, his willingness to admit that no critical method can entirely explain a work of art, his cheerful acceptance of charges of naivete. “One of my aims is to show that naivete of a certain sort is indispensable in criticism, and pays.” A disciple of Leavis, Richards, and Empson, and probably entitled as such to a chair in the academy of the New Criticism, Mr. Brower wears his rue, if it may be called so, with considerable difference. He is high-spirited, gay; “marvelous” and “wonderful” are adjectives which come quickly to his mind. He has no intention whatever of taking the poem from the poet, the novel from the novelist; the minute analysis, however close the observation, never turns into cold dissection, a process, as Louise Bogan has written, rather like boning a shad. Unlike many a latter-day Zoilus, Mr. Brower has an ear, an awareness that the sound matters. Above and over all is the sense of his original admiration for, and delight in, the work which he is presenting, so that his guidance, however strict, is founded on zest; the criticism exists for the work, not the other way round. And if the reader has to use his intellect as well as his emotions to come out where Mr. Brower has started, well what's the matter with that if the journey ends in the fields of light?

THE ONLY WAR WE SEEK. By Arthur Goodfriend. Published for Americans for Democratic Action by Farrar, Straus and Young. $3. This is a moving and highly effective picture book on the war between communism and democracy for possession of men's minds and a stinging criticism of some of the weaknesses of American foreign policy. The conquest of China by the Communists, for example, is described in startling contrasts of picture sequences and text illustrating the difference between Communist propaganda and our own, and the unhappy fact is brought home that the Communists were smarter than we, closer to the people, and at least superficially more understanding of the people's problems. Goodfriend was a member of the Joint Commission on Rural Reconstruction, an E. C. A. outfit trying to work with Chinese farmers, and he saw both the causes and the results as the red tide swept America off the China mainland. Now trouble is brewing among “backward” peoples everywhere, and a generation of Americans that has not yet stopped thinking in terms of the white man's burden must learn “how to fuse our material aid with the spiritual background and political aspirations” of others who hate the very concept of the white man's burden. Goodfriend thinks that we can still do the job—but not unless we stop bragging about our nylon-and-refrigerator society and start helping others to help themselves.

HEAVENS ON EARTH. By Mark Holloway. Library Publishers. $4.75. A concise and well-organized study of utopian communities in America from 1680 to 1880. The book covers not only those better-known utopias in which fanatics and perfectionists attempted to find a more rational way of life only to discover that spiritual aspiration seldom equated with practical common sense, but also the religious communities such as those established by the Shakers, Rappites, and Zoarites.

AMERICAN art critics, from Leo Stein on, have worked so hard at creating a new hierarchy of painters that to try to knock down one of their idols now is as useless as trying to chip through a bank vault with a teaspoon. Yet one must speak one's mind, and to me the recent Matisse show at the Fifty-third Street Barr and Grill spilled a scandalous secret about "the greatest master of the twentieth century." Far sketchier than it was cracked up to be, the display did touch on most of the high spots of his career, and clearly showed his long industrious progression from thin to thinner painting, both tangibly and philosophically. The inescapable revelation is that the philistines of thirty-odd years ago were nearer than they knew to the truth: Matisse may be skilful and ingenious, but only by the wildest idealistic rationalization can he be credited as a dedicated, ripened artist who has given himself over to feeling, sensuality, "love and life."

The crux of the great myth is that this magnificently endowed pagan has been the most adept of all painters in selecting and juxtaposing exotic, dynamic, gleaming colors; that he flies you close to the sun, in fact, with colors like so many bursts of jet exhaust. Trudging around through those rooms full of dead fish, heavy-breasted nudes, copper vases, flowers, fruits, costume jewelry, silk curtains, Milanese pigeons, and musical bric-a-brac, I found it a collection of embarrassingly insipid themes imprisoned in listless, lusterless, somewhat dirty tones of superficial color. There was on every hand the look of taut old icing plastered thinly over an excessively impelling surface, an icing now going vaguely ochre since the surfaces themselves are yellowing with the passage of time. And the assertive black outlines—on which Matisse has depended as trustingly as Rouault to make his reds and yellows sing—have held their power while everything else has faded, so that today the blacks overwhelm and over-darken almost every harmony. The exhibit verified a long-held hunch of mine that the jolly hedonist's glory has been felicitously created in large part by the brilliancy, gloss, and sparkle of the products of the reproduction industry. The plates in Barr's new book, for instance, are beautiful and scintillating, but hold any one of them up to its original and you will get an awful jolt.

Though miles of criticism have been published about Matisse's early use of Manet's simplicity and flatness, Monet's fragmentation and illumination of color, Cézanne's hatching, modeling, and composition—and finally of the synthesis and maturity that emerged when he picked up some decorative things from the Orient—a glance at his early trivial experiments in impressionism and post-impressionism should convince anyone that M. Matisse is an egocentric who cares little, and understands less, about any style other than his own. (If he is really indebted to any of his colleagues, it is to the tricky mannerist putterers who decorate cheap pottery.) Painting with a bland stroke, hardly mixing color on palette or canvas, working neatly, quickly, deftly, and a bit hygienically—like an Old World gentleman—over his "spontaneous" projects—indeed, "tickling" his way along, to borrow frenemy Picasso's devastating verb—he seems never to be deeply involved or even slightly carried away by his work. This was made pretty apparent in a two-reel film of Matisse at work released here a few years back, but nobody paid any attention to it; so the myth goes on that Matisse and sensuality are synonymous, while the latest retrospective showing of his pictures yawns with barrenness, baldness, and an inescapable faggish pseudo-sensibility.

Yet his position fairly far up in Western painting—say 73 on a scale from 0 to 100—is insured, I think, by both the variety of his compositions and his superb elegance and mobility as a draftsman. He moves on to a new compartmental arrangement after about three pictures, where a Breughel or a Corot spends from a decade to a lifetime on the same crowded figure eight or inverted pyramid; and his line is as much a thing of genius—if somewhat glib genius—as Cary Grant's dark nonchalant glitter. With one swift, sure, unbroken flip of the wrist he can do more for the female navel, abdomen, breast, and nipple than anyone since Mr. Maidenform.

Aside from this, what has Matisse really given the world to keep for the next thousand years? Certainly nothing more, in the last analysis, than a gigantic dose of that kind of "charm" which has enabled the butterfly battalions, during his reign, to take over almost exclusively in almost every field of creativity from the short story to the symphony, from the straight chair to the department store. The only trouble is that—as we all know but none of us admit—this charm is sterile; it is also getting dated, as are the paintings that were its source. Sterility is the key to the chapel at Vence which Matisse and everybody else call the climax and summation of his career. Here if anywhere is symbolized, in cold white bathroom tiles, cold black doodles, and cold tinted sunlight, the modern artist's breakout of the ego and breakdown of technique and feeling—to say nothing of religious feeling, on which I am no authority. It is a movement in which the artist gets to say whatever he bloody well pleases with an oversimplification and rapidity that make one yearn for the distant era when craftsmanship was so complex that you started at the age of nine as an apprentice, learning to mix colors, prepare panels, and so on. The chapel has naivete, "charm," and a confident slickness; it also does things with filtered light that are breathtakingly pretty. But is the prettiness valid or vulgar, and is this church designed for the worship of God or Matisse?

Henri Matisse never seems to have sweated over a work long enough to give it deep values, plastic or human. It will be said in rebuttal that Matisse himself has never pretended to be more than a nice old rocking chair of an artist, whose goal was to soothe the soul with a pure, calm, equilibrated art. The impoverished surfaces, the absence of rich color chords, the lack of muscle, the lack of heart, make even this claim appear questionable.

EUGENE BERMAN'S decors for the first three acts of the Metropolitan's new "Rigoletto" are the most astoundingly beautiful and effective I can recall seeing in opera—the only ones comparable with them being Berman's for the ballet "Romeo and Juliet" and the second act of "Giselle." And his costumes for "Rigoletto" also are very beautiful.

When I call the decors effective I have in mind not only their extraordinary living presence as settings for what is seen and heard, but the way the first-act palace interior, with its levels and windowed galleries, provides the means for the rich and intricate profusion of activity created by Herbert Graf. The designer and director together achieve something I have never seen before and didn't think possible: a first act that makes dramatic sense—though a second act that would make sense appears to have been more than even they could achieve. One detail in the first and third acts struck me as odd: the fact that in rooms in the Duke's palace, in which he was bare-headed, the courtiers wore hats; but perhaps Dr. Graf knows this to have been the practice of the period.

The work of the principals in the performance I attended was less satisfying. It was the eighth performance of the season, with replacements of singers of the first performance—Paolo Silveri for the first time as a rough-voiced, lunging and clutching Rigoletto, and Jan Peerce for the first time as a Duke who began by singing Questa o quella very poorly but went on to do the best singing of the evening. Peerce also began badly out of step with the orchestra, which was something of a shock, since I had thought that with Bing we had heard the last of a singer stepping onto the Metropolitan stage without even a conference with the conductor about tempos (which Peerce appeared to have had before the later acts). But a worse shock was the singing of Roberta Peters as Gilda; for I would have supposed we had also heard the last at the Metropolitan of such premature exploitation of insufficiently or poorly schooled vocal talent coping with the demands of a role like Gilda with a catch-as-catch-can method of vocal production for each note that produced a different-sounding voice each time—and one that was unpleasant as often as pleasant.

A week later I went again, to hear Gilda sung for the first time by Genevieve Warner. This was the soprano whose singing in a performance of Mozart's "Seraglio" put on by the Music School of the Henry Street Settlement three years ago amazed me with the extraordinary loveliness of the sounds that were produced—even in the most formidably high and florid passages of Constanza's arias—with an effortless casualness born of secure technique. In the second act of "Rigoletto" it took a good part of her opening duets for Miss Warner to get over her nervousness and warm up her voice, which in Caro nome produced sounds and phrases that ravished the ear. But the Metropolitan audience which Miss Peters had been able to excite to cheers by her way of making the squeezing out of a particularly acidulous note a dramatic demonstration of triumph over prodigious difficulties—this audience was left unmoved and silent by Miss Warner's effortless production of those lovely phrases.

"Those English have a weight of tradition to support them, but sometimes it sinks them," someone commented when I wondered how critics like Desmond Shaw-Taylor and Edward Sackville-West of the New Statesman and Nation and Martin Cooper of the Spectator—who operated with a musical knowledge, understanding, and perception related to a rich general culture that made their writing so illuminatingly accurate most of the time—could sometimes hit so wide of the mark. Cooper, for example, is capable of the accurate observation and evaluation embodied in his statements that "if you really listen to Berlioz's music, really follow it . . . it is perfectly coherent and alive with the most astonishing vitality"; that "for all the richness of his palette and the kolossal character of many of his effects, Berlioz is not a sensualist"; that "harmonically his music is ascetic and its effect on the listener astringent," and the four brass bands and eighteen kettle-drums of the Tuba mirum of the Requiem "are used by a mind so completely in the grip of a poetic idea, so absolutely alien to all exploitation of sound for its own sake (the sensualist's music), that the listener's soul and not his nerves are affected." But he is capable also of the statement that "no violin concerto more than Elgar's combines musical quality with virtuosity"; and for him it is Flagstad who has only a phenomenal voice, Gigli who has in addition the "sheer artistry" that will prolong his career when the voice goes.

The National Book Award was established three years ago to give official recognition to the most distinguished books of the year. Since then the Award has become an annual event in which the American book industry has united to honor American authors.

One finds these inequalities also in Cooper's excellent book "French Music" (Oxford, $4.75). In his introduction he explains that French music isn't popular in England because it lacks "a strongly flavored emotional content, either moral or uplifting as in Beethoven or introvert and lowering as in Tchaikovsky"; the French composer, he says, rejects W. J. Turner's idea that the function of art is to reveal the soul of man, and regards music as "the art of arranging sounds in agreeable and intellectually satisfying patterns." He is aware that "taste, intelligence, and skill cannot replace the individual genius or, divorced from largeness of character, create works of the first magnitude"; but he contends that "few countries at any period have been richer in the best music of the second rank." And the illuminating intelligence, perception, and sense of values that are evident in these general statements appear also in most of the subsequent detailed examination of this music. But occasionally this discussion of works in terms of tendency results in their not being perceived and evaluated correctly as particular works of art: one would not suspect the outstanding stature of Debussy's "La Mer" and "Images" for orchestra from what Cooper says of them, and he misrepresents and undervalues Chabrier's fascinatingly original "Dix Pièces pittoresques." However, the few details of this sort don't make this anything less than an excellent book.

Record Notes

BY ROBERT E. GARIS

[Because of the great increase in the number of new LP records we shall publish occasionally brief listings by Mr. Garis which will supplement Mr. Haggin's reviews.]

Bartok: Music for Strings, Percussion and Celesta; Von Karajan and the Philharmonia Orchestra (Columbia), also Kubelik and the Chicago Symphony (Mercury); one of Bartok's best pieces; the Kubelik performance is lurid and is recorded with too wide a dynamic range, shrill highs, and noisy surfaces; the Karajan is better; best of all is the Byrns performance on Capitol. Violin Concerto; Varga with the Berlin Philharmonic under Fricsay (Decca); a few beautifully expressive moments embedded in a diffuse rhapsody; performance good, recording not well balanced.

Bloch: Concerto Grosso for string orchestra and piano obligato; Kubelik and the Chicago Symphony (Mercury); performance effective, noisy surfaces.

Brahms: "Academic Festival" Overture and Hungarian Dances Nos. 1, 3, 10, 17; Walter and the New York Philharmonic (Columbia); performances excellent. Sonata No. 3 for violin and piano; Horowitz and Milstein (Victor); juicy virtuoso performance. Symphony No. 2; Monteux with San Francisco Symphony (Victor); performance fair, some wavering in pitch.

Couperin: Harpsichord Suite; Eta Harich-Schneider (Urania); music only mildly interesting; performance very poor, recording not clean.

Couperin and Rameau: Harpsichord Recital; Sylvia Marlowe (MGM); pleasant music, fair performance.

Franck: Sonata for Violin and Piano; Stern and Zakin (Columbia); good performance.

Locatelli: Concerto da Camera for strings and piano; Litschauer with the Vienna Chamber Orchestra (Vanguard); dull music; fair performance.

Martini: Sonata and Sonatina for two violins and piano; Margarete and Willy Schweyda and Jan Behr (Urania); dull music; competent performance.

Mendelssohn: "Italian" Symphony; Rieger and Munich Philharmonic (Decca); performance weak; recording hollow and muffled.

Musorgsky: "Pictures at an Exhibition"; Kubelik and the Chicago Symphony (Mercury); performance effective; recording superb, noisy surfaces.

Respighi: "Trittico Botticelliano"; Litschauer and Vienna State Opera Orchestra (Vanguard); typical Respighi—pretty sonorities with a gum-drop center; performance effective, recording not clean.

Sibelius: "Finlandia" and "The Swan of Tuonela"; Ormandy and the Philadelphia (Columbia); good performances. Symphony No. 2; Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony (Victor); performance effective.

Strauss: "Death and Transfiguration"; Reiner and RCA Victor Symphony (Victor); performance good. "Don Juan"; Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony (Victor); performance fair, recording thin. "Till Eulenspiegel"; Reiner and the RCA Victor Symphony (Victor); performance generally effective, occasionally melodramatic.

Szymanowski: Violin Concerto No. 1; Uminska with the Philharmonia Orchestra under Fichtelberg (Decca); music very poor, tirelessly rhapsodic; performance ditto.

Wagner: "Siegfried Idyl"; Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony (Victor); performance poor, recording thin.

Weber: "Der Freischütz" Overture; Ormandy and the Philadelphia (Columbia); good performance, wavering pitch and noisy surfaces.

Letters to the Editors

Grass-Roots Support For Justice Douglas

[The Nation has received many telephone calls and letters in response to the editorial published on January 26, entitled Justice Douglas Is Available. Excerpts from a few of the letters appear below. In an early spring issue The Nation will publish an article by Fred Rodell of the Yale Law School on Justice Douglas as a possible Democratic nominee.]

Dear Sirs: Your editorial Justice Douglas Is Available was splendid, and struck a responsive chord in countless persons who are dismayed and discouraged by the present destructive trends in this country, and who feel that he alone can provide the vision and the leadership we desperately need. . . . The moment has come to translate talk into action. Time is short. Will you start a Douglas for President movement—or shall it all dissolve in talk? JOSEPH H. TITUS

Dear Sirs: I was very glad to see your magazine editorializing on so fine an issue. I think it enough people raise the cry Justice Douglas might become available. I would be glad to help in any effort in this direction, whether it be fund raising or campaigning, but have heard of none so far. Surely someone should organize a movement that would have such wide and fervent support among so many thinking Americans.
New York CHARLES R. BOWEN

Dear Sirs: I hail with delight your banner for Justice Douglas for President. I have long thought of him as the only man of presidential calibre we have. . . .
ELIZABETH STEPTOE
Charlottesville, Va.

Dear Sirs: Is there any sort of organization pushing for Justice Douglas? He certainly would be the ideal candidate.
RUSSEL PALMER
e . . . N. J.

Dear Sirs: I read with . . . real interest your editorial on Justice Douglas. As a rather restless liberal voter looking for a decent candidate for whom one could vote with some enthusiasm, the name of Justice Douglas is certainly the most congenial one I have seen mentioned anywhere this year. Liberal and progressive voters could conduct a really worthwhile campaign with a candidate of Douglas's stature. . . .

Ypsilanti, Mich. ANN HUBBELL

Dear Sirs: I wish to express my satisfaction and pleasure in your effort to direct the attention of our people to Justice Douglas as a possible nominee for President. A life-long voting Republican, I'd be glad of the opportunity to vote for him on any ticket. . . .
Yelm, Wash. WILL RICHARDS

Dear Sirs: Your editorial on Justice Douglas electrified my voter's impulse. It would be good news if for once the nation will listen to The Nation.
New York EDWARD F. BROWN

Dear Sirs: Few things have given me keener pleasure recently than the copy of The Nation of January 26 . . . I consider Justice Douglas our greatest American liberal. With his hand on the steering wheel, we could feel secure . . . I hope The Nation will start a boom for him.
CLARISSA E. CALLAHAN
Denver, Col.

Dear Sirs: We would like you to know that we agree wholeheartedly and endorse your proposal to try to convince Justice Douglas that he is the outstanding choice for the Democratic nomination. . . .

After Pasadena, Phoenix

Dear Sirs: The campaign to stifle free inquiry in our colleges and universities, recently reported in a series of articles entitled Battle for Free Schools in The Nation, won another victory by forcing out a textbook at Phoenix, Arizona.

The book is "Basic Economics," by Mitchell, Murad, Berkowitz, and Bagley, published by William Sloane Associates in 1951. It is one of the several standard textbooks in the field of economics and is used at various colleges and universities. The authors, all professors of economics at Rutgers University, the state university of New Jersey, differ in opinion among themselves. This benefits the circumspection of the book, which is an effort at factual, non-partisan exposition.

The first shot in the skirmish at Phoenix College was fired on October 6, 1951, by an anonymous corporal at Luke Air Force Base who in a letter to the editor of the Phoenix Gazette denounced the book as "socialistic," "dreamy," and "idealistic." This indictment was supported by vague innuendo, quotation out of context, and outright misquotation. The corporal pleaded to have the book banned from Phoenix College and indeed from all schools—public and private.

President E. M. Montgomery of Phoenix College countered by defending the book in a statement to the press. The Phoenix Gazette in an editorial on October 11 then reemphasized the corporal's charges and called for a ban on the book. Again the college authorities reacted. Dean Robert J. Hannelly announced that the college intended to combat this "attack on academic freedom."

The Board of Education of Phoenix College then ordered a public review of the book on October 16. The outcome of this public review was that the board unanimously voted to continue "Basic Economics" as a text.

This victory for academic freedom was not accepted as final by the self-appointed defenders of our economic faith. Letters and editorials, in the Gazette and other papers, kept up the fight. The background and affiliations of Broadus Mitchell and of others among the authors were impugned. One letter sent to the authors revealed, perhaps more honestly than did the published attacks, the sentiments and quality of the assailants. It read: "You fellows sound like a bunch of Joisey hikes, come out west where we will teach the American way of life."

Something called America's Better Citizens Committee sent out literature misquoting the book and urging people to write to the school board to have the book banned. Dean Hannelly stated that the college had been swamped with letters demanding that the book be dropped. The American Legion (Luke Greenway Post No. 1) declared the book un-American, socialistically and communistically inclined, and urged that it be banned from all Arizona schools. The two Phoenix newspapers, the Gazette and the Republic, owned by Eugene C. Pulliam of Indianapolis, refused to print the true facts or to present the college administration's side in the controversy.

Eventually the college succumbed. "The dispute over a Phoenix College textbook has ended," said an editorial

In the Gazette on January 5, 1952. "College authorities, yielding tardily but with good grace, have decided that 'Basic Economics' by Mitchell, Murad, Berkowitz, and Bagley will not be used as a textbook after the present semester ends January 18. Material more laudatory of the American economic system will be used." The Gazette editorial hailed the assault on the book as "a working of the democratic processes" and as not "in any way infringing on their academic freedom."

There are rumors that the Phoenix legionnaires, elated by the surrender of Phoenix College, are planning to extend the ban to all colleges and universities in the nation.

No more suitable question suggests itself than one asked by the eloquent corporal in his letter to the editor which started the "democratic process." "Can't something be done about this? It's a far cry from the principles upon which our country was founded and for which a great number of us are giving up years of our lives." LEOPOLD KOHR

New Brunswick, N. J.

The Memphis Witch Hunt

Dear Sirs: The activities of Local 19, Distributive, Processing, and Office Workers, composed primarily of Negroes in two Memphis plants, had been reported, off and on, in local papers as "left wing." To conservative Memphis anything considered "left" is also usually considered communistic. However, Memphis is either less hysterical or more lethargic than many American cities today, for there was very little talk about Local 19.

Memphis, therefore, was somewhat surprised to hear that Senator Eastland, from nearby Mississippi, was coming with a Senate subcommittee to investigate Communist activities in the city. The committee moved in, suddenly, with fanfare and publicity, but Memphis on the whole, once it had got over the initial shock, pretty well ignored the entire affair. Some suspicious folk suggested the investigation was just a little political maneuvering by the Senator, who might have an eye on elections down home. Others, close to the labor field, hinted that the rival C. I. O. Chemical Workers' Union, which had recently been defeated by the D. P. O. in a National Labor Relations Board election, might have persuaded the Senator to investigate so that the election might be challenged, giving the C. I. O. another crack at it.

The local papers gave a blow-by-blow description of the committee goings-on. The pattern of questioning was familiar, but the obvious difference in the way witnesses were questioned made the investigation a trial. Senator Eastland and Victor Rabinowitz, attorney for the D. P. O., generated most of the excitement. Rabinowitz tried to give legal counsel to union members, and Eastland did not want the witnesses to have it, at least not Rabinowitz's. At one time during the hearing Eastland shouted, "Throw that damn scum out of here!" This outburst summoned marshals to escort Rabinowitz out of the chamber and got headlines in the paper and congratulations from C. I. O. officials. There seemed little justification for such adolescent, undignified behavior on the part of a United States Senator, since Rabinowitz, if he offended the Senator, only did so through his insistence on knowing what his rights were. Some people felt the Senator was making up his rules as he went along, leaving everyone confused. They also felt that he was playing the game with loaded dice in not letting witnesses have an attorney, since the committee itself had its own lawyer, Richard Arens.

A bit of local color was added by Eastland's treatment of Negro witnesses. Although all white persons, both accused or otherwise, were addressed as "Mr." or "Mrs." by the Senator, Negroes were addressed as "boy" or by their first name, in the best Mississippi tradition. Richard Arens, committee attorney, did call Negroes "Mr." or "Mrs.," but lashed out at them like a new graduate trying to win his first case. Witnesses, both Negro and white—alternately tense, angry, and scared—were generally confused or puzzled.

The committee showed a definite flair for drama when in the middle of the investigation it brought in a "mystery witness" by the name of Paul Crouch, an ex-Communist. After a witness had been questioned, Crouch was called in to tell what he knew about the person. Although he had not been a member of the Communist Party for nine years, Crouch displayed a most remarkable memory for things that had happened and the exact date of their happening ten or fifteen years before. With obvious delight Crouch named names, made accusations, and contradicted witnesses, while they glared and committee members practically chortled with pleasure. Many spectators wondered if the ex-Communist was any more trustworthy than a present-day Communist, but the committee for some reason seemed to have great faith in the veracity of its imported mystery witness.

The hearing ended in a burst of glory, branding the D. P. O. as Communist, threatening to invalidate the recent N. L. R. B. elections won by the union, and promising to seek laws curbing "groups like D. P. O." No one was surprised, naturally. There was some talk about indicting D. P. O.'s 1,400 local members. Of course, everyone connected with the hearing knew that they could not be indicted for anything, but the members, being uneducated in the mysteries of witch hunts, were probably scared out of their wits. At least one well-known business man who had refused to answer certain questions and who had hired known "left-wingers" thought it advisable to sell his business and leave town. He was not directly accused of being a Communist, or of advocating the overthrow of the government, but the committee did a lot of insinuating.

Nothing was accomplished, of course. No one proved that the D. P. O. was trying to overthrow the government. Surprisingly few people even kept up with the hearings. In a state that hasn't amended its constitution since it was originally written in 1870 and in a city that seldom sees two men running for any one office, the whole thing, ^{it} ^{seemed} rather silly. Many people who ^{had} ^{known} about it felt that the C. I. O. and the committee were taking advantage of the colored folks, or that it was just politics, or that it was just part of Congress's investigating spree and didn't mean a thing. However, they will vaguely remember names connected with the hearing and automatically brand those names as Communists.

Here is an Opportunity—

- To Support Liberal, Uncensored News Commentators
- To Raise the Cultural Level of Radio Broadcasting
- To Share in the Ownership of a Listener-Controlled Radio Station in Washington

You can do this by subscribing to preferred stock in WCFM, a radio station owned by 2,700 people across the country, each of whom has an equal vote regardless of the number of shares he owns. These people believe in freedom of the air and back their beliefs with dollars in their own Cooperative Broadcasting Association.

WCFM . . . combats "McCarthyism" and "Fulton Lewis-ism" with fair and impartial news analyses. It presents such commentators as Will Allen, B. S. Berkovici, Wallace J. Campbell, Marquis Childs, Mrs. Raymond Clapper, Wallace Deuel, Frank Edwards, John Herling and Robert Nathan.

WCFM . . . offers a channel of expression to such groups as the Americans for Democratic Action, the American Newspaper Guild, the B'nai B'rith, United World Federalists and the Workers Defense League. It gives coverage to events like the White House Conference on Children and Youth and the All Day School of Politics of the League of Women Voters.

WCFM . . . devotes 70% of its air time to classical music. It presents weekly concerts from the National Gallery of Art and live broadcasts of local chamber music. Its Listener Committee sponsors outstanding drama and music presentations including material from the British Broadcasting Corporation's Third Programme.

WCFM's audience has increased nearly 100% in the past year. Its signal can be heard over a 50-mile radius, and its nightly audience approaches 30,000.

You can help WCFM continue to make freedom of the air a living reality in the Nation's Capital by subscribing to Preferred Stock at $10.00 per share.

Preferred shares are available to the public from an offering of 13,355 shares at a par value of $10.00 each. 491 common shares at par value of $100.00 each are available only to consumer-cooperatives. Underwriting discounts or commissions will not be incurred. Estimated distribution cost is $1.55 per share for preferred and 18¢ for common stock; aggregate expense of $21,022.68. Net proceeds will be used for the completion and development of WCFM and for operating capital. Total deficit, including depreciation, up to August 31, 1951, has been $177,643.16. As of August 31,

Death by Jim Crow

Galveston, Texas

ROBERT DORSEY SMITH, forty-three-year-old Negro, was found dead in a Galveston alley in the early morning hours of November 11. The circumstances of his death, as they have since come to light, offer an example of Jim Crowism less sensational than a lynching but just as unpardonable.

Normally a dead Negro has little news value in Galveston. But differences between the police department and the hospital administration invested this case with unusual interest. Stories about it appeared in nearly every issue of the local dailies from November 12 to 28.

The father of six children, Smith had been employed by a local packing firm for twenty years. The evening before his death he was struck by an automobile on a busy Galveston street. He was taken from the scene of the accident to John Sealy Hospital, a unit of the School of Medicine of the University of Texas. After examination and treatment he was released, although he was unable "to get fully dressed" when he left; his shoes and wallet were later found in the hospital. The police started to drive him home but halfway there dropped him off, with about nine blocks to walk. He was found dead in an alley not far from where he had got out of the police car—his face swollen, large bruises on legs and back, naked except for his trousers. "Accidental death due to skull fracture, multiple fractures of the pelvis, and internal injuries," read the autopsy report.

The next day the police and the hospital officials issued conflicting statements. Dr. T. D. Blocker, Jr., the hospital administrator, said that the emergency examination had found only superficial hip injuries and intoxication. The police stated that Smith's death might have been caused by the accident, plus a fall from the hospital examining table. Smith had been helped to the police car by a physician and an orderly, who said later that there was nothing seriously wrong with him at that time. In the view of the police the arrangement of his clothing and the nature of his injuries precluded the possibility that he had been assaulted after leaving the car to walk home.

At a subsequent meeting called by Dr. Blocker "to give the hospital's side of the case," Dr. Blocker testified that Smith had been examined by a senior medical student, then rechecked by an intern. Both reported a minor hip injury and intoxication. An X-ray was taken, but a fracture of the pelvis detected on the picture later by an unidentified radiologist was overlooked at the time, apparently because the plate was wet. There was no evidence of a skull fracture. The intern testified Smith fell from the table while alone in the room.

Both the county attorney and the police commissioner declared that the facts brought out at this hearing in no way reflected upon the hospital. The Galveston News of November 17 reported that "the circumstances surrounding the death were thrashed out . . . with the group reaching a general agreement that the incident was the type that occurs unavoidably at times."

A committee of Negroes then petitioned for a full investigation. The grand jury agreed to hear some witnesses and later issued a statement which made no mention of the actions of the police or the hospital attendants. Thus the case of Robert Dorsey Smith came to a quiet close—apparently to the satisfaction of the Galveston authorities.

Many unanswered questions, however, haunt the conscience of the white minority concerned with such cases. Is it customary for medical students to conduct unsupervised examinations of badly injured persons, even if their findings are later checked by an intern? Was the wet condition of the X-ray plate an adequate excuse for the faulty diagnosis? Why was the radiologist who later discovered the fractured pelvis never identified by name? Was Smith examined after he had fallen from the table? Do hospitals usually discharge patients who, after emergency treatment, are unable to dress themselves, are barefoot, and must be carried out? Why did the police allow this nearly naked, badly injured man to leave the police car nine blocks from his home? Early in the case the reports of the police and the hospital were at variance; what caused the police to be so easily satisfied with the hospital report later on?

Smith's experience suggests the kind of emergency hospital treatment that Negroes receive in many Southern towns. The reaction of the community, fully informed by the unusual publicity given to the case, was also typical. A vigorous demand from any quarter that the responsibility be fixed might have demonstrated that the community did not condone Smith's death. Such a protest might have had a considerable effect upon the future welfare of Negroes in Galveston. It might have given reassurance that there are humane and decent elements in the South whose efforts in behalf of the Negro population justify gradualism and non-intervention by the federal government. But the only faint voice of protest in the Smith case came from the Negroes of Galveston.

In passing it may be pointed out that the white driver of the car that struck Smith was charged with negligent homicide and released on his own recognizance pending a hearing. The case was continued three times and then dismissed. The grand jury failed to fix responsibility not only for the circumstances surrounding Smith's death but also for the accident. Nothing about the Smith case, perhaps, is more typical of similar occurrences.

THE CLAIMS OF ALASKA AND HAWAII TO statehood have long been widely accepted and appear to have the support of a majority of the Congress. Nevertheless, it may prove as difficult to bring these territories into the Union as it is to get Italy admitted to the United Nations. Since Alaska is normally Democratic and Hawaii Republican, a "package deal" ought to be feasible. However, Southern Senators fear that Congressional delegations from the new states would reinforce the proponents of civil rights. Considerations of party loyalty make it a little difficult for them openly to oppose Alaska, and on the theory that it would be easier to pass, supporters of the statehood bills decided to give the Alaska measure precedence. But last week a switch in tactics appeared desirable in view of indications that enough Southern Democrats were prepared to join with Republicans to assure the bill's recommittal—tantamount to burial. At the same time an informal canvass suggested that there were fifty-five votes for Hawaii and perhaps enough to obtain a cloture should Southern threats of a filibuster materialize. If the Hawaiian measure could be passed, it would be impossible, it was felt, to defeat the Alaska bill. At this point Senator Pat McCarran, head of the Senate's Internal Security Investigating subcommittee threw a monkey wrench into the works by announcing his intention to make a protracted inquiry into the menace of communism in Hawaii. The result may well be that both statehood bills will be blocked. Hawaiians, at least, seem to be coming to the end of their patience. They are now beginning to talk about following the example of Tunisia, denied self-government by France, and sending a petition to the United Nations. We hope they do so. That might shame Congress into action.

COLLIER'S IS STILL PEDDLING THE MYTH that the United States government thought the magazine's special issue on World War III a capital idea. On February 9 its editorial page boasted that "... the State Department has asked and received permission to translate the issue's editorial for reprinting in publications throughout the world." Actually the only request for permission to reprint "The Unwanted War" came from a Falangist-sponsored weekly in Barcelona. Furthermore, Edward W. Barrett, until recently Assistant Secretary of State for Public Affairs, has said that the State Department does not "plan to give the article world-wide distribution" but simply asked Collier's for clearance in case there should be "future . . . similar requests." It now appears that such requests are not likely to be granted. The Nation has learned that "The Unwanted War" has been stamped by the State Department with a "discretionary mark"—the next thing to an outright refusal to permit reprints.

CONGRESS SHOULD ACT IMMEDIATELY TO provide extra unemployment benefits for workers made idle by civilian cutbacks. Under legislation sponsored by Senator Blair Moody, Representative John D. Dingell, and others, the federal government would pay fifty cents for each dollar advanced by the states, and would match, dollar for dollar, the additional compensation provided by some states for dependents. Considering that state unemployment benefits average only $21 a week, a measure of this kind seems imperative, even though it would last only long enough to get the states over the period of conversion. While the proponents of the plan undoubtedly are thinking mainly of the jobless in Michigan, where cutbacks have had particularly serious effects, other sore spots demand attention. The textile workers, for example, have been hit badly by declining sales in men's-wear and other "soft"-goods lines. But in granting relief to the present victims of conversion, Congress should consider the problem of unemployment on a long-term, preventive basis. It is high time some real efforts were made to prevent workers from being penalized each time we shift from a civilian to a defense economy, or vice versa.

IN THEORY DEMOCRACY AND MONARCHY are not at all compatible. The one implies sovereignty of the people with equal rights for all citizens; the other sets a man by virtue of his birth apart from and above all others. He may be clever or stupid, good, bad, or indifferent, but he is the king to whom his "subjects" owe homage. Nevertheless, a few nations, notably Britain and the Scandinavian countries, have succeeded not only in reconciling these opposing systems but in making them support each other. In Britain the throne has increased its prestige as it has lost its power. It serves as a catalytic agent in the presence of which the strong reactions of political warfare can be carried on without disturbing national stability and unity. Also, as Mr. Churchill said on February 2, "The crown has become the mysterious, indeed, I may say the magic link which unites our loosely bound but strongly interwoven Commonwealth of nations, states, and races." The last significant republican movement in Britain occurred in the middle of the nineteenth century when Queen Victoria indulged in partisanship and showed signs of wishing to enlarge the powers of the crown. Her son, Edward VII, and her grandson, George V, conformed more closely to the constitutional ideal, although both are believed on occasion to have stretched their right to be consulted by the Prime Minister, to encourage certain courses of action, and to warn against others. By contrast George VI, whose reign has been so sadly cut short, seems to have been a model monarch in his relations with both Tory and Labor governments. Certainly he was a popular king, and the people of Britain will not soon forget the way in which he shared their dangers and difficulties when they stood alone against the Axis. *

THE KING'S DEATH AND THE ACCESSION OF Queen Elizabeth II will have no direct political consequences but indirectly may prove helpful to the present government. No Englishman could better Mr. Churchill's expression of national sentiment about these events, and the speeches which it is his duty to make will undoubtedly increase his popularity. Moreover, the King's death necessitates a short political moratorium at a most convenient moment for the Prime Minister, who on the day it occurred was under heavy fire in the House of Commons on account of his ambiguous declarations about Far Eastern policy. Again, a period of national mourning will provide a proper psychological atmosphere for the new austerity measures which contrast so dismally with Tory election promises. Finally, the Queen's coronation, whenever it takes place, should give the government an opportunity to stage a great Commonwealth rally in London and attract large numbers of tourists to help right the trade balance. If at this time some relaxation of austerity also proves possible, the stage might be set for a successful appeal to the voters.

CITING THE GREATER PRODUCTIVITY OF Southern labor as its reason, the American Woolen Company has announced that it may shift all its operations from New England to the South. Of the company's twenty-four mills, twenty-one are now located in New England. The average hourly wage of $1.05 for textile workers in the South, as compared with the Northern average of $1.26, may have some bearing on the company's decision. The company has also notified the Textile Workers' Union (C. I. O.) that it has decided not to renew the present contract but to negotiate instead for an entirely new agreement. It would like to have the new contract include a provision which would authorize "greater work assignments," that is, speed-ups. The union contends that nothing in the present contract prevents greater work loads if new production machinery is put into use or if the company can convince an arbitrator that greater work loads are warranted. That American Woolen is not the only textile firm anxious to beat a retreat to the more kindly atmosphere of the South, where vacations with pay, group insurance, and other fringe benefits are virtually unknown, is indicated by the effort of the Utica and Mohawk Cotton Mills to escape from an injunction recently issued to restrain it from moving to South Carolina while a $400,000 suit brought by the union over questions of vacation and separation pay is pending. There has been, of course, a sharp drop in the earnings of the textile industry; but this situation will not be remedied by shifting plants to the regional sweatshop that is the South.

Educational TV: The Time Is Now

THE future of educational television may be decided in the next few weeks. Last March the FCC issued tentative allocations for 1,900 new television stations, of which 207 were reserved for schools and colleges, provided they demonstrated a real interest in obtaining channels. Since then some 500 institutions have applied for such facilities, and the FCC is about to issue a final decision on allocations.

The past year, however, has seen several developments which, while commendable in themselves, increase the likelihood that the FCC may take a narrow view of the policy question it must now decide. It is being argued, for instance, that educational institutions will be unable to raise the necessary funds or organize the facilities for full-time TV operations. The Ford Foundation's million-dollar television-radio workshop, set up to provide commercial networks with significant program material, has been cited as an example of the way educational institutions might cooperate with commercial outlets without going to the expense of establishing separate channels. Senator William Benton's proposed National Citizens' Television Advisory Board has also been discussed as a possible means of achieving the same end.

There is merit in these proposals, as there is also in the suggestion that commercial outlets should be required by law to devote a portion of their telecasting time to educational programs (see The Nation, October 13, 1951). These and similar measures might be expected to improve television as a medium for disseminating news, interpretative comment, and entertainment of a better quality. But none of the alternatives thus far advanced can be fairly regarded as an adequate substitute for the allocation of channels for the exclusive use of educational institutions. On this score, we are inclined to share John Crosby's view (New York Herald Tribune, January 23, 1952) that "educators will never in this world pry more than a token amount of time from commercial stations." Besides, universities are among the few remaining centers of free, critical inquiry in a society in which the channels of communication are increasingly monopolized. They are, of course, vulnerable to economic and political influences; but the fact that educational channels would not be directly geared to profit-making offers the best hope of a wider and more effective use of television for educational purposes.

Until recently the FCC has seemed to favor the policy of reserving channels for educational institutions. But under constant pressure from commercial interests it has begun to speculate rather gloomily about the possibility of 200 "idle" channels, and some commissioners have suggested that "non-use" of ether waves constitutes unpardonable "waste" of a public resource. That a television channel in the Chicago area should be valued at $10,000,000 is some measure of the weight of the pressures being brought to bear to reduce the number of channels for schools and colleges. Thus there is a real danger that the time a channel reserved for a college may remain unused will be so severely limited that few institutions will be able to raise the funds needed to build stations and organize facilities. This, indeed, is the real issue behind the argument that a policy which encourages telecasting to wider audiences—even mediocre commercial telecasting—is preferable to a policy of holding up allocations in the hope that educators may be able, given sufficient time, to take advantage of them.

Actually the interest shown by schools and colleges in obtaining channels is quite impressive, considering how little the commissioners have done to encourage it—a notable exception being the fine work of Commissioner Frieda Hennock. It is true that more educators have talked about educational television than have set about raising the necessary funds. It is also true that many practical problems must be solved if the financing of educational stations is to proceed with reasonable dispatch. But the fact that at least one community—Wichita, Kansas—has adopted a $5 personal-property tax, with the revenue earmarked for the construction and operation of an educational TV station shows that the difficulties can be surmounted.

Since both the FCC and the industry acknowledge the university's "theoretical potentialities" for television, the commission should be urged to stand by the decision it made last spring to reserve at least 207 channels for educational outlets. Under no circumstances should the FCC permit itself to be pressured into reducing the number of reservations or into placing rigid limits on the time such frequencies may remain unused. In the allocation of channels there is indeed a danger of "waste"—not in the failure to exploit a public resource but in its exploitation for private purposes under the guise of "development." The waste of valuable timber land and mineral resources during the last century in response to a similar argument should sufficiently demonstrate the urgency of close public attention to the issue now before the FCC. The ether waves, too, are part of the public domain.

Bonn Feels Its Oats

IT WAS tactless of the French government, at a moment when plans for German participation in a European army were nearing completion, to change the title of its representative in the Saar from High Commissioner to Ambassador. This move, suggesting that the French were treating the Saar as an independent sovereign state, was bound to raise nationalist passions in West Germany. The Quai d'Orsay must have anticipated this reaction: in fact, it is reported that Allied sources in Germany who were queried in advance gave an accurate forecast of the ensuing outburst. What, then, was the purpose of the French government? Was it trying perhaps to needle Germany into a display of nationalist temper in the course of which Bonn would reveal sooner than it had intended details of the bill for the military services of West Germany? Better a showdown now, the French may have argued, before the European army is finally set up, than later.

Whether or not the French government was thinking along these lines, its move in the Saar has produced such results. No doubt we have still to learn the full price of German cooperation, but the total now revealed by Bonn is certainly high enough to induce all but the most reckless enthusiasts for German rearmament to pause.

Last week, following a two-day debate in the West German Bundestag, the principle of participation in a European army was approved by 204 to 156. However, five other resolutions adopted by a show of hands indicated clearly the conditions which the Adenauer government wishes to attach to an agreement reducing this principle to practice. The first declared that as long as West Germany was not a member of NATO it must be given "military rights appropriate to the idea of a European defense force as a voluntary association of equal partners." According to a Bonn official interrogated by Drew Middleton of the New York Times, this obscurely worded demand is a new effort to obtain a German general staff.

The second resolution expressed regret at the naming of a French ambassador to the Saar and asked political freedom for that territory. The third declared that Germany's financial defense contribution must be determined by the same standards as that of other countries. Number four was a significant concession to the old militarist elements—a demand that the Western Allies review the sentences of war criminals "without delay." Finally a resolution, beginning "The occupation regime must come to an end," called for full restoration of German sovereignty with freedom to repeal occupation laws and an end of all controls on German industry.

The nature and scope of these demands show that the West Germans are feeling the oats which we have been assiduously feeding them in the form of daily statements about the indispensability of German rearmament. They indicate also that there are a great many hurdles to be negotiated before the proposed European army materializes. The first demand is particularly tricky. Admission of West Germany to NATO is strongly opposed by France on the very reasonable grounds that it would deprive the Atlantic Pact of its defensive character in view of Bonn's declared aim of recovering lost German territory in the east. On the other hand, the idea that the Germans should be permitted a general staff nullifies the whole purpose of the European-army plan and reintroduces the nightmare that France has been so desperately trying to dispel.

The impudence of the fourth resolution speaks for itself. It is evidence of German determination to expunge the crimes of Nazism by forcing the Allies to admit that they never really took place or, at least, were much exaggerated. As for the demand for the end of the occupation regime, that of course is intended to remove all remaining obstacles to the rebuilding of the German arms industry and to end such reforms as the anti-cartelization laws.

It may shock some people to find that less than seven years after V-E Day, the Germans feel strong enough to put forward such demands. Still more alarming is the fact that they can probably enforce most of them. For as many observers foresaw when the project of rearming West Germany first emerged from the Pentagon in 1950, and as the German expert interviewed by Mr. del Vayo reports, we have dealt Bonn a winning poker hand. Now Chancellor Adenauer is raising the ante and forcing us to pay up. As Drew Middleton wrote in the New York Times of February 10: "No one doubts that the West needs Germany, although the degree of the need has been greatly exaggerated by those who think solely in terms of army divisions. But the Germans no longer need the West as much as they did, and in the future they will need it still less. . . . It must be expected that the leaders of the Federal Republic will become more difficult, not easier, to deal with in the future, especially in the months between now and next year's election."

Presidential Appointment

BY WILLARD SHELTON

Washington, February 6

PRESIDENT TRUMAN today picked an obscure Assistant Secretary of the Interior, Dale E. Doty, to fill the vacancy on the Federal Power Commission left by the departure last October of Mon C. Wallgren, who in sixteen months of service had thoroughly besmirched the commission's fine record of defending the public interest against predatory electric and natural-gas companies. Nothing derogatory is known about Mr. Doty. For a number of years he has been a protégé of Secretary of the Interior Oscar Chapman, one of the few important officials in the Administration who have fought for consumer interests. But the public should be told how Mr. Truman's "friends" managed to block the appointment of candidates for the post whose records entitled them to serious consideration.

One of these candidates was Raymond S. McKeough, a former Democratic Representative from Illinois who had made a fine reputation on the old Maritime Commission. Another was Mrs. Chase Going Woodhouse, who as a Democratic Representative from Connecticut had shown herself to be a dependable liberal. A third was a member of the FPC's professional staff eminently qualified for promotion by his knowledge of the field. McKeough had the powerful backing of Frank E. McKinney, chairman of the Democratic National Committee. Mrs. Woodhouse was the second choice of Mrs. India Edwards, head of the committee's women's division. Support from the National Committee, it turned out, was no help.

McKinney's efforts in behalf of McKeough were opposed by President Truman's secretary, Matt Connelly, and his administrative assistant for personnel, Donald S. Dawson. McKeough was called a "trouble-maker." His "loyalty" to the President was questioned. The only conceivable explanation for these charges is that he was the one member of the old Maritime Commission who had refused to approve loose accounting practices and scandalous subsidies to private ship operators, the one member who had escaped scathing Congressional criticism, the one member whose actions had not invited attack on the Administration.

When McKinney continued to support McKeough, he met other obstacles. McKeough was said to have the backing of a former celebrated New Dealer whom the President detests—the "kiss of death." It was reported that Senator Edwin C. Johnson of Colorado, chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee, would refuse to allow McKeough's confirmation. To the question what Johnson had against McKeough nobody has given a clear-cut answer, but his opposition is amply confirmed.

Had the President been well advised, he would have known that he was badly in need of a liberal of tested quality to replace Wallgren. In 1950 Mr. Truman vetoed the Kerr natural-gas bill, which would have relieved "independent" gas companies of FPC regulation of their rates. Last August, Wallgren in effect annulled the veto in the specific case of the Phillips Petroleum Company by a written decision that the FPC had never possessed any authority over the rates charged by independent gas companies. The Wallgren opinion and the President's message vetoing the Kerr bill were in direct contradiction. A public-utilities magazine, hailing the FPC decision, frankly exulted that Wallgren had given the natural-gas industry everything it could have hoped for under the Kerr bill—and perhaps more.

The Kerr bill was fought by Senator Paul H. Douglas of Illinois and Senator Estes Kefauver of Tennessee as prejudicial to consumers. It was also opposed by William M. Boyle, Jr., then chairman of the Democratic National Committee, and Secretary Chapman. Douglas estimated that if the bill were passed, consumers would soon be paying from $200,000,000 to $300,000,000 a year more in gas rates, and called it a "five-to-ten-billion-dollar bonanza" for the gas producers. Republicans hoped the President would sign the measure and thus prove that he gave only lip-service to the interests of consumers; the majority of Senate Republicans voted against the bill. When Mr. Truman's veto was announced, Senator Douglas said, "God bless the President of the United States!"

Then everything was undone by Wallgren. The professional staff of the FPC frankly admitted that the decision in the Phillips case was contrary to their judgment. Unless it is reversed, independent gas companies are left completely unregulated as to rates, and consumers will pay through the nose. Gas-pipe-line operators, encouraged by the trend of events, are beating at the doors of the commission demanding to be allowed to raise their rates, and if the requested increases go through, state and local regulatory bodies will have no choice but to allow local retailers of gas to raise prices.

Mr. Doty, Truman's appointee, may prove an excellent commissioner. In the cockpit of FPC controversies, where powerful industrialists and members of Congress fight for the spoils, he may reveal the granite-like qualities needed for public service. One hopes so. Thomas Buchanan, the one FPC commissioner who disagreed with the Phillips decision and wrote a brilliant dissenting opinion, must feel lonely these days in his job. Unfortunately it has been made reasonably clear that honest and genuine service to the people—service which does credit to the Administration instead of provoking criticism for laxity and impropriety—is not always rewarded. Not when the White House cronies see a chance to intervene.

The White House Under Surveillance

BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

THE witch hunt has now been extended to the highest echelons of American business and government, and even to the White House. This was bound to happen sooner or later. Once the informer is officially sanctioned—as by the Attorney General of the United States urging college students to tell tales on their instructors, or by Edgar Hoover beseeching taxicab drivers to help him catch spies—he becomes all-powerful; literally no one is immune from his prying and tattling.

This was clearly established by the witch hunt in the wake of World War I. At first only anarchists and wobblies were beaten up and kicked around, but from 1921 to 1924 the FBI, with J. Edgar Hoover as assistant director, put Senators and Representatives under surveillance—rifled their files, examined their mail bags, got servants in their homes to report on their actions; it even set a watch on a federal judge. The story is being repeated today but with variations in scale and tempo.

On January 28, for example, Senator Joseph R. McCarthy gave the press a copy of a letter he had sent to Henry R. Luce, editor-in-chief of Time, demanding that Time withdraw certain charges. Coupled with the demand was the threat that if the magazine did not comply promptly, the Senator would place his case before "all of your advertisers." In this impudent note Mr. Luce was accused—I imagine for the first time in his career—of "rendering almost unlimited service to the Communist cause and undermining America." The basis of this horrendous charge was simply that Time had dared criticize Joseph R. McCarthy. A year or so back it was Adam Hats and Drew Pearson that felt the Senator's lash; today the most powerful magazine publisher in America is his victim. Nor is McCarthy's threat an idle one. Should the present witch hunt continue unabated, it is conceivable that even Mr. Luce could be made to toe the line.

Consider the extraordinary "leak" of confidential information from the Loyalty Review Board to Senator McCarthy. Commenting on McCarthy's evident access to the board's records, the Washington Post said on January 18: "It is plain that some person inside the Loyalty Review Board is giving classified material to Senator McCarthy . . . and is thus guilty of one of the specific activities which the executive order directs the Loyalty Review Board to consider in connection with the determination of disloyalty." Such a statement carries serious implications. The board has been converted into an instrument in a partisan struggle for power. If informers have infiltrated the Loyalty Review Board, they are doubtless to be found in the Pentagon, in the offices of Congressmen, among the clerical staff of the Supreme Court, and perhaps in the White House.

Two recent incidents show that this supposition is not groundless. On January 29 Senator McCarthy charged that Philleo Nash, a member of President Truman's staff, had been named in FBI reports as a person who had had close connections with Communists in the 1940's. The Senator, of course, offered no proof that the reports were correct, but suppose they were. How does it happen that McCarthy has access to confidential files of the FBI? Can there be informers in the FBI? One would prefer to believe this than to have to conclude that J. Edgar Hoover himself has been feeding information to McCarthy, but the circumstances warrant the latter inference.

Or consider the case of David Lloyd, a highly respected special assistant to the President. In 1950 charges were made against Mr. Lloyd by Senator McCarthy on the basis of information supplied by "sources at the Loyalty Review Board." Since no supporting evidence was offered, formal charges were never filed and no hearing was held. McCarthy now claims that the Lloyd case was closed on orders from the White House. If this is true, how does Senator McCarthy happen to know it? Has he an informer in the White House or on the Loyalty Review Board, or is he able, like the man in the Marcel Ayme story, to walk through stone walls? The Lloyd and Nash incidents indicate that the White House itself is now under surveillance, a conclusion also implicit in the Max Lowenthal incident.

On January 24, 1952, Representative George A. Dondero of Michigan viciously attacked Lowenthal on the floor of the House, charging that he was "back on the Washington scene" and had "recently almost succeeded in dealing a death blow to the government's program in prosecuting Communists." According to Dondero, Lowenthal was "the architect of the plan to fire J. Howard McGrath" and to name Justin Miller as his successor. Dondero said further: "I am . . . keeping my eye peeled to find out what he is doing now, in the hope that when it is discovered I can expose it here before the Congress of the United States and the American people." Anyone familiar with Dondero's assault upon modern abstract artists as agents of the Kremlin would dread to be "exposed" by him; he is a man with a powerful, if erratic, political imagination.

Max Lowenthal, the target of this attack, is a well-known New York lawyer. He was counsel for one of the Truman investigations for several years and has remained a close friend of Mr. Truman's. Just before his book, "The Federal Bureau of Investigation," was published in 1950, Mr. Lowenthal was subpoenaed to appear before the House Committee on Un-American Activities. The book was highly critical of the FBI, and extraordinary pressures, first to prevent its publication and later to impede its sales, were brought to bear on Lowenthal and his publishers. But these efforts failed, and the staff of the House committee were equally unable "to lay a hand" on the book's author. Last spring Lowenthal repeated his criticism of the FBI in a paper which he read before a conference on law enforcement sponsored by the Law School of the University of Chicago. In this paper, entitled "Police Methods in Crime Detection and Counter-Espionage," he maintained that by "placing under police scrutiny the thoughts, the beliefs, the reading matter, and the circle of acquaintances of large numbers of Americans," the FBI had created an atmosphere in which spies were able to operate more freely than before the witch hunt began. It can be imagined that Mr. Hoover, sensitive to criticism as his friend Walter Winchell, did not take this statement lightly.

WASHINGTON observers confirm the plain implication of Dondero's speech—that Lowenthal had been at the White House and had talked with the President. No responsible person, however, confirms the alleged "plot," to quote the Chicago Tribune's characterization of the supposed interview. In any case one wonders how Representative Dondero knew what was said in a conversation between the President and Mr. Lowenthal? Both are seasoned public men with a reputation for respecting confidences. Conceivably the White House staff of 300 workers contains one or more informers. Another possible inference—the more likely the more one studies Dondero's speech of January 24—is that informers or those occasional "informants" of the FBI whom its chief generally indorses as "confidential" or "reliable" have had Lowenthal and the White House under surveillance for some time.

The close friendship between J. Edgar Hoover and Dondero is a matter of common knowledge. According to the New York Post of January 25, "Dondero, like Winchell, has frequently displayed notably close connections with the FBI." In 1946 Dondero told his colleagues in the House that he had spent long hours with J. Edgar Hoover, getting confidential information about spies and such. In an earlier attack on Lowenthal in 1947 Dondero asserted that he knew what the FBI knew or claimed to know about Lowenthal. At the time of the attempt to suppress Lowenthal's book in 1950, it was Dondero who made the chief speech against Lowenthal in Congress.

Supporting the inference that the FBI is keeping tabs on the White House is a little-noticed but significant fact. The Secret Service, which is under the Treasury Department, has always had the responsibility for protecting the White House and the President. Secret Service agents see everyone who goes into the White House offices or the President's study. The time, to the hour and minute, of everything that happens in the White House, including all arrivals and departures, is carefully noted. Secret Service agents are in the White House all night. They watch the switchboards, guard the files—can see any papers left on the desks. If the FBI had this function, it would have innumerable opportunities to acquire power at the highest decision-making levels.

J. Edgar Hoover has long sought to deprive the Secret Service of this high responsibility and to acquire it for the FBI. The Herbert Hoover Commission recommended such a transfer. Up to the present, however, J. Edgar has failed to win the White House prize, though he has never given up hope that it would some day be his. In the meantime he has wangled thousands of dollars of special appropriations from Congress for the "protection" of the President, protection which the present incumbent of the White House has never asked for. It is well known that President Truman, since the days when he was a Senator, has looked with disfavor on the FBI's repeated bid for new powers. It was in part to curb the bureau that he appointed the Nimitz Commission last year to survey internal security problems; and it was Hoover's influence in Congress that scuttled the commission. Not for years has the Department of Justice been in any sense independent of the FBI; Hoover has been the master-mind of the witch hunt.

J. Edgar Hoover

Today President Truman is thoroughly aware that he is a major target of the more audacious witch-hunters. He is far too astute not to know that the FBI supplies McCarthy with information. The President has surely noted the FBI's failure to deny that it has been feeding information to Dondero, McCarthy, and other enemies of the Administration. Back in 1950 Wisconsin newspapers published an indorsement of McCarthy by J. Edgar Hoover—the statement is said to have helped "rebuild" McCarthy at a time when his prestige was at a low ebb.

Thus in the first weeks of 1952 it has become clear—if it was not always clear—that literally no American is beyond the reach of witch-hunters or the vicious activities of informers. If the FBI, or "confidential informants" of the type constituting one of the main sources of FBI information or misinformation, can shadow the White House without the President's knowledge or consent, then no agency of government is immune. Does the FBI have its eye on Justices Black and Douglas? Has it shadowed Judge Delbert Metzger in Hawaii? What Senator or Representative can today feel sure that the FBI does not have some "confidential informant" in his office, reading his mail, jotting down the names of visitors?

The shadow that has now fallen on the White House fell long ago across every government agency, most factories, many businesses, and literally millions of American homes. Few institutions of higher learning can ignore the informers in their midst. This shadow might still be dispelled if people of power and influence could be induced to speak out, as some of them finally did in the 1920's. But many of these people are now intimidated, or hesitant for other reasons. In Wisconsin, Governor Kohler has finally decided not to oppose McCarthy, thus insuring the latter's renomination. The day that McCarthy attacked Henry Luce, the Senate Rules subcommittee, weakened by the resignation of Margaret Chase Smith, met "inconclusively," in an atmosphere "strongly indicating that no action was likely to be taken" to carry out its previous decision to investigate Senator Benton's charges against McCarthy. That project would now seem to be as dead as the dodo. A House committee has voted to investigate the Department of Justice—meaning Attorney General J. Howard McGrath—but there is not the slightest likelihood that it will question J. Edgar Hoover on his relations with McCarthy and Dondero and other political enemies of the Administration.

Those who want to roll back the "black shadow of fear"—the phrase is Justice William O. Douglas's—now, enveloping so large an area of American life must realize that behind the McCarthys stand those who really direct the witch hunt; behind the puppet is the puppeteer. Joe McCarthy, like Charlie, is a puppet; but who pulls the strings? Congress could easily find out if it investigated the FBI as it did in 1924. At least once every twenty-five years J. Edgar Hoover should be required to answer a few questions, and the questioning should be done, as Max Lowenthal stated in his Chicago speech, by "a staff of such courage and independence that it can decline to rest on the assertion of the [FBI] and can insist on answers. . . ."

The High Cost of Health

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

AMONG the many rising items in the rising cost of living is medical care, including pre-paid medical insurance, the panacea which the American Medical Association offers us as a safe substitute for the horrors of "socialized medicine." On May 1 both the Associated Hospital Service (Blue Cross) and the United Medical Service (Blue Shield) of New York will advance their subscription rates. Group membership in the first, which provides coverage against hospital fees, will in the future cost $1.60 a month for an individual instead of $1.24, and $4.36 for a family instead of $3.56. Moreover, married couples without children, who at present pay $2.72 a month, are to be charged the full family rate. Such couples, it is explained, are mostly elderly and require, on the average, as much service as families with children.

The United Medical Service provides either surgical care and in-hospital medical care or surgical care only. Its rates for the more complete service are to increase from 72 cents to 88 cents monthly for an individual, from $1.64 to $2.00 for husband and wife, and from $2.96 to $3.40 for a family.

As a result of these changes the total cost of family coverage against illnesses and accidents requiring hospitalization will be $93.12 a year. And this not inconsiderable item is of course only a part and often quite a small part of the average family's health budget. Moreover, Blue Shield only meets surgeons' and physicians' bills in full when the subscriber's income is under a quite modest level—$4,000 for a family or $2,500 for an individual. In other cases the patient receives a credit which is usually well below the doctor's fee.

Writing of the Blue Shield type of contract in the Atlantic Monthly of October, 1950, Dr. James Howard Means, professor of clinical medicine at Harvard University, said: "While these plans are of some assistance in aiding surgeons and obstetricians to collect their fees, and while they act as a bit of a cushion for the patient facing a big bill for a surgical or obstetrical procedure, they obviously have glaring deficiencies. For one thing, they probably do not cover more than one-sixth of the average family's annual doctor's bill, so that they are hardly more than a token of economic aid."

If my own experience is at all typical for middle-income families, Dr. Means errs on the side of moderation. In the past seven years Blue Cross and Blue Shield premiums have accounted for about one-tenth of my annual medical expenses, as reported for income tax, which have averaged from 7½ to 10 per cent of total income. Yet in this period we have had no long or serious illnesses in the family and only one operation, entailing three days in hospital, on which occasion I recovered from Blue Cross and Blue Shield about half my expenses. Another year I developed an infection which proved to be relatively mild but which produced in its early stages some symptoms alarming to my doctor. As a result, a specialist was called in and I was subjected to some elaborate tests. The upshot was reassuring, but the total expense of this illness, exceeding $300, was decidedly debilitating to my bank account; since no hospitalization was involved nothing was recoverable from the insurance plans. However, this was exceptional, and the real burden of the family's annual health bill is due to what may be called routine expenses for check-ups, care of teeth and eyes, minor ailments, and prescriptions.

There are prepaid medical-insurance schemes that cover a good many of these expenses. One of them, the Farmers' Union Hospital Association of Elk City, Oklahoma, was described in The Nation of February 2. That group suffered from boycott by the local medical society; and similar bodies, such as the Group Health Association of Washington, the Permanente Health Plan in California, and the Health Insurance Plan of Greater New York, have also been criticized and obstructed by organized medicine, which appears to view them as only slightly less dangerous than government health insurance.

Despite obstacles, such plans have found wide acceptance in the few areas where they have been tried. New York's H. I. P., for instance, has now more than 280,000 members, although it accepts only employee groups and their families. Its members are entitled to choose a family doctor from a long list of general practitioners, and to receive medical, surgical, and specialist care at home, at doctors' offices, and in hospital. The service includes regular health examinations, immunization and tests, maternity and child care, eye examinations, physical therapy, X-ray examinations and treatments, psychiatric examinations, visiting nurses, and the use of an ambulance when necessary. It does not cover dental care, prescribed drugs, biologicals, appliances, treatments for acute alcoholism or drug addiction, or mental disorders requiring institutional treatment. It also excludes hospital costs, but members are required to carry hospitalization insurance so as to complete their protection.

There are no plans, I am told, for increasing H. I. P. subscription rates at the present time. On the contracts covering employees and families they range from $34.32 annually for an employee with no dependents to $103.48 for one with two or more dependents. This applies to those with family incomes not exceeding $6,500 or to single employees earning up to $5,000. Those with greater incomes pay about 50 per cent more. Thus for the lower-bracket family the combination of H. I. P. and Blue Cross will cost $155.80 annually after May 1. With dental care and other excluded items added, the total health bill is not likely to be less than $200 and may be considerably more.

SINCE this is probably the broadest and most satisfactory plan for meeting health expenses now available to Americans, it is interesting to compare its costs with those of the British Health Service, which has much broader coverage even when allowance is made for the trimming of benefits just proposed by the Tory government. The British service, as its critics are so fond of telling us, is not really "free"; like education in this country it is paid for through taxes, on the ground that health is as much a matter of public concern as literacy. The gross cost in 1949-50 was $1,220,800,000, or 3.6 per cent of total consumer expenditure. This amounted to $24.31 per capita, or $97.24 for a family of four.

In this country total private expenditure for medical services and commodities in 1949 has been estimated at $7,900,000,000, about 11 per cent of which was covered by voluntary insurance benefits and indemnities.* This was 4.4 per cent of total consumer expenditure in that year and amounted to $54 per capita, or $212 per family of four.

Of course many American families don't spend anything like that sum on health: they can't afford the money and in many cases don't get the medical care even when they need it desperately. The New York World-Telegram of January 29 published a report from Big Stone Gap, Virginia, about a mother who set out over a mountain trail with a sick baby to reach a hospital. A neighbor explained that three doctors had been called before they found one "who talked like he was going to come. That one asked whether Mrs. Hazelwood had any money in the house." She did not, and the upshot was the baby died of pneumonia a few minutes after its mother reached the hospital. After investigating this case, Dr. E. J. Benko, chairman of the Wise County Medical Society's Board of Censors, said, according to the New York Herald Tribune of January 30, that a doctor is "a damn fool to go out without knowing whether he is going to get paid." County doctors, he added, are willing to accept charity cases, "but nobody wants to get stuck with a dead beat."

I don't imagine that story could be duplicated in Britain, where since the Health Service started, a baby's right to life has been a civic right and not a matter of charity. But until health care in this country is provided on the basis of need instead of ability to pay, such human sacrifices are likely to be among the costs of private-enterprise medicine.

Germany's Price Goes Up

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Paris, February 2

THE other day I talked for several hours with a German who by reason of his official position thoroughly understands the "German problem." No one could suspect him of being friendly to Russia—in fact, he criticized Russian policy severely—but he was convinced that the German policy of the Atlantic powers had taken a dangerous turn. His view of the present situation and of the way it is likely to develop is worth passing on to American readers.

"Throughout Germany," he said, "the people are doing their best. In this respect they cannot be criticized. West Germany has a great deal of unemployment and is burdened with the refugees from the east. East Germany, far from being troubled with unemployment, needs workers badly. But West Germany is benefiting from a great influx of foreign private capital. Copious funds are being made available, partly because no controls have been imposed on the economy and partly because Western policy favors Germany above other European countries. The product of West German industry, moreover, is in great demand for Atlantic defense. East Germany has the advantage of lower prices; many West Germans go to the Soviet-controlled eastern zone to buy food. The shop windows in the West are filled with luxuries like oranges, which are almost never seen in the east, but Soviet propaganda asserts that the east zone's cheap potatoes are a still stronger attraction. The difference in the cost of living in the two zones has slowed the stream of refugees flowing westward."

Since the question of German rearmament is now so urgent, I asked him how the Germans themselves felt about it.

"In general," he said, "they are not enthusiastic. In recent Gallup polls even young people have been 70 per cent against remilitarization. But this spontaneous opposition is counteracted by outside pressures. Young people in Germany today feel terribly confused, just as they do in other European countries. In East Germany they parade and make speeches to the satisfaction of the Soviet authorities and seem converted to communism, but I will wager that one day they will march against Russia. And in West Germany the same young men who are now talking about enlisting in a European army will some day march against France. The only strong, genuine emotion in either group is devotion to Germany and to the idea of a reunited Germany.

"West German youth call themselves 'democratic and anti-militarist,' but recently their attitude has been somewhat affected by the growth of such organizations as the Bund Deutscher Jugend. Being rabidly anti-Communist, this group has received strong financial support and greatly increased its membership. The Bundesjugendring, which is made up of young people of widely varying views and usually takes a democratic position, has not shown itself very 'cooperative' on the question of rearmament and is not so well off for funds. But of course the attitude of the youth, though important, is not decisive with the Bonn government."

I then asked Herr—— if he would permit me a direct question: Did he himself favor the rearmament of Germany?

"In the form in which it is at present conceived, no," he replied; "in its original form, with the Germans' military contribution kept to proper proportions, yes. If Germans will help defend their own country only for a price, and that price is that they shall be treated as the most privileged member of the European community and be allowed to destroy every seed of future German democracy, then, as a liberal, I hope they do not get their price. I do not want to see former S. S. officers strutting through the streets as our new masters. I am outraged when I hear a man like Frauenfeld, the ex-Gauleiter of Austria, say that Hitler's S. S. were "élite European troops." It is bad enough that at this very moment the S. S. is preparing for a great 'reunion' in Germany, to which former Nazis are coming from Spain and Argentina and the other countries where they have been trying to revive the Nazi movement."

I put in a question: "Don't the Germans know that by making too many demands they may come a cropper?"

"Chancellor Adenauer knows it, but he is under constant pressure from his entourage to extract every possible advantage from the American interest in German rearmament. The other day I said to a high government official that this was no time to talk about rectifying the eastern frontier. He replied that if the Germans were not given satisfaction in this matter, there would be no German divisions: the Allies could take their choice. I said that in the present difficult international situation the Allies could not raise that question without seeming to be directly provoking Russia. He insisted that the Allies must secure the return of the eastern provinces to Germany, compensate Poland with Russian territory, and make it up to Russia in some other way. How, for instance, I asked him. Well, he said, there is Yugoslavia. If the Allies would let Russia take over Yugoslavia, Moscow would gladly make a deal. I observed that the policy of the West was to protect the independence of Yugoslavia against Russia. He answered with a smile that Allied policy frequently changed—it had changed toward Franco and might toward Tito.

"Several things are behind the Germans' exigent attitude. There was the speech of High Commissioner McCloy on December 17 pointing out that the United States had a 'German policy in reserve, in addition to the European army.' More important was the action of Mr. Harriman, head of the Mutual Security Agency, in choosing William H. Draper as his personal representative in Europe. Mr. Draper is remembered as one who rendered the German ruling class many services when he was General Clay's right-hand man: among other things he retracted earlier decrees concerning demilitarization and the dissolution of industrial cartels. But the chief reason for Bonn's increasing boldness is found in the reports from Washington that the American military planners, seeing that efforts to build a European defense community were bogged down, had decided to separate the problem of German rearmament from the problem of European unification, instead of making one conditional on the other, as the French demanded. I have cited only public and well-known occurrences, but I might also speak of the secret encouragement given to the German generals by American military men who have asked them to help pick the officers for the future European army."

"It is said the British have obtained better results than the Americans in reeducating the Germans for democracy. Is that true?"

"Perhaps to some extent. But in general all attempts at democratization have been a failure. Did you hear about what happened at a UNESCO meeting the other day, here in Paris? A hundred German students were invited by the Allies to come to Paris to learn about the work of the specialized U. N. agencies. They were shown a number of films, one of which referred in restrained terms to the crimes of the Nazis. The German students rose in a body and left the room!

"The idea of remilitarization was repugnant to almost everybody a few months ago. But since the Germans have discovered that if they rearm, their country can become again the leading power in Europe, the opposition is dissolving. Those in favor are still a minority, but when they say that rearmament will win for Germany the financial and political support of the most powerful nation on earth, the United States, they have an effective argument. No country is recovering more rapidly or feels more confident of the future than Germany. Its faith in itself is confirmed by the stock market: West German industrial stocks which two months ago sold on the Paris Bourse for 900 francs have gone up to 5,000."

I asked how the Germans felt about the European army.

"Just when it seemed that agreement on a European defense system was going to be reached, after great difficulty, in Paris, the whole plan was jeopardized by Germany's demand to be accepted into NATO. This was carrying the equal-rights theory to extremes. And instead of trying to allay French anxiety, Bonn chose to emphasize that a new and powerful Wehrmacht would emerge from the plan for a European army, which theoretically was supposed to be able to restrain German ambitions. At about the same time Bonn reacted brusquely to the appointment of High Commissioner Granval as French ambassador to the Saar. It is interesting to note that the Socialists objected even more strongly than the Chancellor, reproaching Adenauer for his 'concessions' to France and demanding a firm policy on the Saar. In these domestic struggles the winner is always the same military and industrial clique which caused the two world wars. Seeing Germany courted by the Americans, this clique is now resolved to make the United States pay the highest possible price for German rearmament.

"The Nazis, of course, are pleased by this development. A year ago people would get excited when a known Nazi who had been prudently lying low was appointed to a government ministry or to the board of directors of a big industrial enterprise. Nowadays that happens so often that only a foreign correspondent recently arrived in Germany would see a story in it. But the chief difference between a year ago and today is that Nazis then were satisfied to get good jobs in the civil administration or in private business while now they have trained their sights on the future German army. Many of the majors, captains, lieutenants, and sergeants of the new German divisions, the officers who mold an army's character, will be active Nazis. In the beginning these divisions will owe allegiance to a supra-national 'Europe,' but soon they will become an embryo German army, and as the result of German experience over the past five years a belligerent and aggressive army. Americans who are shocked that France retains its traditional distrust of Germany should remember the long past. A man in Colorado, living four thousand miles from the Rhine, views German rearmament very differently from a Frenchman who realizes that while the Russians may attack France, the Germans have attacked it many times.

"Some people think it will take at least two years to rearm West Germany. This is a gross miscalculation. They forget the most important factor in German rearmament—the 'cadres.' While France is stripped of its new officers by the Indo-Chinese war, which absorbs each year an entire class of Saint-Cyr graduates, Germany has on hand more officers than it can use. The organizations of veterans, of former officers, that have been revived during the past year or so are already at work selecting the 'cadres' of the new German divisions. These are officers trained in the war against Russia—a fact that increases their value. The German military program is much farther advanced than official comments in NATO would lead you to believe."

"Do you think the French reaction will induce a diplomatic retreat on the Germans' part?" I asked.

"I am afraid not. France has been forced to yield ground continuously in the past twelvemonth, and the Germans are flushed with victory. France is likely to find itself facing such a strong Germany that the desired economic union with the Saar will prove as impossible as it was in 1935. Soon, if events continue on their present course, Germany will have the strongest army in Western Europe. That will cause forebodings in Europeans who recall Germany's resurgence after Jena and after Versailles. The demand of the leading Bonn diplomat, Hallstein, that Germany be admitted to NATO can be ignored for a time—it may not even be discussed at the coming meeting of the Atlantic Council in Lisbon—but it will probably be granted in the end."

I asked how he thought Russia would react to this.

"I shall not venture an opinion on that. Moscow continues to support Grotewohl's unity campaign and offer of free elections, but I am inclined to think it has little faith in his success. To answer West German rearmament by arming East Germany would not seem an adequate counter-move. A remilitarized West Germany supported by the enormous industrial potential of the United States would constitute such a threat to Russia that one can hardly expect it to remain idle while the plan is carried through. How it can block the process is a question. At one time it seemed possible that to prevent German rearmament Russia would even go to war. But recently Soviet diplomats have given the impression that they are equally concerned with other issues, such as the nationalist movements in Asia and the Middle East. I do not believe that Egypt is nearly so important to Russia as Germany, but if Moscow could convince the Allies that it might give way in the Middle and Far East in return for the abandonment of German rearmament, it might cause a split between the French and the Anglo-Americans."

"Then you believe that the danger of a violent Russian reaction to German rearmament has passed?"

"By no means. There will be constant danger of it, in my opinion, for the next few months."

The Malthusian Scarecrow

JOSUE DE CASTRO

AFTER a lapse of fifty years the Malthusian theory has again come into vogue. Malthus, it will be recalled, spent the greater part of his life gathering statistics to prove that while the world's population increased geometrically, the world's food supply increased arithmetically. The inference, of course, was that a point would be reached at which the population could no longer be fed. Periodically the Malthusian theory has enjoyed a wide appeal; its popularity today is merely the latest of a number of similar resurrections. Are we really incapable of producing the food we need? The neo-Malthusians say "yes," but are they right?

Malthus was the victim of a basic mistake, for he took as his starting point the rate of population growth in the United States at the end of the eighteenth century, when political and economic conditions placed a premium on large families. During the next century his theory was partly borne out by the facts, but by 1900 the net reproduction rate had fallen so sharply in Western Europe that its validity was questioned. And the rate has continued to fall during the past fifty years. According to figures released by the National Resources Committee in 1941, the net reproduction rate for Sweden was then only .84, which means that the number of births was more than offset by the number of deaths. In 1939 the rate for France was down to 0.9, for Germany (1938) to 0.99, and for the United States to 1.01. More recent figures are not available, but once the post-war "boom" in babies has subsided there is every reason to believe that the net reproduction rate will continue to fall in Western Europe and in this country. In the Far East the facts bear out Malthus's theory somewhat better, but whether the rate of population growth will continue to increase there seems, in the light of European experience, rather doubtful. Even if we concede Malthus's theory of population increase, his views on the world's food supply are clearly erroneous.

Contrary to Malthus's prediction, food production can undoubtedly keep pace with a rising birth rate. At the present time only about 10 per cent of the earth's arable land is being cultivated, and the yield of most of this could be doubled by the scientific use of new machinery, fertilizers, planting techniques, insecticides, and hybrids. The World Food Survey conducted by the U. N. reported not long ago that with modern methods India could increase its production of wheat as much as 50 per cent. If only 20 per cent of the uncultivated arable land in Africa and South America were plowed and planted, we should have nine billion more acres producing food. A hundred million more acres could be farmed in Oceania. Development of 10 per cent of the arable land in Russia and Canada now untilled would mean an additional three billion acres.

The population of the world increases by 1 per cent every year, but improvements in farming alone have raised the output of food $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent a year. The United States Bureau of Agricultural Economics has reported that during the five-year period 1941-46 the American farmer "produced enough food each year to feed 50,000,000 more people than could have been fed at comparable dietary levels during the last five years of the 1930's." And this increase, the bureau says, was achieved with 10 per cent fewer men in the fields, most of it being due to new fertilizers and insecticides and the development of new types of seed and livestock.

Increasing the acreage under cultivation and the output per acre are only two means of increasing the food supply. Many sources of food have not yet been exploited. The sea produces vegetables, such as placto, which have high nutritional value. Chroella, an alga which can be grown commercially in tanks and fed with minerals, is rich in proteins. A single installation could raise enough of it to supply the proteins needed by three million people and the fats for one and a half million. This would be roughly equivalent to the production of 150,000 acres of good arable land. New plants rich in mineral content, such as the broelizceas (Broelia laciniacea mart) of Brazil, which contain fifteen times as much calcium as milk does, are being studied for commercial planting. Besides these new natural sources, science is every day discovering ways to manufacture nutrients. An experimental factory in Jamaica is already producing synthetic foodstuffs, and similar projects are being set up in other countries. In the 1930's German factories turned out tons of synthetic fats.

DESPITE these known facts the Malthusian theory still has supporters. As theories have often done, it survives the facts which contradict it because it can be used to rationalize various interests and situations. During the nineteenth century, for example, the Malthusian theory was used to justify starvation wages. If wages were raised above subsistence levels, it was argued, the birth rate would rise, and eventually there would be "overpopulation" and famine. Just recently William Vogt, a prominent neo-Malthusian, author of "Road to Survival," asserted that starvation in China and elsewhere was "desirable" from the point of view of keeping population and food supply in balance. In one form or another this view is today widely held in the West.

Leaving aside the question of "desirability," there are two reasons why starvation does not solve the problem of a rising birth rate. In the first place, cutting the population down to meet the size of the available food supply is about as logical as tailoring the man to fit the suit. The second, more important, reason is that starvation does not reduce population growth. Contrary to popular belief, starvation actually causes overpopulation instead of being caused by it. Paradoxical as it may seem, if we were to feed the hungry in India and other places, the birth rates in those nations would begin to drop. China, India, Egypt, and the Latin American countries, with the lowest nutritional levels in the world, have the highest rates of population growth. In contrast, the populations of countries which boast a high standard of living are declining because the birth rate is falling.

Although starvation reduces the sex drive, people who are subject to persistent malnutrition are sexually stimulated. The psychological effect of chronic hunger is to increase the importance of sex in compensation for the loss of nutritional appetite. The high fertility index of undernourished persons has a physical cause. Enough is known about protein metabolism today to enable us to trace the actual process by which protein deficiency leads to increased fertility. Fecundation in women is closely related to the amount of estrogen produced in the system. Now since the liver controls the amount of estrogen which is put into the blood stream, anything that impairs the natural functioning of the liver will affect fertility. Protein deficiencies lead to cirrhosis and fatty degeneration of the liver, which in turn cause the release of more estrogen and an increase in reproductive capacity. Sexual appetite, a determinant of fertility, also depends on the amount of estrogen in the system.

A comparison of the rates of population growth in Japan before and after the last war confirms the belief that starvation is one of the main causes of increased reproduction. At the end of the war the average ration for the civilian population in Japan was only about 1,000 calories a day. (The Medical Division of the Bombing Survey reveals that in Kyoto, which had not been bombed, the adult population had lost an average of ten pounds per person, while 65 per cent of the total population had lost about twenty pounds each.) Two years after the beginning of the Allied occupation the daily ration had been increased only to 1,240 calories a day, still almost a thousand calories short of the required minimum. And yet from 1945 to 1949 the increase of births over deaths was 5,100,000—an increase without precedent in the demographic history of Japan. This fact alone refutes the neo-Malthusians, who view starvation as the answer to the "threat" of overpopulation.

The empty sleeve of the Malthusian scarecrow has flapped in the winds of prejudice for a century and a half, but science and history have finally shown that no one need take it seriously.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Documentary of Evil

SPARK OF LIFE. By Erich Maria Remarque. Translated from the German by James Stern. Appleton-Century-Crofts. $3.75.

ERICH MARIA REMARQUE'S new novel represents another instalment in the payment of his membership dues in the human race. It is an utterly uncompromising and courageous book, the more so because its subject matter is such that it cannot be transferred to the screen, as were "All Quiet on the Western Front" and "Arch of Triumph"; nor is it calculated to win a wider reading public for Mr. Remarque, since despite its idealism "Spark of Life" is one of the most brutal books of our time.

It is an unsparing account of life and death in an imaginary German concentration camp in the spring of 1945. Every act of physical hideousness of which human beings, alone among the animal kingdom, have been proved capable during the past two decades is recounted in revolting detail by Mr. Remarque, who seems to have been driven by a fury to set down all of the facts which it is to be hoped future generations will find difficult to believe.

The scene is a "mild" camp (without crematorium) nestled in the hills above a picturesque German town. While the inmates are being beaten, clubbed, starved, tortured, and shot, Allied artillery rumbles beyond the horizon like the distant voice of doom for the unheeding Nazis. Finally the bombers come, the town is destroyed, and the German dead lay heaped beside their victims as the liberators arrive.

The suspense in the story hangs on which of the camp "veterans" who, as free men will, have banded together for mutual protection will be able to hold out until the collapse of their tormentors. One by one they go, until only Prisoner 509, a ten-year man, and his immediate group are left to fan the feeble spark of life in their bony breasts. We are reminded that it was those whose lives had purpose and direction, the religious Jews, the Catholics, the liberal idealists like 509, and the Communists, who were best fitted to outlast the camp commandants. (We are further reminded that the Communist prisoners themselves were opposed to the camps, not in principle, but only because they felt that the wrong people were running them; it is one of the implied purposes of the book to warn that humanity is continuously engaged in a running battle against totalitarian tyranny that did not end with the dissolution of the Nazi terror apparatus.)

There are shades of good among the prisoners, ranging from pathetic attempts at fellowship to deeds of pure heroism, but Mr. Remarque's conception of evil is narrow and obvious, unrelieved by serious probing into the inner mental workings or the pathology of the bestialized Nazis. We know that there were men like Camp Commandant Neubauer, the rotten and soulless petit-bourgeois opportunist, and Breuer, the textbook sadist, but we do not learn from Mr. Remarque why they existed or what made them as they were. He comes down heavily upon the sickening irony of the Neubauers cultivating their flower gardens on the margins of the torture centers—but this we knew already, and the dark inner reality of evil he does not illuminate beyond a documentary enumeration of its physical apparatus.

It is Mr. Remarque's basic article of faith that there are always men who are truly human, in the face of the most unspeakable degradation, and that nothing can extinguish the spark of humanity that is passed from generation to generation. What is more horrifying about his novel than the descriptions of moral purulence and physical violence, however, is that it is a failure: his faith is coldly contradicted by the facts of the case as he himself presents them. For Prisoner 509's survival until the verge of liberation is in the last analysis due not to his unquenchable humanity—except in isolated dramatic instances—but only to sheer blind luck; he and all of the other veterans could have been exterminated—and if the war had lasted for several more months, would surely have been—at the pleasure of the monsters who ran the state.

Since life would be intolerable if we did not share, to one degree or another, Mr. Remarque's faith, it must be concluded that it is not that faith which is faulty in this shattering book but only the artistry with which it is at once expressed and negated.

Israel's Problems

ISRAEL: THE BEGINNING AND TOMORROW. By Hal Lehrman. William Sloane Associates. $3.75.

ETERNAL STRANGER. By Lawrence Resner. Doubleday and Company. $3.

MR. LEHRMAN'S survey of contemporary Israel is in several respects first-rate as well as first-hand reporting. His book is lively, tart, and eminently readable. He analyzes the major problems besetting the new state, such as party conflicts, church versus state, the Arab dilemma, and so on, in a workman-like fashion, shrewd and informative. In his discussions, he painstakingly presents contending points of view and ostensibly offers the reader the luxury of making up his own mind. The blurb on the jacket characterizes the book as "impartial," and Mr. Lehrman states his credo in a sentence which recurs with variations throughout the study: "The truth, as usual, lay in between."

This elaborate and hypothetical impartiality constitutes the book's weakness rather than its virtue. The "truth" rarely locates itself so conveniently in the middle or on the fence; and though much may be said on both sides, the mere process of equating arguments of opposing factions is a form of judgment. Where claims are mutually exclusive, by placing both on the scales of equal worth the analyst has not escaped the responsibility of weighing their respective merits. More likely, by this equipoise he may have dignified falsehood or error.

For instance, in a chapter impartially entitled Histadrut: Benefactor or Bully, Mr. Lehrman discusses cooperative versus private enterprise in Israel and the role of organized labor. He studiously presents the arguments pro and con and concludes: "Now it is not necessary for this reporter to make a categorical judgment on the merits of the Histadrut case. Our problem here is to expose to general public attention a basic problem hitherto treated gingerly or overlooked entirely in objective American public discussion. Sooner or later that problem had to be soberly confronted for Israel to become a flourishing market for private foreign investment." Of course, categorically or diplomatically, the author has pronounced judgment, and only the most naive of readers will fail to note that if cooperative enterprise comes off second best in the encounter, Mr. Lehrman's marshaling of the evidence has considerably contributed to the defeat.

The charges against the Socialist Mapai and organized labor (Histadrut) exhaustively reported by Mr. Lehrman are the usual ones of "statism," "dictatorship," "incompetence," always leveled by ideological opponents and drearily familiar to all who recall the barrage against the New Deal or the British Labor government. In Israel social planning is even less utopian and more of a sober necessity than elsewhere. If Solel Boneh, the building cooperative, gets preferential treatment in the allocation of scarce materials, it is because Solel Boneh is ready to construct roads or lay pipe lines in dangerous and financially unrewarding circumstances. If Solel Boneh is willing to construct a road in the Negev while Mr. Blank wants to erect a fancy, though highly profitable, restaurant in Tel Aviv, Solel Boneh will get the cement. Similarly, in view of the dollar shortage, hard currency will first be allocated for undertakings which are essential to the country's development and the population's welfare.

No one appreciates the need for encouraging the flow of private investment better than the Mapai leadership from Ben-Gurion down. Special inducements are being offered to private capital. Mapai has no doctrinaire commitment to any one economic formula. But the lures offered the private investor cannot be gauged solely by his appetite. The price exacted by untrammelled private enterprise may be too high in terms of the country's primary interests. As one surveys Israel's history, one is forced to the conclusion that the diffidence of private capitalists is due not to the power of the labor movement, as Mr. Lehrman suggests, but rather the reverse. The strength of the pioneer cooperative sector, since the beginnings of Zionist colonization, has stemmed from the lack of idealism on the part of the private investors. The characterization of "private" and "national" capital applies to goals as well as sources.

Mr. Lehrman's accounts of favoritism, government inefficiency, and bureaucracy, though exaggerated, have their basis in fact. Israel suffers from inexperience and human failure under excessive pressure. But these difficulties are superficial. In time the machinery of government will function more smoothly. A more fundamental question raised by Mr. Lehrman's survey is whether this government will continue to be led by Labor or whether the growing threat from the right, spearheaded by the General Zionists, will materialize.

One of the more intriguing aspects of Israel is the variety and size of the immigrant influx. The demographic character of the state is changing rapidly. Already the majority of the new immigrants are Oriental Jews, strange in speech, customs, and background to the Western Jews who till recently had been the dominant element. In "The Eternal Stranger" Mr. Resner describes the desperate plight of the Jewish communities of North Africa and Asia Minor. His account of the Neo-Destour movement in Tunisia and of rising Arab nationalism in North Africa as well as the Middle East is particularly pertinent. He offers grim evidence for the bitter words of a Moroccan Jew: "No Jew feels at home in a Moslem country."

Mr. Resner's circumstantial if pedestrian picture of the sufferings of Jewish communities from Bagdad to Casablanca amply explains their flight to Israel. It also indicates how vast and complex are the problems of cultural fusion as well as economic assimilation which the young state has bravely undertaken.

Myths and Fairy Tales

THE FORGOTTEN LANGUAGE. An

Introduction to the Understanding of Dreams, Fairytales and Myths. By Erich Fromm. Rinehart and Company. $3.50.

IN HIS new book Erich Fromm tries to reintroduce dream interpretation as a basic human value. This art held a prominent and cherished place in all early civilizations but had entirely disappeared from public interest at the time that Freud discovered its application to psychoanalysis. As a result of his work, dream interpretation was revived at least in professional circles, especially among psychiatrists. Unfortunately, however, it was effectively prevented from spreading further into society, since the final result of Freud's theorizings was to render dreams morally and socially abhorrent. They were in Freud's own words "a pathological product," and their complex, baffling shapes were created to shield from our sense of decency their incestuous content and wholly lawless attitude.

Although Fromm accepts the prevalence in dreams of forbidden impulses, he takes a position essentially the reverse of Freud's. He claims that dreams reveal, along with our worst traits, profounder perceptions and nobler feelings than we are capable of even during our waking life, where the influences surrounding us inhibit our sincerity and close off spontaneous reaction. Dreams contain "important communications from ourselves to ourselves." They admonish us when we turn away from our true natures, and they advise us, instruct us, as to how we may preserve our happiness and moral well-being. Dreams, moreover, embody each change that we as individuals undergo, and to the skilled interpreter they point the direction in which our maturing psyche wishes to take us. Fromm quotes these beautiful words from the Talmud: "A dream which is not understood is like a letter which is not opened."

It becomes Fromm's difficult task to justify his own positive approach to dreams and to demonstrate that Freud's approach was primarily false. To accomplish this, he utilizes his own experience as a therapist (this case material is particularly impressive), a number of theoretical reformulations of standard Freudian principles, and his own special conception of symbolic language. His argument may be said to rest upon these two principles:

First, that the unconscious Freud describes, which supposedly supplies the psychic energy for the dream and determines its real meaning, does not exist. The unconscious is not a separate, localized compartment of the mind. It is more natural and believable to assume that in sleep our waking, conscious mind continues its thought processes in an altered form. We are biologically at rest, and the unconscious amounts to nothing more than the mental consequence of this change. The new content of our mind—the dream meanings—is in reality the content that we ignore or dissociate by day. This content belongs to our adult personality; it is not, as Freud maintains, a mass of infantile strivings unrelated to ourselves as adults and normally banished to the unconscious. The significance of this reformulation is that it permits dreams to reflect every possible variety of impulse, good or bad, wise or foolish. For our own mind, that part of our thinking controlled and manipulated by ourselves, creates the dream—not our unconscious.

Second, Fromm develops the proposition that symbolic language, as it appears in dreams and many literary forms, is an authentic and purposeful means of communication. He is convinced that dream symbols are designed entirely to convey information, not to conceal or mislead. To Freud the dream was a lavish masquerade party, and chiefly because of the guests' devilish cunning the sleeping mind never suspected their real identity. Fromm believes that the revelers at the party are what they appear to be. In symbolic language—the language of our dreams—we synthesize and transmute the materials of reality so as to body forth psychic impulses that could find no other form of expression. Symbolic language by its nature overthrows all the ordinary laws of logic; "not space and time are the ruling categories but intensity and association." The masquerade party is a carefully and magnificently constructed representation of our thoughts during sleep.

Of special importance to Fromm are "universal" symbols. Freud neglected these, Fromm claims, in his eagerness to track dream down to its source in childhood strivings. Characteristic of his error was to interpret a dream of nakedness as necessarily denoting an infantile wish for exhibitionism. Freud did not consider that nakedness may also be a symbol of the desire to be truthful and sincere, to show oneself in one's true colors. Through a knowledge of universal symbols Fromm believes that we are brought close to the sources of our humanity. These symbols, Fromm shows us, are produced by all people, irrespective of the era they belong to or the society in which they dwell. Interestingly enough, subjects who have never heard of Freud and who in their waking state make no sense of their dreams are found under hypnosis to interpret symbols as readily and perfectly as any psychoanalyst.

The individual chapters that compose "The Forgotten Language," especially the two dealing with the technique and history of dream interpretation, make excellent sense. But the relationship between chapters is often unclear, and there is a monstrous disproportion in emphasis. The technical details of the Freud-Fromm controversy are discussed, for the intended lay audience, to exhaustion, and there are several unnecessarily prolonged analyses of the myth (King Oedipus), fairytale (Little Red Ridinghood), Biblical narrative (Jonah and the whale), novel (Kafka's "The Trial"), and religious observance (the Sabbath). These last analyses are excerpted from previous works by Fromm, and have only a very indirect place here. No one can help appreciating the warm humanism that informs this book, just as it did "Escape from Freedom" and "Man for Himself." But a little misanthropic balance, order, and scientific caution would have been equally welcome.

Books in Brief

THE UNIVERSE: ITS ORIGIN, NATURE, AND DESTINY. By Laban Lacy Rice. Exposition Press. $2.50. Seventy-six pages have seldom been asked to cover as much ground as in this book by the former president of Cumberland University. Cosmological notions from those of the ancient Egyptians through Einstein, de Sitter, Eddington, et al. and down to the recent much-publicized theories of Hoyle are first surveyed. In the process abstruse concepts including relativity, space curvature, and the possible significance of the "cosmological constant" are tossed about in giddy profusion. Finally the author, rejecting both a supernatural beginning for the universe and the inevitability of its ultimate death through entropy, comes up with a speculation "in a sense beyond the purview of science." "Why not suppose that in some inexplicable manner space will integrate that dissipated energy and . . . use it catalytically to reactivate the 'dead' atoms?" Mr. Rice's wide reading and gift for popular exposition make it impossible to dismiss "The Universe" as a mere crank book.

DANCE TO THE PIPER. By Agnes de Mille. Little, Brown. $3.50. An ebullient autobiography by the choreographer of "Oklahoma!" that gives a lively picture of the difficulties, the disappointments, the iron discipline, and the incredible amount of hard and patient work that go into the making of a dancer.

THE PECULIAR WAR. By E. J. Kahn, Jr. Random House. $2.75. A collection of this top-flight reporter's New Yorker pieces on the Korean war. Kahn has a sure eye for the off-beat incident and the revealing anecdote, and his articles are still good reading.

PRISONERS ARE PEOPLE. By Kenyon J. Scudder. Doubleday. $3. The California Institution for Men at Chino was started in 1940 as an experimental prison to demonstrate the possibility of taking hand-picked prisoners from other California penitentiaries and putting them to work on a twenty-six-hundred-acre farm with a maximum of privileges and a minimum of restrictions. This book by the superintendent of Chino describes the theory and practice of the plan, and the excellent results that have been obtained. A useful volume for everyone interested in the rehabilitation of the criminal.

BLOODY PRECEDENT. By Fleur Cowles. Random House. $3. The associate editor of Quick and Look describes a rather interesting and fairly close parallel between the present dictator of Argentina and his wife, and an equally unscrupulous pair of predecessors a century ago. Included is a brief but intimate glimpse of Evita at home.

Drama

ANY old-timer will tell you that "smart comedies" are not as good as they used to be. Most new-timers will add that they never were, and a Noel Coward or Somerset Maugham revival usually tends to suggest that the new-timers are right. But S. N. Behrman's "Jane" (Coronet Theater) is a knock-down argument on the other side. Nothing like it is to be seen on Broadway; Mr. Behrman himself has not written anything else half so good in many years. And Mr. Behrman's best is very good indeed.

Way back in the thirties he was oppressed by the fear that ours was no time for comedy. With increasing seriousness he experimented with quasi-comedies on weighty themes, and when they did not quite jell he turned to translations and adaptations which, though sometimes pleasant enough, were a waste of his talents. Now he has returned to himself again and proved that there is always time for comedy as sparkling and as deft as "Jane."

The program acknowledges a suggestion from a story by Maugham about a rich frump from Liverpool who marries a young architect and becomes the rage of London society because the shattering directness of her speech appears mordant wit when the speaker is properly costumed and the surroundings are properly elegant. Now this sort of thing is much harder to bring off in a play than in a story, because it is easier to say that someone scintillated than it is to make him scintillate. Mr. Behrman boldly faces the difficulty, builds up to the moments when his Jane is to give a taste of her quality, and then, almost miraculously, she does it. His method is as rash as that of the joke teller who begins by announcing that you are going to die laughing at the funniest tale you ever heard in your life. But Jane does not let you down.

Some of the charm as well as the suavity of the production must be credited to Edna Best's warm playing of the leading role and to notable support from both Basil Rathbone as a skeptical writer strongly suggestive of Mr. Maugham and Howard St. John as the blustering newspaper peer set up for Jane to deflate. But the whole management of the play is just right, and I think that it will owe a good deal of the success it will probably enjoy to the fact that its tone is, in subtle ways, not so nearly identical as it may seem to be with that of the standard "smart comedy." "Jane" has a warmth, a geniality, a fundamental kindness and humanity which such plays generally—and deliberately—avoid. The difference is not explicit or overt like the one Mr. Behrman set up in plays like "Rain from Heaven," where the grim facts of a disordered world were permitted to invade the enchanted ground of a comedy drawing-room. "Jane" remains persistently concerned with nothing except the private lives of privileged persons, and the only reminders that this is not the 1938 when the action takes place are a few prophetically ironic references to the absurd fuss being made about such remote nonsense as the war in Ethiopia. But what used to be called the "brittle" tone is not quite so satisfactory to any of us as it used to be. Pure cynicism, egotism, and mere "brilliance" leave a slightly bad taste in the mouth. And Mr. Behrman has brought smart comedy up to date by endowing his heroine with a certain humanity which is subtly emphasized by the fact that most of his other characters are old-fashioned enough to lack it. "Jane" is smart but not merely "brittle." And that I suspect is why it will be better liked than one might have anticipated from any preliminary account. It is more up to date than it seems to be.

LOTTE LEHMANN's Parlophone records of German lieder (which Decca issued here in the thirties, and which I hope it will reissue on LP) and the records she made for Victor and Columbia up to 1941 or '42 document not only the unique gifts but the serious faults of those earlier years—not only the luscious voice but the constricted, shrill high notes resulting from defective technique; not only the emotional warmth that suffused the singing, but the explosive vehemence that often tore the phrase apart. Around 1943 the need of skill and care in the use of an aging but still remarkably beautiful voice began to be evident not only in unconstricted and agreeable high notes but in the refinement and subtilization of the singing, which now achieved expressive effect through inflection of the continuous line of the phrase. For two or three years her Town Hall concerts offered unforgettable experiences of this perfected art; then the programs began to include more and more of the songs that lent themselves to the increasing archness and cuteness in the performances to which her adoring public responded ecstatically, and the concerts began to include goings-on that needed a stronger stomach than mine. I therefore stopped going to them a few years ago; and thus it was that I missed the climax of this public love affair—the celebrated scene of renunciation and farewell at the recital of February 16, 1951. Thus it is also that the extraneous noises immortalized by the recently issued Pembroke recording of that occasion don't include the gritting of my teeth.

The two LP records (skillfully processed from the recording made with the equipment in Town Hall) will enable future generations to hear Lehmann make her intermission speech, hear her say at the end of the concert that she will try to sing Schubert's "An die Musik," and hear her, sure enough, fail to sing the last phrase. More important, future generations will be able to hear that at this last recital she sang a good program ending with a group of songs from Schubert's "Die schöne Müllerin," that her voice, after warming up in the opening Schumann group, was still amazingly lovely, and that in most of the songs she used it with beautiful art, but that there were a few exceptions: an excessively tumultuous performance of Wagner's "Träume," a vehement performance of Schubert's "Die liebe Farbe," and a concluding performance of his "Des Baches Wiegenlied" too slow in pace and with expansive retardations that destroyed the effect of the quiet steady movement of the song—the effect produced, for example, in Lehmann's wonderful performance in the old Columbia recording.

In the Schubert songs that Schlusnus sings on a London record his voice is still very fine and his performances are effective.

Many of Wolf's songs are, for me, only skilful underlining of the words that I don't find musically interesting; but among the songs on a Urania record are a few which are more than that: "Gesellenlied" and "Im Frühling," superbly sung by the tenor Roswänge; "Über Nacht" and "Gesang Weyla's," sung by Margarete Klose, whose rich contralto is shrill in part of the first song; "In der Frühe," "Kennst du das Land," and "Wie glänzt der helle Mond," sung by the soprano Annemarie Simon, whose voice is unpleasantly sharp and tremulous. The last song on each side is distorted; and there are noisy surface defects.

A number of fine songs by Purcell and Dowland are on a Period record sung by the baritone John Langstaff, who has a rather dry voice but uses it effectively in sustained phrasing which creates continuing life in the progression of music and words.

Recent books about ballet include "How to Enjoy Ballet" by the indefatigable and fatuous Arnold L. Haskell (Morrow, $3) and Dorothy Samachson's "Let's Meet the Ballet" (Schuman, $4), which is a little better but not a good book either in itself or for its purpose. What these books undertake to do for the general reader is done by Edwin Denby's "Looking at the Dance" when it begins with "When you watch ballet dancers dancing" and, as it continues, has the reader in effect seeing through Denby's eyes what the dancers do. And this—the essential for the reader's appreciation of ballet—he will not see through the eyes of Haskell or Mrs. Samachson, or with their factual information about what goes into the creation of a ballet, or with her interviews with Danilova and Lazovsky.

Two very poor books are William Chappell's "Fonteyn" (Macmillan, $4.50), which is largely about the author, with photographs by Cecil Beaton that are mostly perverse and irrelevant; and Robert Lawrence's "Victor Book of Ballets" (Simon and Schuster, $3.95), poor in its inclusion of ballets that nobody is likely to see again (e. g., "Namouna," "Thamar," "La Tragédie de Salome," "HP," "Les Cents Baisers") and omission of some now being performed (e. g., "The Four Temperaments," the ballets of Petit and Babilée), its comment on the ballets, its selection of photographs (e. g., a photograph of Babilée in his undiscussed and unidentified "Tyl Eulenspiegel" to illustrate the Nijinsky ballet; photographs of Zorina and Morosova in "Le Beau Danube," but not of Danilova).

Haskell turns up again as the writer of the text for "Baron at the Ballet" (Morrow, $10), a book of photographs taken in England and assembled for the English public, and therefore including many of English ballets and dancers that are of no interest to Americans. Moreover, there are fifteen pages of photographs of Petit's "Carmen," nine of his "Le Jeune Homme et la mort," and ample documentation of Tudor's "Pillar of Fire," "Romeo and Juliet," and other works; but the entire documentation of the Balanchine ballets performed in London in the last fifteen years or more is a meaningless leap by Alonso for "Waltz Academy" and an inaccurate pose by Marjorie Tallchief and Skibine for "Concerto Barocco." And the selection of photographs of dancers is similarly questionable. With all that there are of course a fair number of photographs of important ballets and great dancers. But this book and others like it make me want to see a collection of the superb ballet photographs of Fred Fehl.

Though Balanchine's "Apollo" and "The Fairy's Kiss" are not being presented by the New York City Ballet in its present season, his "Four Temperaments," "Card Game," "Concerto Barocco," "Sinfonie Concertante," "Symphony in C," and "Bourrée Fantastique" are still to be seen; and his new "Divertissement Classique" (to Mozart's Divertimento K.287) promises to be one of the most extraordinary things he has done.

Where Segregation Means Death

[The following examples of discriminatory practices in hospitals, sent to The Nation by the Southern Conference Educational Fund of New Orleans, prove that the case cited by Alex Gottfried in his article, Death by Jim Crow, which appears in this issue, is not an isolated incident but belongs to a pattern of segregation which is general in the South and which can also be traced in other parts of the country.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

ON August 27, 1950, three men were injured in an automobile accident in Hardinburg, Kentucky. They were taken to Breckinridge Hospital, where they were left lying on a bare floor for over three hours because the hospital had "no facilities for colored people." The only medicine given them was morphine; they received no other treatment. One of the victims, Leroy Foley, died at the hospital.

John H. Smith, who had a broken back, and Jesse Wallace were eventually moved to the Louisville General Hospital. Foley's family received a bill for the use of the Breckinridge Hospital floor on which he died.

In the winter of 1946 a colored woman in labor was refused admission to a church-sponsored hospital (Sibley) in Washington, D. C., when she could no longer continue on her way to the Gallinger General Hospital. Her baby was delivered on the sidewalk in front of the hospital.

On March 6, 1951, Mrs. Emma Dangerfield was brought to the Jefferson-Hillman Hospital in Birmingham, Alabama, in critical condition. Her Negro doctor, who was not allowed to practice at the hospital, had made arrangements with a white doctor to look after his patient. Both physicians understood there was a bed available for Mrs. Dangerfield. But when her husband tried to get her admitted he was told that he must make a $100 cash deposit before she could be considered. Although Mr. Dangerfield had $50 in cash with him, his wife was covered by insurance, and his employer promised to pay the other $50 the following morning, the hospital refused to admit Mrs. Dangerfield. After lying on a stretcher for over two hours, she was taken in an ambulance to her home, where she died an hour later. The hospital defended its action on the grounds that (1) "Jefferson-Hillman already has unpaid accounts on its books of more than $300,000, and it does not wish that sum to be enlarged if it can help it"; and (2) all the Negro beds were filled.

On February 15, 1951, the physician of a young Negro, Robert Hudson, tried to get his patient admitted to one of the three hospitals in Akron, Ohio. He was told that they were all filled but that he could put Hudson on a waiting list. While Hudson was waiting to be admitted to a hospital he lapsed into a coma; his mother called an ambulance, and he was taken to City Hospital, where she was told there was no room for him. He died early the following morning. A spokesman for the hospital claimed that there were no beds available. Actually there was one empty bed, but it was in a room occupied by a white man.

Commendation from Congressman King

Dear Sirs: It would be quite desirable if many commentators and writers of articles on this subject [the tax-evasion scandal] were as well informed as your Norman Redlich is in his article Internal Confusion in Internal Revenue, published in The Nation of January 19. For the limited space used, it covered the very involved and complicated subject in most excellent fashion.

Washington, D. C. CECIL R. KING,

Johnson's Stand Praised

Dear Sirs: Senator Edwin C. Johnson's article U. M. T.—Booby Trap, which appeared in your January 26 issue, is perhaps the most clear-cut, cogent argument against U. M. T. I have ever read. Both Senator Johnson and The Nation should be congratulated for attacking the supporters of U. M. T. on their own ground.

Senator Johnson's article is a telling refutation of the case for U. M. T. because he demonstrates the inability of such a system to achieve its stated goals and the grave possibility of losing through U. M. T. the very things for which we are fighting.

Prudential's Wealth

Dear Sirs: The article If Your Agent Doesn't Call [The Nation, December 22, 1951] overlooked several vital facts about the Prudential Life Insurance Company. Do you know, for instance, that Prudential has total assets of more than $9,000,000,000? or that 31,000,000 policy holders carry some $40,000,000,000 worth of insurance? or that Carol M. Shanks, president of Prudential, testified before a House committee that in 1949 his corporation took in an average of $3,000,000 a day of new premium money?

Out of its vast wealth Prudential offers its workers a $3.11 weekly increase. It's about time for insurance companies to equate their wage scales with other billion-dollar enterprises. In fact, it's about twenty years too late.

WE ACCUSE!

THE SHAMEFUL RECORD IN THE BRIDGES CASE

Harry Bridges, Australian-born president of the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, has been under attack since 1934.

Throughout the years of his leadership of Pacific coast waterfront workers, he has been the object of a campaign unparalleled in American history. Only the 22-year imprisonment of Tom Mooney lasted longer than the attempts to persecute, frame, deport and imprison Harry Bridges.

1934—The U. S. Dept. of Immigration sought to deport Bridges as an undesirable alien. This launched a campaign of surveillance, wiretapping, police investigations, and other methods to "get Bridges."

1939—When the Immigration Dept. brought charges to deport Bridges, Dean James Landis of the Harvard Law School, was named by President Roosevelt as a special hearing officer. Landis ordered the charges dropped.

1941—Congress amended Immigration Act to "constitutionally" deport Bridges. Judge Charles B. Sears, with long anti-labor record, named to reopen case and found Bridges "guilty." Board of Immigration Appeals, in unprecedented action, overruled Sears' judgment. But U. S. Attorney General Biddle upheld Sears by moving for deportation nevertheless. The case went to the courts.

1945—The U. S. Supreme Court found deportation action against Bridges "unlawful."

1945—Bridges applied for citizenship papers. Proudly became citizen.

1949—Bridges was brought to trial, in an atmosphere of hysteria, accused of "perjury" when applying for citizenship. Sentenced to 5 years in prison. J. R. Robertson, Henry Schmidt, fellow union leaders who were witnesses to naturalization, sentenced to 2-year terms. The case now is on appeal.

TODAY Harry Bridges faces a new threat to his freedom and—through him—to the wages and conditions of the working people he represents. Unity and cooperation of all organized labor—together with thousands of clergymen, teachers, professional people in all walks of life who are concerned with attacks on democratic rights—defeated the first frame-up attempt in 1937. Such unity aided the victorious decision of 1939 and helped win the historic Supreme Court decision in 1945 which enabled Bridges to obtain his citizenship.

Today the new "crime" for which Bridges stands accused is that of "perjury" when filing his application for citizenship in 1945. The claim is that Bridges lied when he denied Communist affiliations—despite a U. S. Supreme Court decision on this question.

Thus the frame-up pattern against Bridges—thrice repudiated by courts and examiners in the past 18 years—continues.

Climax of Long Persecution

Within the next few weeks, Bridges and his two associates—Robertson and Schmidt—face the climax of the fourth frame-up attempt. The Appellate Court of the 9th Circuit in San Francisco will hear oral arguments and make its decision. The bias of the prosecution is shown in many ways including its attempt to circumvent the statute of limitations.

Today—the Bridges case is a front-line in America in the defense of civil liberties. If Bridges goes to jail, the entire defense of American principles of dissent receives one of its most serious setbacks.

We Accuse Anti-labor Forces!

The Bridges-Robertson-Schmidt Defense Committee states that the attack on Bridges today is no different from the attacks on this labor leader in past years. We accuse the Dept. of Immigration, the Attorney General, corrupt politicians and anti-labor forces who have sought to destroy effective unionism of this conspiracy. We accuse enemies of American democracy of attacking—not only one man—but the democratic principles and living standards of American working people.

We appeal to all liberty-loving Americans: speak out against this fourth attempt to "get" Bridges. Please use the coupon below—TODAY!

"Bridges' own statement of his political beliefs and disbeliefs is important. It was given not only without reserve but vigorously as dogma and faiths of which the man was proud and which represented in his mind the aims of his existence."

—DEAN JAMES M. LANDIS
December 28, 1939.

"The most significant feature of the inquiry, as it seems to me, is the paucity of the evidentiary product as contrasted with the magnitude of the effort expended in producing it."

—JUDGE WILLIAM HEALY, 1944

"They revealed a militant advocacy of the cause of trade unionism. But they did not teach or advise the subversive demned by the statute."

—JUSTICE WILLIAM
June 18, 1945

"The record in this forever a monument to the tolerance of man. See the history of this record. It has been such a concerted crusade to deport as cause he dared to exercise freedom that belongs to being and that is guaranteed by the Constitution."

—JUSTICE FRANK
June 18, 1945

THE DEL VAYO CASE

WHEN J. Alvarez del Vayo, The Nation's foreign editor, and his wife returned from Europe on Friday, February 8, they were taken direct from the pier to Ellis Island. There they were held incomunicado until the following Monday evening. During their detention they were not permitted any communication with publisher or counsel. They were not advised of any charges against them, and when they were finally released, "on parole," they still had no idea of the cause of their detention.

Mr. del Vayo, who was Foreign Minister of Spain's last republican government, came to the United States in 1940 and three years later was granted permanent resident status. As foreign editor of The Nation and an accredited United Nations correspondent, he has visited Europe every year since 1945, writing on post-war developments, with full freedom of exit and reentry. When he arrived in New York last week, on the French liner Liberté, after covering the sessions of the General Assembly in Paris, both he and his wife carried validated reentry permits given them before they left the country in August.

The whole affair is incomprehensible. When the facts become known to us, we will report them fully to our readers. In the meantime it is a satisfaction to be able to record that during the Del Vayos' period of detention those who knew about it were quick to express their dismay and indignation.

The Shape of Things

NEITHER SIDE WANTS THE KOREAN TRUCE talks to collapse and full-dress war to begin. So the verbal duel goes on, long stretches of slow-motion wrangling punctuated by moments of hope when one team or the other concedes a point or when, to avoid total deadlock, the talks shift to some new item on the agenda. This past week the Communists offered slight concessions on the exchange of war prisoners and the repatriation of displaced civilians, though they stuck to their central, unacceptable demand that all prisoners, without regard to individual choice, be returned within two months after an armistice. But the chief attention of the negotiators was fixed on two more fundamental issues. The first was the Communists' proposal that one of the three "neutral" nations designated by them to supervise enforcement of a truce should be the Soviet Union. This was quickly sat upon by the U. N. representative, although the other two nations named by the Communists, Poland and Czechoslovakia, were accepted. But a more important question concerned the political conference to be held after the start of an armistice. Rejecting the Communist proposal that such a conference should deal with general Asian differences, the U. N. is insisting on an agenda strictly limited to a Korean settlement. As the week began, the Communists seemed likely to accept this view, only an ambiguous "et cetera" standing between their position and that of the U. N. But the obdurate fact behind all the talk is that a true peace in Korea, as the Communist claim, can be achieved only as part of a solution embracing other Asian problems, at a minimum the future of Formosa and relations with Peking. And this presupposes a general negotiated settlement between the United States and Russia. Toward this goal no perceptible progress has been made.

OUT OF THE SOUTH LAST WEEK CAME SOME good news mixed with tragic. In Fair Bluff, North Carolina, in an action which may presage a broader federal attack on the KKK, the FBI arrested ten klansmen for kidnaping and flogging a white couple. But in Ocala, Florida, Walter Lee Irvin, Negro, was sentenced to death for the second time by an all-white jury for alleged rape of a white woman. The United States Supreme Court had reversed the first conviction on the ground that the trial had been conducted against a background of violence and bloodshed. There was no violence during the Ocala proceedings, but from this distance there appears to have been little justice either. The state's case was powerfully attacked by a reputable criminologist who charged that the prosecution had fabricated plaster casts of footprints, a white witness who swore that the alleged rape victim had admitted to him that "because it was so dark" she could not identify her attackers, and defense counsel, who pointed out that no medical evidence was produced to show that rape had occurred. Doubts raised by these points might have been expected to give any jury pause; not so the Ocala jury, which returned its verdict in one hour and twenty-three minutes. Journalists on the spot have added a special twist to the case: they say that Florida authorities, uneasy because of the unfavorable publicity the state has been receiving on this and other cases, offered Irvin a life sentence if he would plead guilty. Irvin, it is said, heroically refused the offer. If this is so, here is another vindication of the stand taken by those who believe, like The Nation, that justice is everybody's business and not a community monopoly—whether the community be Ocala, Fair Bluff, or Cairo, Illinois. The "unfavorable publicity" which today leads racists to attempt to bargain with justice will, at long last, cause them to succumb to it.

WHEN WHITE RESIDENTS OF ALTAMONTE Springs, Florida, found their voting majority threatened by Negro residents, they got rid of the threat by ruling the Negroes "out of town" (The Nation, December 15, 1951). Atlanta, Georgia, a bigger and more sophisticated community has chosen not to rule Negroes out but to rule more whites in. Acting on a master-plan for "municipal improvements" approved by the Talmadge-controlled legislature, the city proclaimed last New Year's Day as "Greater Atlanta Day," establishing new municipal boundaries which include eighty-two additional square miles of territory. This "jimcrowmandering" increased the percentage of the city's white population from 67 to 72 and—what is more significant—boosted the ratio of white voters to Negro voters from two to one, to three to one. But there is evidence to show that the creation of Greater Atlanta also represents a forward step in municipal government, including the elimination of considerable patronage, a more efficient school system, and other items. It is heartening to reflect that, long after the prejudices which created it have been wiped out, the better school system will still be there, serving tomorrow's young generation of Atlantans without discrimination.

AS THE WEEK BEGAN, IT SEEMED CERTAIN that the government of Edgar Faure would win the support of the French National Assembly, enabling it to participate in the Lisbon conference of NATO which opened on Wednesday. But in order to obtain the votes of the Socialists, without which its fall was assured, the government made important modifications in the resolution pledging French support for a European army including twelve German divisions. Last week-end the Americans and British went a long way to meet the most important condition put forward by the French: West Germany, they agreed, would not be admitted to NATO "for the time being." The debate in Paris showed that the deeply rooted French mistrust of Germany had grown stronger as a result of the stridency with which Bonn has recently been stating its conditions. Deputies of all parties voiced the fear that a rearmed Germany would come to dominate Western Europe and might eventually drag it into a war of revenge against the East. In an attempt to allay such fears the modified resolution coupled a promise of equal treatment for West Germany with a declaration that this could not include admission to NATO, which in view of its "exclusively defensive character should only include states which have no interest in territorial demands." In addition, the resolution requested American and British guaranties against the risk that West Germany would pull out of the European army once it was reestablished as a military power. Clearly the gap between French conditions for participation in a European army and those of Bonn—summarized in these columns last week—is a wide one. Possibly the Lisbon conference will find means of bridging it, but at present the ancient rivalry between the two countries appears to be a more potent factor than their common fear of Russia. *

WHILE THE ATTENTION OF THE WORLD HAS been riveted on the German rearmament problem, the financial situation of France has been daily growing more critical. The steady fall of the franc in the black market—it touched 467 to the dollar last week compared with an official rate of 350—shows that speculators are expecting a new devaluation. With the adverse trade balance mounting month by month, foreign-exchange reserves have been reduced almost to zero. Now the government has announced sharp cuts in imports together with a plan to subsidize exports. But these are measures which will not become fully effective for some months and then only if action is taken to reduce the internal inflation which has pushed French prices far above those of competing countries. This requires in the first place heavier taxes. M. Faure, who is Finance Minister as well as Premier, is asking for new levies totaling 182 billion francs. Since a more modest request led to the downfall of the previous French government, his chances of survival must be rated as poor. *

PRESS PHOTOGRAPHERS AND REPORTERS were barred from accompanying Senator Taft on his recent tour of a paper mill in Wisconsin Rapids. Since his successful 1950 campaign in Ohio, Taft has placed great stress on the importance of plant meetings. But during a recent visit to Janesville, he was greeted by cat-calls in a Chevrolet plant, and two workers refused to shake hands with him. Another worker was fined $25 for "disorderly conduct" while asking a question about the Taft-Hartley act. At Wisconsin Rapids reporters were told to "see Henry Baldwin" when they objected to being turned back at the gates. Mr. Baldwin turned out to be the Republican County Chairman as well as coordinator of plants and processes for the Consolidated Water Power and Paper Company, owner of the plant which Senator Taft was visiting. Asked for an explanation of the ban on the press, Mr. Baldwin said: "Our policy is that politics stops at the gates." Asked why under such a policy Taft was permitted to speak in the plant, Baldwin replied that the Senator was visiting as "a statesman rather than a politician." We hope Senator Taft continues to have plant officials, who are his local political henchmen, turn out the employees as "captive audiences." The more workers forced to listen to him under these circumstances, the fewer votes he is likely to receive. Even so, it seems pretty harsh treatment for the workers: what ever happened to that lost freedom—the freedom not to listen? *

WHEN GOVERNOR DAN THORNTON OF Colorado approved the continuance of a Survey Committee on Migrant Labor early last year, he was not troubled by any intimations of future embarrassment. But when the committee recently submitted its findings, the Governor took noisy exception to one part—condensed into a booklet entitled "Colorado Tale"—which painted a rather dark picture of the conditions of migratory labor. "It's bad publicity," he said. The committee took the hint, and distribution of the booklet was not pushed. The sequel was interesting. Under the law Colorado's General Assembly in even-numbered years can consider only appropriations and legislation specifically recommended by the Governor. Last week Governor Thornton presented a thirteen-point program to the legislature which omitted mention of migrant labor. Evidently the powerful sugar-beet industry, which employs most of the state's migratory workers, has lost little of its influence at the state capitol in Denver. *

THE IRAQI PARLIAMENT HAS RATIFIED A new agreement with the Iraq Petroleum Company—which comprises British, French, Dutch, and American interests—providing for a fifty-fifty split in profits between company and government. With this point settled, the company proposes by 1955 to raise output five-fold as compared with 1950 and to increase the capacity of its pipe lines to the Lebanon coast of the Mediterranean from just over 100,000 to 500,000 barrels a day. Meanwhile an expert commission sent out by the World Bank has recommended the adoption by Iraq of a five-year economic-development plan requiring an investment of $470,000,000. The heart of this plan is the construction of irrigation works to make possible the cultivation of large areas of rich soil on which landless peasants could be settled. The mission also proposes important industrial developments, including a big chemical plant in the Kirkuk oilfield which would use natural gas and local gypsum as its chief raw materials. On paper this plan, which can be financed wholly from prospective oil royalties, appears well designed to give the country a start toward the productivity its natural resources warrant and toward raising the dismally low living standards of its masses. But many obstacles lie between the blueprint and its realization. The United Nations could perhaps provide the technicians required, but they would have a heartbreaking task combating the inertia, inefficiency, and corruption of the Iraqi bureaucracy. An even more serious difficulty might be sabotage by the large landowners, who would not welcome a scheme that offered their exploited laborers and sharecroppers a chance of escaping to the new farms and factories.

THE SUCCESS OF IRAQ IN OBTAINING AN equal profit-sharing agreement, like that of the Sheik of Kuwait, may owe something to the intransigence of the Iranian government, although the pattern was set over a year ago when Aramco acceded to Ibn Saud's demands for a revision of its contract on similar lines. But whether or not these and other Arab governments have reason to be grateful to Premier Mossadegh, they now have no particular interest in seeing him win his battle. The fact is that since last June increased production in Kuwait, Iraq, Saudi Arabia, and some smaller fields has completely filled the gap in world supplies that opened when Iranian oil ceased to flow. Thus if the World Bank were successful in its present efforts to persuade Mossadegh to accept a workable compromise, and Iranian oil again became available, there would be a threat of overproduction which would make things awkward for other Arab countries and the oil companies operating in them. Any reduction in output which led to a considerable fall in oil revenues would create political reactions; on the other hand, oil storage facilities are limited, and a large surplus exported from the Middle East would upset markets elsewhere. The oil companies might, of course, cut prices which are based on United States Gulf Coast quotations, with a view to creating new demands. They could easily afford to do so, since production costs in the Middle East are much lower than in Texas or Louisiana. And undoubtedly cheaper oil would do a great deal to accelerate the economic development of Asia. Nevertheless, there will be tremendous resistance to the adoption of this solution of the problem, for it would require revision of a world price structure that the great international combines have long and profitably maintained. For all these reasons, the demands of conflicting national and economic interests seem likely, in the months ahead, to outweigh the ideals of Moslem solidarity.

Eisenhower As Symbol

SINCE the appearance of General Eisenhower's Paris statement of January 7, the public has been provided with several summaries of his views on matters foreign and domestic. We believe these summaries are sufficient to reveal the political nature of the man behind the uniform. To be sure, the General has spoken in meaningless generalities on many important questions and on others he has remained silent. But he has said enough to give a fairly consistent impression of his opinions and his approach.

As to Eisenhower's general political views, we concur with Joseph C. Harsch of the Christian Science Monitor, who wrote on November 26 last that they are "to the right of center—perhaps even farther right than those of Senator Robert A. Taft. . . . The sum total would seem to be that while General Eisenhower's foreign policies amount to a much more eloquent and persuasive version of the Truman policies, his domestic thinking is harmonious with that of Senator Taft." On domestic issues the difference between Taft and Eisenhower seems to be principally in the quality of their thinking. Senator Taft is a convinced reactionary; General Eisenhower, on the other hand, seems to have improvised himself into one. On most issues his aim apparently has been to adopt the position least likely to arouse controversy and opposition. Senator Taft is reactionary by conviction; General Eisenhower is reactionary out of expediency—and few American public figures have been more skilful in avoiding criticism.

Although the General's entire career has been spent in the oldest, most extravagant, and most inflexible of bureaucracies, he nevertheless regards "bureaucracy" and "raids on the Treasury" as more dangerous to American security than any external threat. He is opposed to federal aid to education and has defined a liberal as "a man in Washington who wants to play the Almighty with your money." He believes it is impossible to have a democracy without free enterprise. He regards the profit motive as sacrosanct. He is afraid the people might be lured into a dictatorship through hand-outs. He has scoffed at cradle-to-the-grave social security; in fact he regards the craving for security as degenerate. If all that Americans want is security, he has said, "they can go to prison." In this connection it is interesting to recall that while Eisenhower has spoken with scorn of the "cloying effect of subsidy," his entire career has been spent in a service which provides complete economic security at public expense.

The puzzle about Eisenhower is how, holding these views, he can be such a genuinely popular national figure. The answer would seem to be that he has become a kind of "dream image" of what the average American likes and admires. He is sociable; he is modest; he is informal in manner; his words have a warm, "inspirational" quality; he likes people and wants them to like him; he has a friendly, outgoing personality; and he is pleasantly naive—even his admirers refer to his political views as being sometimes "immature" and "uncomplicated."

His most striking personal characteristic seems to be his ability to "get along" with all kinds of people—even at a price which some might regard as too high. On this score, the General's testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee on April 2, 1948, was most revealing. He began by saying that "there is race prejudice in this country" which creates "social problems on a post," particularly "if you have a dance for your soldiers." Besides, if Negroes were to be integrated throughout the services rather than kept in separate platoons, which he approved, competition would relegate them to the menial positions because they would not be as well educated as other groups. Such problems, in his view, could not be solved "merely by passing a lot of laws to force someone to like someone else." When Senator Richard Russell proceeded to cite misleading statistics about the Negro crime rate and the incidence of venereal disease among Negro troops, the General sat silent and attentive. Only at the close of the hearing, and then only in the mildest way, did he voice some disagreement, and he managed to do this in a way that won Senator Russell's "complete" consent.

The danger is not that in electing General Eisenhower to the Presidency the people might be buying "a pig in a poke" but rather that he is so perfect a symbol of the country's collective political fantasies that he might easily sweep with him into office a bevy of Senators and Representatives who would give us the most reactionary Congress in decades. Franklin D. Roosevelt was another dynamic symbol, but Roosevelt was at all times fully aware that he could unite only those elements that had certain common interests; he never sought an all-embracing unity. The "unity" for which Eisenhower appeals is spurious because it ignores the conflicts inherent in contemporary politics, because he belongs to the right and if elected will inevitably be the right's President. As the symbol of a spurious unity he could easily be used to commit us to ends that no evil-purposed Machiavelli in the White House could ever sell us. The question, then, is whether we want "dynamic" leadership of the charismatic variety or leadership based on democratic understanding.

Communists in Unions

BY WILLARD SHELTON

Washington, February 14

A SENATE labor subcommittee headed by Senator Humphrey of Minnesota is opening hearings next week on the problem of Communists in labor unions. The committee's approach has been the exact opposite to McCarthyism. Its staff members have sought information and advice from union leaders, defense officials, management spokesmen, civil-liberties champions, and others as to whether or not Communist control of certain unions is a major security threat and, if it is, what can be done about it. The public hearings are intended to furnish light, not heat, and the subcommittee is in the hands of liberals.

No honest person can deny that a number of unions in strategic industries are still under pro-Communist leadership, though the C. I. O. expelled unions which allegedly followed the Communist Party line and chartered new unions to compete with them for members. The new C. I. O. International Union of Electrical and Radio Workers has captured most of the membership of the departed United Electrical Workers, but not all. In secret balloting under NLRB processes the U. E. has held the workers in key Westinghouse and General Electric plants. Communists still occupy high positions in unions of miners, maritime workers, and workers on secret defense projects.

Any outside attempt to purge unions of Communist leadership must be at the cost of civil rights and democratic union procedures. It cannot be assumed that this cost would necessarily be balanced by a corresponding gain to national security. But even from the point of view of those who do assume this, the non-Communist-affidavit provisions of the Taft-Hartley law have been worse than useless. Suspected Communists simply file affidavits of non-membership and keep on running their unions. The Department of Justice has not been able to bring successful perjury indictments against suspected Communist union leaders.

Undeniably a problem exists. In the event of war with the Soviet Union, individual Communists in defense industries can be expected to commit sabotage. They may even now be guilty of espionage. The question is how to deal with the danger. The recommendations forwarded to the Humphrey subcommittee in response to its inquiries are of three general kinds. William Green of the A. F. of L. and Philip Murray of the C. I. O. oppose special legislation. The problem, in the opinion of these top union officials, can be handled by tightened security regulations, the repeal of Taft-Hartley restrictions, and self-cleansing processes within the union.

Other informed persons agree that there should be no broad substantive anti-Communist legislation but believe that administrative procedures should be altered so as to deny bargaining rights to Communist-led unions in defense industries. The Atomic Energy Commission has already refused contracts to employers that bargained with the U. E. and the old United Public Workers. Its action was not wholly arbitrary, for it offered the unions a hearing. Benjamin Signal, counsel for the U. E., has made the interesting suggestion that tripartite boards be created, on which labor, management, and the public would be represented, and that these boards be empowered to hold hearings and make findings. If a union were found to be Communist-controlled, procurement agencies would be instructed not to issue contracts to employers on defense projects who bargained with it.

A third group maintains that legislation is needed to deprive all Communist-dominated unions of bargaining rights. Such unions would be treated as if they were company unions: to bargain with them, even though they were chosen by a majority of workers in a plant, would be an unfair labor practice.

The Humphrey subcommittee has already proved its usefulness. By taking the initiative it has assured that decisions about Communist-controlled unions will not be left, by default, to crackpots and reactionaries. It is approaching the problem carefully and apparently without preconceived notions. For a democracy to study whether its security is jeopardized by Communist leadership of key unions and what, within the limits of our Constitution, should be done for self-protection is not "red-baiting." We have recently been warned, however, that measures designed to safeguard individual rights may be distorted and turned into instruments of oppression. When President Truman set up his loyalty-security program in 1947, it was considered better for him to authorize a minimum program than for the Eightieth Congress to pass more drastic legislation. But the Truman program itself became steadily more severe, though it still did not satisfy the fanatics and fear-mongers.

The presence of Communists in trade unions gives rise to two separate problems. The first is that of Communist-control of the union. Presumably, the danger here is that Communist leaders might precipitate strikes and general labor unrest for political reasons. En passant, it might be pointed out that Communist labor leaders are not the only ones who have precipitated such strikes in the past. But in any case is it right, merely in anticipation of such danger, arbitrarily to discriminate against men who may have been democratically elected to positions of leadership?

The second problem is that of the ordinary union man who is a Communist. Actually, such a worker could well be in a position to do more harm than a union president; a lathe offers more opportunities for sabotage than a desk. Yet no liberal could support the thesis that colonies have increased steadily since the end of the war. They were £445,000,000 at the end of 1945 and £908,000,000 at the end of June, 1951. This is the only group of territories whose balance increases all the time. The balances of the dominions and of non-sterling-area countries fluctuate, on the whole in a downward direction; only the colonies have invested more every year in Britain."

In 1951 Malaya was permitted to import from the United States and Britain only about 40 per cent of what it exported to those countries. Its inability to use freely the currency it earns has set back badly its long-overdue development plans. In Singapore in the boom year of 1951 only a third of the housing planned was built. Less than a quarter of the sum budgeted for medical services was expended, and only eleven out of twenty-three projected government schools were built. Steel, cement, and other imported commodities were very scarce, but had Malaya been able to use its dollar earnings in bidding for them it probably would have got a much larger share.

In other words, Malaya is doubly exploited. In selling its rubber and tin to the United States and using only one out of every six dollars thus earned, Malaya makes the largest dollar contribution to the sterling pool. It contributed $415,000,000 in 1951. And it is not even permitted to get needed goods for the sterling equivalent of its dollar contribution.

During the election campaign Oliver Lyttelton, who did not then think he was going to become Colonial Secretary, scoffed at Labor's claim to have aided Britain's colonies through such paper projects as the Colombo Plan. The Labor government, he declared, had actually intensified exploitation of the colonies by compelling them to pile up sterling balances instead of supplying them with goods. Since entering the Cabinet he has dropped this theme. After all, if the Prime Minister complains that the Labor government should have welched on its debts to former colonies, Mr. Lyttelton can scarcely suggest that a Conservative government should generously refuse to allow its colonies to accumulate debts. Even at the present level of United States aid, it is only by such forced loans from its colonies that Britain can stay afloat economically.

Soviet Writing Today

BY ERNEST J. SIMMONS

ONE of the troubles with Soviet literature today is that it is the reflection of a revolution grown old and conservative against a backdrop painted in official, right, radical colors. The genuine fervor that inspired the early poetry and fiction with revolutionary idealism and the emergent sense of a world reborn has vanished. During the early 1920's the Soviet literary scene presented a striking contrast to that of today. Freedom—one might almost say a certain degree of anarchy—prevailed among writers. Numerous literary groups sprang up, each with its manifesto declaring a variety of artistic aims and ideological loyalties. Instead of dictator, the Communist Party played the role rather of referee in the major literary struggle of the time—that between the several left-wing proletarian groups which demanded hegemony, party sanction, and government support for the development of literature, and the right-wing and fellow-traveler groups which insisted upon creative freedom.

This position of the party in the matter of literary controls was no doubt connected both with the social and economic conditions of the country at the time and with the struggle for power within the party. However, with the triumph of Stalin over Trotsky and the inauguration of the First Five-Year Plan in 1928, the party felt able to move farther in the direction of regimenting literature. And by 1932 the party boldly dissolved the powerful Russian Association of Proletarian Writers and various other literary groups and two years later set up one big organization of writers for the whole of the U. S. S. R.—the present Union of Soviet Writers. Dividing the opposition in order to conquer it is a familiar party tactic, but so also is the device of combining fractions into one large organization in order to control diverse activities more effectively. In a field so resistant to control as culture, this latter device is possible only when the party has great power, and by 1932 the party had reached that stage. Far from conferring more freedom upon writers, as was widely imagined at the time, the establishment of a single union made for more sweeping controls. There is good reason to suppose that Stalin played a personal role in this move.

From 1932 until the Nazi invasion of 1941 Soviet literature developed in an atmosphere of conformity to party dictates. In general, the party still preferred to remain behind the scenes, exercising its controlling influence largely through the medium of the party fraction in the Union of Soviet Writers. Some critical battles were fought out in the press during this period, but they were concerned mostly with the problem of how to adorn socialist realism with the trappings of Marxism, and such samovar tempests invariably took place within the bosom of the family, that is, under the aegis of the all-inclusive Union of Soviet Writers. In short, after 1932 critics were asserting in concert that only an author with a Marxist-Leninist-Stalinist world view could correctly portray life in the Soviet Union and abroad, and hence only literature written from this point of view could be considered real art. The Marxian interpretation of socialist realism ended in the closed and vicious circle of declaring that only the reality of socialism is real and that therefore everything hostile to socialism is unreal. Such a position was the logical outcome of party dictation, and its relation to the truth of art in literature is well summed up in a typical statement of one of the critics, M. Serebryansky, in 1938: "Artistic truth is the ability to tell everything necessary but to tell it correctly, that is, from a definite, Bolshevik point of view."

DURING the war, no doubt because of a shift in propaganda emphasis from the Communist Party to the unity and patriotism of the multi-national peoples of the Soviet Union, one could detect a relaxation of party controls over all the media of art and intellectual life. And at the end of the war a public report of the tenth plenum of the Executive Committee of the Union of Soviet Writers recorded frank expressions of hope by prominent authors that interference in the arts would be discontinued.

These hopes were blasted by the resolution of the Central Committee of the party on literature shortly after the war (August 14, 1946) and by the subsequent speech of the late Andrei Zhdanov, in which he not only plainly indicated what literature was considered anti-Soviet but also defined the kinds of books that ought to be written by post-war authors of belles-lettres. This resolution, as is now well known, touched off a vast frontal attack by the party on all aspects of Soviet artistic and intellectual life. In this period of "the gradual transition from socialism to communism," the shift in the ideological line must be understood as a reflection of the new post-war national and international policy of the party. In the "purification" drive that followed there were no doubt several objectives, but certainly one of them was the determination that all intellectual and artistic effort must be utterly subservient to party control and should have as one of its aims the exaltation of the Soviet Union and its accomplishments over the capitalist West and America.

Perhaps the most obvious feature of the interference in belles-lettres in the post-war period, as contrasted with the earlier ones, is the direct and openly declared domination of the party in the total direction of literary things. The party now demands that all writers adhere strictly to the guiding principle of partiinost—party spirit—which assumes an all-pervading organic connection between literature and politics. As one recent critic frankly put it, the writer can give a truthful and profound portrayal of reality in its revolutionary development only if he is guided by the policy of the Soviet state!

By now a formidable control apparatus has been developed in the Soviet Union to enable the party to carry out its declared intention of using literature for its own purposes. Since the whole manufacturing process of the printed word—paper, presses, publishing houses, distribution—is ultimately under government control, the party has an economic strangle-hold on the output and content of literature. The propaganda line that determines the broad direction of literary content is usually initiated in the Politburo and announced by the Central Committee in resolutions which have almost the force of law. The Propaganda and Agitation Department of the Central Committee has as one of its main duties to compel active observance of the ideological line in literature and to expose what it considers important deviations from it. From time to time it may also promulgate a new aspect or interpretation of the line or emphasize the need for special concentration on some theme. This is ordinarily done through inspired articles in Pravda, the Literary Gazette, or some other party organ.

Lower down in the hierarchy of controls, though capable of bringing more immediate pressure to bear on authors, is the Union of Soviet Writers, which is divided into committees corresponding to the various branches of literature. Though Communists do not predominate in the membership of the union, they occupy most of the key posts and control it. Authors are encouraged to read their works in progress to the relevant committee of the union, and there the critical emphasis is on whether the writer has embodied in his work the true spirit of the party line. A further check takes place in the editorial offices of the so-called "thick" magazines, for the best literature, even novels as serials, appears first in these publications. Their editorial boards in turn are made up largely of Communists, and one of their principal functions is to pass on the ideological correctness of manuscripts submitted to them. The same is true of the editorial boards of the huge government book-publishing firms. Finally, all literary work that appears in print must receive the approval of the official government censorship office (Glavlit).

Should a literary work pass safely through this formidable array and be published with some undetected ideological impurity, which occasionally happens, it is almost certain to be pounced upon by reviewers—literary magazines as well as books are reviewed. And if there is any hesitation to review the work, which is sometimes the case, or if reviewers have failed to note and criticize ideological faults, an officially inspired statement appears in the press to set matters right. This usually elicits recantation all around—from the author, officials of the Union of Soviet Writers, the editorial head of the responsible magazine or publishing house, the careless reviewer, and often from the editor of the publication in which the erring review appeared.

IT IS safe to say that few of the notable artistic works of Soviet literature of the past—and there have been some very fine ones—would be officially acceptable if offered for publication in this post-war period of tight regimentation. When they are occasionally reprinted, textual changes are introduced in order to bring them "up to date" ideologically. Even so recent a production as Simonov's war poetry, enormously popular and enthusiastically reviewed when first printed seven or eight years ago, was violently attacked a few months ago when reissued in a collected volume.

Thus literature in the Soviet Union since the war has necessarily been devoted largely to the greater glory of the Communist Party. If imaginative literature tends to exalt its subject as the most adequate mirror of life, Soviet literature today exalts it as a mirror of idealized Soviet life. In such recent fiction successes as V. Azhayev's "Far from Moscow," S. Babayevsky's "Light over the Land," V. Zakrutin's "Floating Station," G. Nikolayeva's "The Harvest," and A. Kozhevnikov's "Life-giving Water," real problems of Soviet daily living are dealt with, and often against carefully described backgrounds of village or town, of factory or huge construction effort. However, the psychological presentation of character is hopelessly stereotyped, plainly and tiresomely manufactured out of the whole cloth of official ideology. In the past, fiction reflected with varying degrees of faithfulness the central problem of Soviet life—the tragic struggle between the old and the new in the fierce effort to build a socialist society. Party motivation was nearly always present, but the reality of the abiding conflict was rarely sacrificed to Communist doctrine. The positive hero in this earlier fiction moved in an arena of activity that often had the authentic ring of real life, for the party had not yet found a formula of idealized life and was in no position to enforce one. Today the positive hero of fiction is nearly always a Communist, cast in the father-image of Stalin. He may have certain weaknesses, often the only element of dramatic conflict—impulsiveness, pride, a desire to abandon the collective and do everything himself, hostility to innovation, failure to educate a wife lacking his Bolshevik virtues. In the end, however, these weaknesses are always overcome by an application of stereotyped ideological remedies. Soviet literature today prides itself on portraying only average men and women, but it casts them in the official image of idealized positive Communist heroes and heroines.

The Union Committee Listens to a Work in Progress

Since fiction is sold in enormous quantities in the Soviet Union, one naturally wonders how the average Soviet citizen reacts to these "average" heroes and heroines and to the idealized life they lead. The present writer has been conducting a study of certain features of Soviet literature, through interviews and questionnaires, among Soviet D. P.'s here and abroad, some of them former members of the Writers' Union. The nearly uniform answer to the point mentioned above is that the average Soviet citizen reads between the lines of such novels and develops "an unusual virtuosity" in dismissing positive heroes as unreal and accepting the so-called negative characters, motivated by "bourgeois survivals," as the truly realistic portrayals.

It is almost too much to expect, however, that such virtuosity in interpretation should be very common among the masses of Soviet readers. Some allowance must be made for the effectiveness of the propaganda element in belles-lettres. Then, too, the unflinching success-story of novels and plays today, a socialistic variation of such endless Horatio Alger themes as are found in "Luck and Pluck," "Sink or Swim," "Survive or Perish," must serve psychologically as the wish-fulfilment of countless hard-pressed peasants on the cooperative farms and laborers in the factories. In its post-war development Soviet literature has become the perfect propaganda instrument, for it is presenting for popular consumption a series of consistent, idealized Communist heroes who—the party no doubt hopes—will stand in their personal lives, heroic actions, and unswerving loyalty to the regime as instructive models for the average Soviet citizen. It is through this negative sense of reality—the idealization of life which the party foists upon the public both as a reflection of Communist aspirations and as an opiate to minister to its discontent—that Soviet literature today can best serve the purpose of the social historian seeking to make use of it as evidence of Soviet life.

Harold Ross

A Professional Tribute

BY M. R. WERNER

ROSS, as he was called by everyone who knew him, on and off the New Yorker, seems to me to have made a great success in American journalism because he set definite limits to his scope and exhibited both integrity and ingenuity within those limits. I had the privilege of professional association with him for many years, beginning when he got out his prospectus for the New Yorker and ending only with his death. I never knew him intimately as a friend, but I developed higher respect for him as an editor than I have felt for any other editor in the United States.

Anybody who worked for Ross was bound from time to time to be exasperated. He worried a great deal about ideas and the words in which to put them, and in that way he was like his writers. Sometimes he did not "get" what one was trying to do. Sometimes he seemed to want to alter too drastically the way it was done. But for all his expletives, Harold Ross was a reasonable, and therefore tolerant, man. When he was wrong, you could usually convince him, for he was completely without arrogance, unlike many editors and other entrepreneurs. Once you had convinced him you could accomplish something with him—never unless you had.

Ross was a profoundly serious man. He often grinned, and I daresay his intimate friends heard him laugh; I never did. One of the limitations he accepted for himself and his enterprise at the outset was that it would never even pretend to have the whole answer for any problem. When in doubt he preferred to shy away from a subject. Once when we had a rousing argument about a piece with political implications, he said to me: "We don't want to get serious, Werner," meaning the magazine. That was an illusion of his. He thought originally that he was going to run a "comic" magazine. By the art of improvisation, which was one of Ross's greatest gifts, the New Yorker turned into the magazine that had more effect than any other ever published in the United States, not only on American manners, but also on the ingrained habits and worn-out customs of other editors.

Sloppy reporting gave Harold Ross nightmares, and muddy language made him profane. His comments on the margins of proof, of which much has been said since his death, were valuable and at times hilariously funny. He was often wrong in those comments, but he was never neglectful, and he must have, more often than not, saved his magazine serious errors by them. He was death on truisms, and he had a rage for accuracy. He much admired felicity.

Ross would have shuddered if he had ever "set the world on fire" with the New Yorker. Crusading he preferred to leave to men much more sure of themselves. And yet Ross and many of the men in and out of his office to whom he gave opportunity and whose work he influenced have had a profound effect on the development of American decency.

It usually takes a maniacal streak, or, if you prefer, a touch of genius, to become a great editor in the United States, and in that sense Ross qualified, along with Horace Greeley, both James Gordon Bennetts, the elder Joseph Pulitzer, E. W. Scripps, and Joseph M. Patterson. Many editors have tried to copy Ross, but none have succeeded, partly because the effort was half-hearted and partly because none of them had the New Yorker's relatively limited but generally sophisticated audience.

Ross's audience enabled him to escape the domination of big advertisers. So many people with perfumes, clothing, books, jewelry, music, liquor, and vacations to sell needed the New Yorker more than it needed them that the magazine's writers and artists never had to look over their shoulder as they wrote or drew what pleased them. No church or political party has ever had any influence on the New Yorker, although no doubt the customary attempts, mild or angry, have been made.

Through the efforts of Harold Ross and the men he had the good judgment to use and appreciate, the New Yorker has originated more devices for expressing human events and characteristics than any other journal ever published in the United States—or perhaps elsewhere. Ross realized the simple fact that the man who was reporting was vital to what he was reporting, even though it was important that he should not distort his subject matter by an ill-grounded bias. The greatest tribute that could be paid to Ross and his magazine is that readers are quick to complain when they think an issue is not as expert as they have become accustomed to expect. No one sees any difference between one issue of Collier's or Newsweek, for example, and another.

Since Harold Ross died at the age of fifty-nine, there has been much speculation about whether the New Yorker can go on long without him. My guess is that it will—unless it should sometime bow to pressure, financial or intellectual, as he would never have done.

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE WRITER'S DILEMMA IN BRITAIN

BY VINCENT BROME

IT IS curious how many successful authors make austere pronouncements about the value of hardship to young writers. Dos Passos joined the tradition some time ago: "Young writers who believe in themselves should be willing to starve in a garret once more." I have no idea whether Dos Passos graduated to his present distinguished old age through a garret, but I wonder whether anyone undergoing starvation in a garret at the moment would say that it was a prerequisite of creative writing. Hardship recollected is usually romanticized. From the comfort of the high places the discomfort of the low becomes the splendid condition of any "fundamental writing."

Yet in a world where human beings are struggling to get away from nature in the raw—which tended to make them a pretty sorry lot—why hold the writer fast in his own private jungle? Ideally, in a sensitive democracy the novelist, dramatist, or poet would tend to find his own level, and if the toughness of the breed did not vary drastically, the rest of this article would be pointless; but it does vary.

Men of the caliber of Shakespeare, Tolstoy, and Melville will continue to make themselves felt against the worst adversity. Men of genius, even men of tremendous talent, are rarely overwhelmed by environment. It is the writer of considerable talent, enjoying his own peculiar vision but not completely possessed by it and lacking the spiritual toughness to survive interminable frustrations, who finds the present state of publishing—periodical and book—so difficult in Britain.

The word understates the situation for many young and serious writers. Suffocating would be better. Time was in Britain when serious writers could earn a reasonable living from literary journalism and produce their books in between articles and stories. Now literary journalism is virtually extinguished.

With the death of Horizon and New Writing, those two fiercely contested remnants of a literary heritage dating back to the Edinburgh Review, the scene was left desolate. Reviews remain, of course, like the Cornhill and the Fortnightly, but neither is literary in the sense that Horizon was. Scrutiny does not offer much scope to young writers, and the Times Literary Supplement takes us into the world of reviewing.

Once a second means of sustenance, reviewing is now very limited, largely because of the cost of paper, and is often so poorly paid that those who have any truck with it are looked upon as literary hacks. Not so long ago papers like the Daily Chronicle carried long reviews of books every other day and paid reasonable rates for them. Now half a dozen books are lumped together into a thousand words once a week, and one man lives by it instead of four.

The short-story field is no happier. The market for serious work hardly exists. Even the "popular" short-story magazines have collapsed; the Argosy alone survives. And now in the last year the elasticity has gone out of British book publishing too. What with no short-story magazines, defunct literary periodicals, and publishers so aware of imminent crisis that they eye every promising newcomer with fresh skepticism unless he has the attributes of Shakespeare, a best-seller, or both, the word "suffocating" does indeed seem justified.

One small glimmer appears on the horizon. The BBC Third Program has given John Lehmann one hour a month to produce a miscellany of new writing, and in one sense this may go some way toward filling the gap created by the death of Penguin New Writing. The Third Program apart, what is a fledgling writer to do? Retire to his garret and feed on his own fine sentences? The caloric value of inspiration is not very high, but it is said that inspiration of the right intensity will sustain vitality in something approaching a corpse. There is only one objection to this. Garrets at ten shillings a week which once sheltered colonies of bohemians in London's Greenwich Village are now three and four times that much, and can no longer serve as the cherished seat of inspiration for the impoverished. More or less vanished, too, is the way of life in which one pound a week kept a writer at least alive in the center of London, while he rose at noon, consumed inordinate quantities of sausages and mashed, drifted industriously from coffee to coffee, and somehow contrived to write. The economics of survival have been revolutionized under inflationary pressures. Three pounds would be nearer the mark today.

IF NOT the garret, what then? In the familiar scale of possible ways of life conjured up by the inartistic for the benefit of writers and their like, the part-time job ranks high. Those who feel that the arts and writing are trivial excrescences on the reality of living would like to see every writer a spare-time writer and they hint at the health-giving life of the mines; the two-way tradition, a very high one, made Fielding a police magistrate, Trollope a post-office official, and—serenest reach of all—Spinoza a lens polisher. In modern times the British civil service has nourished big and small talent, but the civil service, like Bohemia, has changed its character since the war, and the easy ten-to-four day has given place to an exhausting forty-five-hour week. But if the casual ways of the civil service have changed, and the Humbert Woolfs might be hard put to find time for their poetry, the part-time job which sustains life and energy enough for creative work has also suffered serious curtailment. As society has become more and more intensely organized and efficiency has undermined Bohemia itself, part-time jobs have either been swept away

THE VICTIMS

They walk towards us willingly and gently,
Unblemished, the white kid, the calf,
Their new-born coats scarcely dry from the amniotic waters.
Each hair lies in its new place, ripple-marked
By the rhythms of growth, the tides
That washed them up onto the shores of time.

Their young eyes, unsurprised, look towards us.
We see them stand, beautiful on spring grass,
And know that the upgathered perfect form must pass,
Those intricate knots of ganglia and veins,
The rhythmic heartbeat, and the breath of life.
We first receive their wounding in our hearts
With all the inexpressible guilt of love,
For the first worshiping touch of our tragic hands must soil
And trouble the unconscious unicorn
That does not even know it stands on earth.
We offer them bunches of buttercups and young grass
With all the inexpressible love of guilt.
We give, even as we look,
The first wound of sacrifice.

or have evolved into what is called casual labor, a form of activity constantly threatened with cessation. Ask famous writers today what part-time job they covet and they tend to retire into a world of fantasy. "I would like to be a station master on a small country branch line (single track)," says John Betjeman. "A rich wife," says Cyril Connolly. C. Day Lewis is more down to earth: "For the novelist who needs a wide range and diversity of personal contacts, medicine, the law, or commercial traveling. . . ."

As for patrons, the last went out with the nineteenth century. So the patron is dead, publishers less inclined to take risks with new writers, secondary jobs more productive of frustration than inspiration, and the state—the very word rings like a knell. The state and writing seem natural enemies.

There is nothing for it but to return to the starting point and write, starvation or not. But even then what happens in Britain? A man may spend nine months writing a novel and never get it published. Or he may have the novel accepted six months after writing it, and receive £100 advance royalties. Another year elapses, and the book appears. Some time in the following year he may receive another £100—for a year's work £200, considerably less than his typist is paid. And he is far less fortunate than his typist, for the £200 is paid over two and a half years not one year. If he is among the fortunate, the £200 becomes £500, and whenever a star appears in the East one novel comes out of the ruck and achieves four figures.

Cabell's Brief Hour

QUIET PLEASE. By James Branch Cabell. University of Florida Press. Distributed by Farrar, Straus and Young. $3.

JAMES BRANCH CABELL had published unread books for fifteen years when he woke one morning in 1919 to find that "Jurgen" had made him famous. It was, or at least it appeared to be, no mere success of scandal. Magazines and newspapers which had scarcely been aware of his existence broke out in a flood of articles critical and informatory. His earlier novels were reissued, finally in an eighteen-volume collected edition, and the textbooks enshrined him as a classic. A few succeeding books sold on his notoriety, but it was not very long before his works were again falling from the presses almost as soundlessly as before. In "The Literary History of the American People," published four years ago, Henry Seidel Canby devotes to Cabell a few sympathetic pages, but so far as the publishing trade, the general reader, or the present-day intellectual is concerned, he no longer exists. The only comparable recent example of a writer who rose so high like a rocket and fell unnoticed like its stick is the late Edgar Lee Masters. Yet "The Spoon River Anthology" is not so nearly forgotten as "Jurgen."

Cabell's fate was a cruel one because few things can seem so utterly lost as fame, and the once famous can take little satisfaction in saying, "I have had my hour," since an hour of fame may be no fame at all. It would be interesting to know how the victim of such a fate feels about it, and—though I am by no means certain its author would accept the statement—this is, in a way, the subject of "Quiet Please." I say "in a way," because Mr. Cabell discusses many things, including the origins of his books and his present way of life at seventy in St. Augustine, Florida. Moreover, he has by no means simplified a style full of strangely displaced phrases—for example, "To the contrary, there, almost always, I believe, is a certain smugness," etc.—which sometimes achieves an elaborate neatness and sometimes descends to the level of a schoolmaster's jocose involutions. But what he actually does say about his career may be reduced in simple words to something like this: He has always enjoyed writing, even books which did not sell, even books which he never intended to publish. Yet he has never been able to write anything except the particular thing which at that moment he wanted to write. He despises the esteemed writers of today, he can read with pleasure very few of those of the past who once delighted him, and he found his hour of fame distressing because of vulgarities incidental to it which he could not wholly avoid. Yet he has had, in a way, a satisfactory life, partly because the amatory adventures attributed to the characters in his fiction were not always based upon pure fancy. And he still holds that wisdom prescribes a contempt for the ways of the world together with a willingness to adjust oneself to them when the cost is not too great.

It is obvious that as a man of letters Mr. Cabell cannot possibly have been as important as he was once proclaimed and be as inconsequential as he is now usually thought. On the other hand, there is no use in arguing the safe contention that the eye of eternity will see him as worthy of less admiration than the twenties accorded but of more than the fifties are willing to grant. But perhaps it is worth while to point out that if the erotic naughtiness of "Jurgen" was precisely what a brief moment wanted, everything which he now has to offer consists of things which the spirit of the age resolutely wants none of, and that, consequently, even if he were as good as his admirers once thought, excellence would not win him much esteem. Anatole France had been longer famous when a generation definitively rejected him, but he is hardly less likely to be praised as once he was. An esteemed writer today may be direct or he may be devious, but he may not be mannered in that particular way. He may be utterly pessimistic concerning the past, present, and future or he may be utopian. But he cannot say, as Mr. Cabell and Anatole France both said, that human life is not very satisfactory, that it will never be any different, but that, nevertheless, "it will do."

In "Quiet Please" Mr. Cabell is still trying to find acceptable ways of saying just that. But he is probably not unaware of the fact that, at the present moment, there is no way of saying it that is likely to prove widely acceptable.

The Faith of a Liberal

NEW HOPES FOR A CHANGING WORLD. By Bertrand Russell. Simon and Schuster. $3.

A TRADITIONAL office of philosophy is to provide a critique of prevailing tendencies and values, to portray a way of life that can redirect human energies from unworthy to ennobling pursuits, and to supply a perspective within which personal and public adversity may be faced with resolute courage. This moral role of philosophy has always been of intimate concern to Bertrand Russell, even in that long period of his life when he was most actively engaged in those abstract and seemingly remote logical analyses which assure him a permanent place in the history of thought. He has repeatedly expressed his high esteem for the practical guidance and exemplary fortitude that books like Boethius's "The Consolations of Philosophy" contain; and in a long series of essays and volumes, beginning with his famous "A Free Man's Worship" down to his latest book, he has given overt proof of profound preoccupation with central moral and social issues. His explicit objective in the present volume is to outline a liberal faith for the modern world and to generate a creative hope in the realization of the ideal constituting that faith. For he believes it is the absence of such an ideal which is largely responsible for the sorry predicaments of our time; but he is also convinced that the grave dangers confronting us cannot be surmounted as long as fear dominates our thought and paralyzes remedial action. He rejects as incompatible with the most warranted conclusions of critical thought the "two great systems of dogma lying in wait for the modern man when his spirit is weary"—the systems of Rome and of Moscow. He maintains that when men are liberated from the primeval terrors they acquired in the jungle and acquire instead the spontaneous belief that their happiness depends upon harmony with other men, then "not only their personal problems but all the problems of world politics, even the most abstruse and difficult, would melt away." He therefore proposes with all the arts of persuasion at his command an ethic of "encouragement and opportunity for all the impulses that are creative and expansive," an ethic which will "let the imprisoned demons escape and the beauty of the world take possession."

Mr. Russell states his hopes for a better world with moving eloquence, and against a background of a synoptic world history in which he examines the achievements and follies of men with characteristic insight and ironic wit. He distinguishes three major types of conflict which have marked the evolution of mankind: the conflicts between man and nature, between man and man, and between man and himself. Modern science and technology supply the means for a limited but sufficient mastery of nature, and only the persistence of obsolete moral and political ideas stands in the way of assuring the material conditions for a good life to all men. But this mastery is made practically ineffective in many parts of the world by a disastrous over-population. Indeed, Mr. Russell is inclined to hold that the habit of a low birth rate is the most important value Western civilization has to offer to mankind at large; and there is perhaps no single thesis he affirms so emphatically as his conviction that unless human fertility is artificially controlled in what are now the underprivileged areas of the world, all of us are in mortal danger of being swallowed up in a new flood of ignorance, destitution, and war.

It is in the struggle for food and other primary necessities of life that Mr. Russell finds the main cause for the wars of history, for the development of moral codes, and for the changes in modes of social organization. This struggle still continues, though according to him needlessly and in consequence of the incongruity between our outworn political and economic ideas on the one hand and the actual physical and economic unity of the world on the other. The sole alternative to this suicidal conflict is some form of effective world government. But Mr. Russell appears to be unclear in his own mind as to how such a government can be realized. He suggests at times that a peaceful surrender of national sovereignty can be achieved by mutual agreement; and yet he also declares at other times that international order will replace international anarchy only when the victors of another world war impose a modern equivalent of the Pax Romana upon the entire globe. He exhibits a similar indecision in his comments on the present struggle between Communist Russia and the West. He argues that these social systems embody incompatible conceptions of life and that therefore a fatal conflict of arms between them can hardly be avoided; however, he also claims that but for the occurrence of mutual suspicions engendered by irrational but eliminable fears the two systems can coexist peaceably. In any event, it is clear that Mr. Russell is not a starry-eyed optimist, and his view of the immediate future is on the whole grim though not despairing. But like the rest of us, he sometimes engages in what certainly appears like whistling in the dark.

Mr. Russell's conception of the good life is an essentially pluralistic one, and he is generous and sensitive to the variety and range of human capacities. He foresees an endlessly bright future for mankind, if only we can be persuaded to surrender our "fear morality" of guilt and sin, and to adopt an outlook which is favorable to the maximum exercise of our disciplined powers. In his frankly worldly attitude toward the sources and rewards of the moral life, in his passionate distaste for all mystery mongering, in his serene confidence in the possibility of human progress through rational effort, Mr. Russell thus shows himself to be an eloquent spokesman for some of the dominant features of the philosophy of the French Enlightenment. Indeed, there is a distinctive eighteenth-century air about his use of purely psychological explanations in interpreting socio-historical changes, though it is not always evident whether he is entirely serious in adopting such psychological categories. There is also some ground for questioning his neo-Malthusian views. Undoubtedly there is much substance in his warnings against the dangers of over-population; his discussion nevertheless sometimes suggests that there is an optimal maximum population size, independent of the state of technology and mode of social organization—an assumption that is highly debatable, to say the least. But despite such reservations concerning many links in his argument, Mr. Russell has written a stimulating and inspiring book. It is a sermon on the life of man, which articulates without unction and with insight a noble vision of human excellence. It achieves what Mr. Russell set out to do, for it makes attractive to both mind and heart the faith underlying a liberal social philosophy.

Form and Feeling

THE SEVEN-LEAGUE CRUTCHES.

By Randall Jarrell. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.75.

THIS volume is divided into three sections called Europe, Children, and Once Upon a Time. The poems in the first section seem for the most part to revolve around some experience in Austria which has great significance for the poet. They are full of a poignant, nostalgic Austrian atmosphere:

At the path out into the wood, a deer Stood with stars in the branches of its antlers.

This is beautiful, and there is a good deal like this. But when the poet gets close to the center of his experience, the effect tends to become blurred:

I saw, in your eyes beside my eyes,
A gaze pure, yearning, unappeasable.

The poems seek the rhythm of the speaking voice, and in this there is something very personal about Mr. Jarrell's utterance. His is the voice which knows pity and despair. At present it seems a little submerged by a mixture of grief and overwhelming but rather fragmentary European impressions.

Perhaps the most successful of these long poems is one about another poet, Tristan Corbière. It is as though the feeling Mr. Jarrell has for Corbière's poetry had heightened the tone of his own utterance, which tends to become a little monotonous in the poems of pure sentiment.

Mr. Jarrell is one of the most interesting poets living, and one of the most alert critical intelligences. He is also a difficult and even baffling poet. Difficult, not because his poems are obscure, but because he combines an extreme critical self-consciousness with a certain naivete of feeling and occasional fumbling of technique. At least, I think this is the case, though his occasional lapses are so surprising that I am left wondering whether they are intended to achieve some effect which I have failed to follow. For example, a poem called The Island begins with the confident rhythm:

While sun and sea—and I, and I—Were warped through summer on our spar,
I guessed beside the fin, the gull,
And Europe ebbing like a sail
A life indifferent as a star.

The meter continues like this for three stanzas and then in the fourth stanza breaks into

Frosted or salted with its curling smile
The printless hachures of the sand . . .
I lay with you, Europe, in a net of snows:
And all my trolls—their noses flattened into Lapps' Against the thin horn of my windows—wept:

However often I read it, the line "And all my trolls—their noses flattened into Lapps'" spells for me the breakdown of the poem. To say this, in connection with a poet who considers his effects so carefully, may show my own obtuseness. I have to leave it to the reader.

This volume seems to me to represent what is perhaps a transitional state of development. I draw attention to a lapse because I think that such defects are characteristic of an experimental stage while Mr. Jarrell is moving forward to a new and simpler narrative style of writing in which he will succeed very powerfully. There are—to my mind—lapses in feeling as well as in technique. The heavily larded, over-simple German introduced into the poems about Austria seems to me an example of faulty judgment. On the other hand, to have written these poems, which appear to hang too closely to a very deeply felt experience which does not entirely communicate itself to the reader, shows an admirable seriousness and courage.

The book is particularly interesting in showing how an undigested experience expressed too emotionally in the early poems—or a parallel experience—becomes memorable when it is viewed more from a distance and fused more cold-bloodedly into more conventional forms. La Belle au Bois Dormant seems to include all the pent-up emotional quality of the Salzburg poems, and yet to move in a serene air of pure detachment.

Despite his great powers of criticism and self-criticism, I suspect that Mr. Jarrell is a poet who does not always gain complete control over the very strong feelings he expresses. What makes him so interesting is that he has these feelings, as well as intellect. But on the whole he seems at present to be most successful when he hits on a very happy subject, as here he sometimes does—for example The Black Swan or the delightful lines about the postman in A Sick Child. Without such a discipline of subject and form, when he is writing freely, he tends to be overwhelmed by his remarkably exposed sensibility to the horrors of the world. There is a kind of sobbing despair in many of these poems for which one can only feel the greatest respect but which somehow gives the impression of a great deal of material which has not been adequately dealt with.

What Mr. Jarrell is trying to do, however, is wholly admirable: to write a poetry which hovers between the lyric and the narrative (he always brings me back to thinking about Browning), and to give utterance to the horror of our age. He does not shirk the terribly pressing terrible subjects of Germany and Europe. At present, though, he has not found a way of writing about them with uninhibited freedom (as Lawrence might have done)—that is, with a kind of desperate abandonment to the subject itself which makes form seem irrelevant, and therefore justifies all freedoms; nor does he manage to control them in the crystalline form which he achieved in some earlier poems. His problem is to fuse his intellectual judgment with a tormented strength of feeling about situations (the oppressed, the poor) which are always there but which, artistically speaking, are hardly ever completely real—that is, completely personal experience—to anyone. But although he might be reproached for at times not writing more personally about his feelings, I think his attempt to penetrate to the center of a suffering outside himself is right. For that suffering is so present in the world today that it demands to be exorcised by art. STEPHEN SPENDER

The Asian Revolution

ASIA AND THE WEST. By Maurice Zinkin. Institute of Pacific Relations. $3.50.

THIS volume treats the major aspects of the socio-economic organization of Asia, the condition of the several nations there, the needs to be met for giving them an adequate development, the state of their trade, and their requirement of dollars. Through it runs the theme of the Communist advance in the struggle for the minds of men. Because of the scope of the work each topic is treated in very few pages; yet the author has given a great deal of specific information and bolstered it with many tables.

The book starts by contrasting the village agricultural life of Asia with the urban and industrial development of the West. The standards of living are widely apart, and Asia, overpopulated in relation to its production, has been incited to emulate the West. Herein lies the basis for the Asian political revolution, which may prove, the author says, when seen in perspective, to have been more important during the past decade than the war and the changes it has caused in Europe.

The major part of this work was written in 1949 and the Postscript some time toward the end of 1950. At that time Mr. Zinkin viewed China and India as respectively the protagonists of communism and democracy in Asia. He points to the shift in loyalties in Asia during the past few decades. Formerly they were to a religion (Islam, Hinduism, or some other); when he wrote he saw them as being to a region. This is true within limits, though in Pakistan the religion of Islam still has a powerful part in shaping national purpose, while in China the force of religion was not so strong as in India. Today the shift has moved farther than when Mr. Zinkin wrote. In India the recent elections seem to show that to an impressive extent the electorate responded to secular economic inducements as offered respectively by Congress, the Communist Party, and the Socialist Party. The appeal of political parties based upon religion was if anything less than expected. The issue now seems clearly joined there between communism and the democratic parties on the question of which will do more for the people economically.

At this point the United States must look to its purposes in Asia, and we must brace ourselves for the expenditures we must make if we are to fulfill them. If we want India, Pakistan, Ceylon, and the countries of Southeast Asia to be democratic rather than Communist, we shall have to assist their governments to develop them economically. It will cost us money to do so, but as Mr. Zinkin remarks, not so much as to finance a series of Korean actions. His description of the large needs of each

W. NORMAN BROWN

The Case of Brooks Adams

BROOKS ADAMS: CONSTRUCTIVE CONSERVATIVE. By Thornton Anderson. Cornell University Press. $3.75.

IN BROOKS ADAMS Mr. Anderson has an enviable subject, one of the most interesting and prophetic minds at work in this country during the period from 1890 to the First World War, and still, despite excellent essays by Daniel Aaron, R. P. Blackmur, and Charles A. Beard, an unduly neglected thinker. The first essential about Brooks Adams was his last name. From the days of John Adams the men of the family, possessed of a powerful sense of the symbolic value of their family story, had been imbued with a strong need to intellectualize and universalize their experience. In the generation of Brooks and Henry Adams these qualities were supplemented by an unhappy awareness of the family's progressive failure to "adapt," as Brooks would have put it, to an American environment which had in many ways coarsened too much to accommodate the Adams integrity. With Henry, who had the more tempered mind and style of the two, this concern with adaptation and failure was internal and personal. Brooks, who was a more concentrated and original thinker, externalized it and expressed it in his historical and political theories. "Nothing is commoner," wrote Brooks, "than to find families who have been famous in one century sinking into obscurity in the next . . ." And it is clear from the passage in which this sentence appears that, much as Brooks's social inquiries were directed toward finding a policy and a strategy for the United States, they were also, perhaps even primarily, an inquiry into the question: why had the Republic shunted its best men aside into places of no real prominence or power?

Brooks Adams's earliest political interests were much like those held during the thirty years after the Civil War by thousands of gentlemen Mugwumps, a type that was being elbowed into positions of slight public importance by the rise of corporate industrialism and the decline of that old-style republican statecraft that had put two Adamses in the White House and made a third minister to the Court of St. James. Brooks always had that high-minded interest in public service that characterized the Mugwump type, and with it, at first, the same rather narrow reading of social issues that helped to limit its influence. In the raw age they were born into, such men as the Adamses could serve their country only in marginal posts, or in the office of critic or moralist. It was difficult for any ambitious man to accept such a modest and unsatisfying role, and with the exalted and demanding traditions of the house of Adams behind one, it was all but impossible. (It is significant that Brooks prepared a biography of his grandfather which he suppressed and started a study of his father which he could not finish.) The depression of the nineties, which struck a blow at their personal fortunes and convinced Brooks and Henry that their world was going to smash, seems at once to have completely soured Brooks's spirit and galvanized his mind. It precipitated that hatred of the moneyed class, and particularly of the usurer, that animated his study of "The Law of Civilization and Decay," and set in motion an inquiry lasting many years into possible policies by which the United States might escape from the processes of decadence.

There were many aspects of Brooks's work that led him down what will seem today to be extremely destructive ways of thought. He could not free himself from an admittedly parochial frame of reference ("My nation, my race, my blood confine my affections," he frankly wrote); he was convinced of the inevitability and desirability of wars, and urged the country on into the imperialist dog fight that was just beginning among the powers. There was none the less about his thinking a certain magisterial disillusionment and freedom from convention that make him, read in retrospect, a writer of constant marginal suggestiveness. He was one of the first among American conservatives to realize the need for a national social policy; he was perhaps the first to understand fully the economics of bigness and centralization and to argue the case for the administrative state; he was one of the early prophets of a realistic approach to the study of law and a fresh approach to the tasks of education. Neither the survival in his work of nineteenth-century metaphysical notions nor the sinister and almost totalitarian cast given to his insights by his desperately cynical rhetoric will conceal from sympathetic modern readers the many points at which his mind broke through the veil of temporary issues and seized upon essential problems.

Mr. Anderson's much-needed and valuable book, based upon a study of Adams's letters as well as his published writings, affords a lucid summary of the development of his ideas and some discriminating if timorous criticism. As a personal study it fails to realize the possibilities of its subject. Brooks was a tragic example of the havoc a society can wreak by rejecting and insulating its finest leaders. The earlier Adamses had always had a passion to plan things for America, and if they had failed in their grandest designs, they had at least been able to influence the course of events. That Brooks and Henry were unable stemmed from no failure of personal capacity but from the inability of post-Civil War America to make use of men of their qualities. It was, although quite understandable, fatal to the Adamses of the fourth generation that they lacked the courage of their negations. Their need to stand in an effectual and, as they saw it, "realistic" relationship to the power centers of their age overcame, in a measure, their primary sense of values—not enough, unfortunately for them, to change their values and push them into the main stream, but enough to raise in their own minds the constant suspicion that the fault lay in themselves, in some fatal lapse, as Brooks used to suggest, in their nervous organization. Hence the wearisome but not altogether insincere self-depreciation of "The Education of Henry Adams"; hence Brooks's: "I do not know that anything I have ever done, or ever shall do, will be of much moment"; hence his incessant, self-punishing emphasis on adaptability of mind.

Brooks was overwhelmed at his own audacity and at his isolation, as he saw it, after the publication of his heretical book on "The Gold Standard" in 1894. "I begin to feel as if people pointed at me in the streets. Every great interest, the whole power of this mighty engine is there to crush me, to ridicule and suppress me. . . . I feel that I am deliberately driving the last nail in my social coffin." Unheard, as he felt himself to be, he took refuge in a kind of morbid naturalism, whose formal doctrines were taken out of nineteenth-century evolutionary materialism but whose mood arose from a sense of total futility. "I am not aware," he confided while revising one of his books, "that I am anything more than an automaton, I certainly have no conscious volition, and yet the stuff comes one way, only always more so, and blacker and gloomier." "I see that we made no impress," he once wrote to Melville M. Bigelow concerning an issue that had stirred them, "even on the minds of so small a society as Boston." There were times when he felt that even Henry was closed to his message, when he felt totally alone in a world which he described as "a chaos . . . with which man is doomed eternally and hopelessly to contend." When he shaved, as Mr. Anderson tells us, it was his habit to sing, to the tune of an Irish ballad, three words over and over: "God damn it! God damn it! God damn it!"

Economic Power

AMERICAN CAPITALISM: THE CONCEPT OF COUNTERVAILING POWER. By John Kenneth Galbraith. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

ECONOMISTS as a group have a reputation, not wholly undeserved, for being gloomy slaves of theory who tend to communicate their ideas in an abstruse jargon well larded with algebraic symbols. As a result the average citizen, even though he is constantly called upon to make economic judgments, is apt to assume that economic theory requires a specialized intelligence and to dismiss it as a subject beyond his comprehension. It is incumbent upon economists, therefore, to try to overcome this widespread allergy.

Professor Galbraith is one of the profession who recognizes the responsibility. Now teaching at Harvard, he served in Washington with distinction

SOCIALISM REAL OR Bogus?

Here at last! A definitive history of bogus "Socialism" in the United States. Written by Arnold Petersen, for more than 38 years National Secretary of the Socialist Labor Party of America, this book demolishes the mythology of falsehoods and distortions created by the Kautskys, Hillquits and other falsifiers of Socialism and Socialist history.

Special attention is given to the so-called Socialist Party and to its leaders — from Hillquit to Norman Thomas. In devastating fashion, the "respectable" leaders of the "Socialist Party" are shown to have advocated everything from anarchism and violence to New Dealism.

A lively, spirited work that is MUST reading for students of Socialism who want to know how a genuine Socialist movement can avoid the pitfalls of reformism and betrayals by misleaders of labor.

during the war and was later an editor of Fortune. Perhaps these escapes from the cloister have encouraged him constantly to sharpen the blade of theory on the grindstone of observed fact. At any rate, his new book, which is both witty and easily comprehensible, represents a bold attempt to dispel illusions based on outworn theories and to provide a rationale for modern American capitalism that takes account of its operational realities.

The primary task that Professor Galbraith has set himself is an examination "into the substance of our alarms concerning the American economy" in the post-war period. In principle, he points out, our economy has pleased no one in recent years; in performance it has satisfied most of us. How is this contradiction to be explained?

Part of the trouble, he thinks, is the obvious divergence between the ideal model of a competitive market economy and the actualities of American business. The ideal model requires such rigorous competition that, to quote Professor Hayek, one of its leading champions, "the individual producer has to adapt himself to price changes and cannot control them." Today, clearly, this condition is the exception rather than the rule. In most of our leading industries if we do not have monopoly we have oligopoly—dominance by a handful of huge firms which enjoy a large measure of control over prices. These firms may compete in advertising, styling, and other ways, but they uniformly observe the convention outlawing price warfare, since the use of this weapon would mean common ruin.

Professor Galbraith points out that the anti-trust laws have not proved an effective remedy for this situation. However, he believes that concentration of economic power not only has certain advantages but has produced important compensating forces. For instance, while the incentives operative in the typical American industry no longer tend to produce maximum output at minimum prices—the test of efficiency in the competitive model—they do encourage technical innovation, which has become "one of the important weapons of market rivalry." In fact, Professor Galbraith demonstrates, only large firms with market power to protect the fruits of development can stand the heavy costs involved.

He illustrates this point by contrasting the "admirably competitive" but technically backward coal industry with the semi-monopolistic but extremely progressive oil industry. And he suggests that the inability of the individual farmer to control his prices explains why agricultural research and technical development have had to be "socialized."

Still more important as a safeguard against the dangers of oligopoly is the development of what Professor Galbraith calls "countervailing power" on the opposite side of the market.

The fact that a seller enjoys a measure of monopoly power, and is reaping a measure of monopoly return as a result, means that there is an inducement to those firms from whom he buys or those to whom he sells to develop the power with which they can defend themselves against exploitation. It means also that there is a reward to them, in the form of a share of the gains of their opponents' market power, if they are able to do so. In this way the existence of market power creates the incentive to the organization of another position of power that neutralizes it.

It is impossible in the space of a review to do justice to the evidence, such as the growth of the chain stores and mail-order houses, with which this contention is buttressed. Nor can I do more than mention Professor Galbraith's analysis of the role of the government in this development, a rather erratic record, incidentally, thanks to failure to recognize the nature and function of countervailing power.

Nevertheless, history may support Professor Galbraith's belief that the judicious fostering of countervailing power has become one of the two major economic functions of the federal government. The other is the task of assuring stability at a high level of production, a problem succinctly discussed in the final chapters of this book. Professor Galbraith's conclusion is that, with the aid of Keynesian prescriptions, the dangers of deflation can be overcome. But he recognizes the difficulties of using Keynesian remedies, sound as they may be in theory, to combat inflation, which he sees as the most serious danger to American capitalism.

Conservatives and liberals alike will probably challenge many of the ideas in this book. The first will not relish the author's justification of labor's development of countervailing power and will violently dispute his thesis that the progressive income tax is a stabilizing device. Liberals, on the other hand, may consider that he is too complacent about the effectiveness of countervailing power as a brake on monopoly. But only the most bigoted of both persuasions should fail to admit that he has written a most stimulating book.

Quantity vs. Quality

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. Text by Maurice Raynal. Translated by James Emmons. Skira, $12.50.

DEGAS. Text by Daniel Catton Rich. Harry N. Abrams, $10.

THESE two books offer an interesting contrast in quantity as against quality. The first attempts too much: a coverage of thirty painters from Goya to Gauguin in sixty-four color plates with running text. The text is inevitably chopped up into sections with ambitious titles but little development. Some seem interpolated like afterthoughts. The faults of this book are similar to those of the third volume of the same publishers' series on modern painting. The plates are often garish (Ingres' Odalisque and Slave looks like a chromolithograph), often misleading (the big Courbet at Smith College is blue-green instead of a pervasively sober limestone-gray), and sometimes shockingly bad (where are the springtime greens in Manet's Déjeuner sur l'herbe, where the Delft blues and slate grays of the Déjeuner dans l'atelier?). The deep olive ground of the Fifer Boy is here bleached to a pale putty, and the top and bottom so badly chopped as to destroy the relation between the figure and its inclosing rectangle. Many of the plates are good, but the unsuspecting reader may be trapped into thinking the quality is consistently so.

It is a relief to turn from the vulgar color plate of Degas' Café Concert aux Ambassadeurs in the Skira volume (page 120) to that on page 73 in Rich's admirable study of Degas: here the subdued beauty of Degas' tonalities are properly echoed. On the whole the fifty color plates are acceptable, even good. The chief complaint must be that the dusty texture of pastel cannot be caught in the mirror surfaces of glossy paper.

While Rich's study is necessarily general, it takes the reader far into Degas' life and art. It penetrates the grim façade of the first to the veiled splendor of the second. It is a readable and gracious account, and it surpasses many books on Degas in following him into the later years, in the time of his failing eyesight, when he gradually developed a new pictorial language, decreasingly dependent on the precision of Ingres and the early Italian masters, and more and more sympathetic to the sonorities of Delacroix and the Venetians. The reader will find an honest critical guide in the director of the Chicago Art Institute, and he may be confident that he has seen and learned the best in Degas.

In the analysis of certain pictures I could wish for more attention to the "empty" shapes between solid objects. Degas projects the bird-like grace of some of the dancers and the swift torsion of one of the nude bathers as much by the shapes surrounding the figure as by the outlines of the figure itself. In his accent on elegance Degas often chose forms with very acute angles: hence the many umbrellas. But there are many invisible umbrellas in Degas to reward the persistent observer.

THOMAS JEFFERSON, it is said from time to time, still survives. That classic remark has sometimes been an expression of hope rather than a self-evident truth, but it has proved to be an enduring and dynamic hope. One might even venture to call it the American faith, for it was Jefferson who dreamed the American dream and formulated the American creed. He survives because, over and above his statesmanship and other achievements, his vision of an ideal United States has made him the first and most telling critic of the reality. Ever since the Continental Congress cut from the Declaration of Independence his angry denunciation of black slavery, he has been a kind of national conscience. We might put him to additional uses—his significance is not to be comprehended in a few sentences—but so far we have made only a beginning.

Almost a generation ago, in the aspiring early years of the Wilson Administration, interest in Jefferson began to revive. Instead of flickering out, as such movements usually do, it has continued with increasing strength, and one may speak of it without exaggeration ■ ■ Jefferson renaissance. It is now approaching its first culmination with the publication of the "Papers of Thomas Jefferson" and of biographies more ambitious and inclusive than any since Henry S. Randall's of 1857. Randall's work was done in the great decade of American literature and is worthy of it, but it does not satisfy the needs of our time.

A biographer of Jefferson, like an actor called on to play Falstaff, knows in advance that more will be demanded of him by his audience than mortality can deliver. Until the life-span of a sedentary scholar is extended considerably, there will be no "definitive" biography: that is, one that undertakes to say everything worth saying, answer all questions, allay all controversies, and do it all in just the right way. Partial studies, disclaiming completeness or finality, are the rule and must remain so until the great enterprise in progress at Princeton is nearer its goal.

Within certain manageable limits Dumas Malone seems destined to approximate the ideal. "Jefferson and His Time" began handsomely in 1948 with a first volume subtitled "Jefferson the Virginian," and the second volume, "Jefferson and the Rights of Man," covering the years in Europe and the first three in Washington's Cabinet, is even better. The biography expands as it advances, despite various signs, already apparent in the previous instalment, that Professor Malone was having to compress his materials more than he had anticipated. Even so, the four volumes originally announced have proved insufficient; the completed work will extend to at least five.

"Jefferson and His Time" is, generally speaking, a political biography, with other aspects of Jefferson's career subordinated though by no means neglected. Mr. Malone is well aware of them, and his understanding of Jefferson is deepened by his appreciation of their significance for the interpretation of Jefferson's ultimate purposes, which were not confined to the realm of politics.

Mr. Malone is equal to his theme at all points, but he is at his best where the progress is roughest and there is most need for his rigorous historical technique and delicate insight into the workings of Jefferson's mind. From the time when Jefferson entered on his duties as Secretary of State, he is enveloped in the smoke and fog of partisan controversy, through which students have groped uncertainly. Mr. Malone penetrates the smog as an infra-red ray. Since historical facts are hardly separable from the values attached to them, the acrimonious old debate will doubtless continue, but here is the clearest, most searching account of the matter yet written. Its continuation will be awaited eagerly.

My general observation about the state of Jefferson's biography should be remembered in judging Mr. Schachner's closely printed, well-filled volumes. His work has been in preparation over a period of twenty years—laborious years, it is quite evident—during which he has also produced able, rather controversial studies, on the whole the best so far published, of Aaron Burr and Alexander Hamilton. His masterpiece is also controversial, but the controversy should not obscure its merits.

With the possible exception of the ever useful Randall, who wrote while Jefferson's personal archive was still preserved intact, it is the most inclusive collection of information about every aspect and period of Jefferson's life that has ever been worked up into a biography. An astonishing amount of it has been collected from unprinted sources, the harvest of Mr. Schachner's independent, wide-ranging study of the basic materials for Jefferson's life. This feature alone would insure a long period of usefulness for this biography, which is highly readable and generally well documented.

Mr. Schachner has not contributed as much to our understanding of his subject. His admirable collection of information about the man has been imperfectly transformed into knowledge of him. For the most part he writes, to put it succinctly, in the spirit of Montaigne. Although such an attitude has excellent biographical uses, it is not the best way of looking at Jefferson: some underestimation of his stature becomes inevitable. Even this attitude is not maintained steadily, for at times he lapses into harsh judgments and a willingness to believe the worst about Jefferson. These lapses, though unfortunate, are not characteristic of the biography as a whole; it clears Jefferson of many a long-standing and sometimes plausible charge. What one misses is that firm grasp of Jefferson's underlying character that would have warned his biographer when he was on treacherous ground.

"The Papers of Thomas Jefferson," publication of which began in May of 1950 and has proceeded at a steady pace, is the most elaborate and significant edition of an American writer ever undertaken, and it is the one most needed. The publisher states that "no previous edition has included more than 15 per cent of the total, and only about a fifth of the documents included in this edition have ever been published anywhere." If these unpublished documents—to locate them the five continents have been explored—were of interest only to a company of historians and their pupils, one could bridle one's enthusiasm. But Jefferson is, or should be, a precious part of our cultural heritage. Because of the occasional nature of his writings it is necessary to sift them all and, in Nietzsche's meaningful words, "to read him philologically" in order to understand the man and the nature and course of his thinking. Such sound work as has been done in Jeffersonian studies has been accomplished under heavy difficulties.

There are compensations in having had to wait so long for an authoritative edition. The art of the historical editor has attained a clear understanding of its function and has instruments for its use unavailable not so many years ago. Nor could such an edition, monumental in the best sense, be executed, or even planned, until an auspicious intellectual climate had formed. The old view of Jefferson as a statesman, law-giver, and party founder with an amusing string of foibles and recreations had to yield to a more spacious conception of his significance. The new understanding of Jefferson finds its expression in Mr. Boyd's General View of the Work prefixed to Volume I, and that understanding pervades the entire work. Consummate editorial skill is united with sympathy with every least detail of Jefferson's thought and activities. The result could not be happier. Few writers have been so well presented to a world that needs them.

UNAMBO. A Novel of the War in Israel. By Max Brod. Translated by Ludwig Lewisohn. Farrar, Straus and Young. $3. The newest addition to the growing library of novels about Israel's war of independence was apparently written in the midst of the struggle by the Israeli man of letters who seems fated to be remembered primarily as Kafka's friend and literary executor. The stirring events are seen through the double vision of a sensitive film director who, by means of a supernatural gadget—Unambo—given him by the devil, leads simultaneously a positive existence fighting for the new state and a negative one consorting with black-marketeers and a shady movie actress. Despite an intriguing portrait of the actress and some good battle scenes, Mr. Brod's new novel is muddy, weakly constructed, and in the main unsuccessful as an analysis of the clash of good and evil at a critical point in recent history.

LONDON LADIES. TRUE TALES OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. By Lucy Poate Stebbins. Columbia University Press. $3. Brief lively sketches of six ladies, all except Jane Carlyle of the eighteenth century and all except the same lady among the not too well known. They include the amiable and talented Martha Ray who comforted the life of her lover, Lord Sandwich, until she was shot down on the street by a love-crazy divinity student; the beautiful but chilly Elizabeth Inchbald who came to London from a farm to scribble farces and translate the sensational plays of Kotzebue; and the tragic daughters of Mrs. Siddons, both loved by the painter Lawrence, whom the younger could never marry because of a death-bed promise extracted by the elder. Mrs. Stebbins, best known for her previous book on the Trollope family, writes briskly and skims the cream of picturesque and dramatic incident from her wide reading. There is no attempt at great profundity, psychological or otherwise, but there is a good deal that is genuinely entertaining.

Drama

THAT old saying about two planks and a passion is receiving its ultimate illustration during the present season. It seemed astonishing enough that the First Drama Quartet could fill a theater, but the Quartet's production was lavish compared with the "Readings from Dickens" which Emlyn Williams is offering—all by himself—at the Coronet Theater. Moreover, the whole thing has reached the proportions of a Trend. Cornelia Otis Skinner is scheduled to appear soon in a one-woman drama, and Mr. Laughton is to offer readings from assorted classics. Before long those two-character dramas which occasionally appear will seem positively cluttered, and some day we may have, by way of variety, that ultimate theater proposed by an enthusiast in one of George Kaufman's comedies: "No actors, no text, no audience; just scenery and critics." A good many people have expressed the fear that modern man was forgetting how to read. Perhaps he has already forgotten and perhaps he is developing a taste for being read to. And that suggests an idea for TV. Has anyone yet tried televising a printed page? With, perhaps, a voice dubbed in for those on whom the intricacies of type impose too much of a strain.

None of this is intended to minimize the fact that Mr. Williams's performance is a tour de force remarkably successful from every standpoint, including that of the audience, which, at the performance I attended, stayed behind to applaud until the performer made a curtain speech. Obviously this is no casual parlor stunt but a virtuoso demonstration very carefully worked out to provide great variety where little variety seemed possible and to employ all the resources of voice, facial expression, and a fluid gesticulating which stops just short of acting properly so called. Mr. Williams appears, not as himself, but as Mr. Dickens, complete with whiskers, white gloves, and the geranium in his buttonhole. He advances with great dignity to the replica of that somewhat Rube Goldbergish reading desk which Dickens himself devised; he slowly removes his gloves, carefully selects a volume, and then suddenly plunges into a baroque presentation of the baroque characters and baroque language of his original.

In some curious way the fact that Mr. Williams is not reading Dickens but pretending to be Dickens reading Dickens is essential to his success. The device seems to constitute some kind of apology. It suggests that the whole thing is offered as a sort of period piece and that therefore an audience which might consider itself too sophisticated to attend a "reading" and, for that matter, too sophisticated to be either amused or touched by Dickens's old-fashioned humor and old-fashioned pathos may permit itself to enjoy the whole thing if it is allowed to regard it as quaint. But having thus saved its face, this same audience settles down to enjoy precisely what its grandfathers enjoyed somewhat more directly.

To call the performance a "reading" is inaccurate in at least two respects. In the first place, no page is presented straight through. These are "adaptations" which link bit to bit and which, despite the fact that the matter is by no means confined to dialogue passages, actually constitute set pieces. In the second place, Mr. Williams does not read, he recites. As a matter of fact, his method, far from being novel, is almost precisely that employed for a generation or two on the Chautauqua circuit and taught at various institutions, notably the Emerson School of Oratory in Boston. He varies his voice and his facial expression to fit the character or even the tone of a descriptive passage. He also interprets in gesture not merely the action of the speakers but even inanimate objects, as when, for example, describing the corpulent épergne on Mr. Podsnap's table, the one which, you may remember, was "blotched all over as if it had broken out in an eruption rather than been ornamented," he raises his joined hands over his head and imitates for our horror this repulsive but costly object. Perhaps if he were interpreting any other author Mr. Williams would seem to be overdoing things a bit. But Dickens happens to be a writer whom it is almost impossible to overdo, and as an admirer of his works I can only say that Mr. Williams actually does succeed in making a Dickens passage produce precisely the effect which the writer of it intended.

Since the present performance seems assured of great success, certain vertiginous possibilities are suggested by the thought that some ambitious actor may some day be inspired to imitate Mr. Williams imitating Dickens. There are, moreover, even more disturbing possibilities. One-man shows might promise to solve the problem of the self-defeating costliness of normal theatrical production, but unfortunately there seem to be no solutions to the problems of our times. If whatever is expensive leads to bankruptcy, whatever is inexpensive leads to unemployment. No doubt Actors' Equity will awaken to the threat as the stage hands' union awoke to it long ago. I envisage in the not distant future a back-stage and a below-stage crowded by an orchestra of twenty pieces, a group of four or five featured players, and eight or ten ordinary actors, as well as by the now familiar complement of unnecessary stage hands. They will all be stand-ins. Out front, before a simple drop "in one," a single working actor will be impersonating Mr. Williams, impersonating Dickens, impersonating Paul Dombey.

Music

B. H.
HAGGIN

FOR A while, at the beginning of the concert by the Budapest Quartet that I attended at the Y. M. H. A., I enjoyed the fine performance of a Haydn quartet in which Roisman's tone was clear and agreeable and effectively completed the sound for which Mischa Schneider's wonderful cello-playing provided the foundation. But as the concert proceeded with Mozart's Clarinet Quintet and Schubert's Quartet Opus 161 Roisman's tone was frequently coarse and scratchy, with damage to the joint performance. Clark Brody's playing of the clarinet part in the Mozart piece was admirably sensitive.

At a Carnegie Hall concert of the Boston Symphony I sat too close to the stage to be able to hear whether the blended sonority of the entire orchestra was what it used to be; but the continuing refinement of its execution and style was something I could perceive and delight in. Ansermet, usually the steadiest of musicians in Mozart, this time produced a performance of the G minor Symphony which had no continuity of pace or momentum. But after Bartok's Viola Concerto and Hindemith's "Nobilissima Visione," neither of which I found interesting, the concert ended with a brilliant performance of one of Stravinsky's most beautiful and fascinatingly contrived scores, "The Fairy's Kiss."

On the radio I have heard Cantelli conduct performances of Beethoven's Fifth with the New York Philharmonic, of Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" and works by Vivaldi with the N. B. C. Symphony, in which every precisely modeled phrase has fallen into place in the beautifully shaped, continuous, and effective progression.

London's previously issued recording of Act 2 of "Die Meistersinger" (two LP records) has been completed with Act 1 (two records) and Act 3 (three records). This makes it the most expensive version; but it is incomparably the best; and one can be satisfied to acquire Acts 2 and 3 which have most of the loveliest music. The superb Vienna State Opera cast includes Schöffler as Sachs, Edelmänn as Pogner, Dermota as David, Gueden as Eva, and Treptow—his voice as yet undamaged by the constriction in his singing—as Walther. The performance is reproduced with London's characteristic spatial depth, with the balance of singers and orchestra that Act 2 didn't have, and with clarity in the dense Wagnerian texture; and the spreading of the performance on seven records results in the sound remaining clean to the ends of the sides (distortion at these points is the thing to watch out for if, as is rumored, the completed performance is later put on six records). There are some defects: Knappertsbusch's tempos—often too slow, often uncohesive (most obviously in the Prelude); the dryness of the violins, the muffled sound of the brass in the Prelude to Act 3, the blanketing of Gueden by the other singers near the end of the quintet. But their sum is small in comparison with the excellences. The recording, finally, gives the entire work without any cuts; and the listener will be confused by the Metropolitan Opera cuts in the accompanying libretto.

Another of London's operatic hodgepodes, Vienna State Opera Concert, offers the fresh rich bass of Edelmänn again in Pizarro's Ha, welch' ein Augenblick from "Fidelio" and Falstaff's Ehi; taverniere from "Falstaff" (in German), together with excerpts from "Tannhäuser" and "The Barber of Bagdad." On the reverse side are the introduction to Act 2 and Florestan's aria from "Fidelio" with Patzak—his voice hard but his singing effective in the slow portion, the voice less agreeable and adequate in the fast portion; and excerpts from "The Tales of Hoffmann." The Vienna Philharmonic is conducted by Böhm and Moralt.

London also has issued the complete Bayreuth Festival "Parsifal" of 1951. This recording was made under the disadvantageous conditions of a public performance—disadvantageous above all for proper balance. The solo trumpet at the beginning of the Prelude is blanketed by the strings and woodwinds; the orchestra in the Good Friday Spell is blanketed much of the time by the voices. I listened to only a few passages in addition to these—only as much as was necessary to be able to report that the cast includes two superb singers, George London and Ludwig Weber, as Amfortas and Gurnemanz, Hermann Uhde as an excellent Klingsor, Wolfgang Windwassen as a hard-voiced but adequate Parsifal, and Martha Mödl as a tremulously shrill Kundry who occasionally manages a clear climactic high note; that the woodwinds, and especially the flutes, are again shockingly poor and inadequate for the radiance which the score calls for them to produce; and that Knappertsbusch's tempos are again uncohesive and destructive of momentum in the flow of the music. I listened only to these few passages because I could not bring myself to listen to more and would not ask anyone else to do so. The philosophical pretensions, the verbal jargon, and the endless declamation of the "Ring" are hard enough to endure; but Wagner's dramatic theme in "Parsifal"—this sensualist's exaltation of chastity decked out in religious mumbo-jumbo—I find extremely repellent (I would expect a religious person to be outraged by it); and though the music includes pages as miraculous as the Good Friday Spell, most of it reveals an astonishing and boring enfeeblement of the powers of invention and development that are so prodigious in preceding works.

From Urania a complete recording of Smetana's engagingly melodious "The Bartered Bride," sung in German by Böhme (Kezal), Traute Richter, Sebastian Hauser, and other good singers with the chorus and orchestra of the Berlin Civic Opera under Hans Lenzer's direction. The brilliant overture is played with less than the speed and verve it calls for; but after that the performance is well-paced and effective. The singers sound too close to the microphone; but the balance of singers and orchestra is good. The German text in the libretto often doesn't correspond with what is sung.

Sayao's somewhat over-expansive performance of Ahi fors è lui and superb performance of Sempre libera from "La Traviata" of several years back have been issued on a Columbia LP, with a Villa-Lobos piece.

Students' Petition to McGrath

Dear Sirs: Your readers may be interested to know that the Committee Against Violence in Florida at Central Michigan College has obtained from a student body of 1,600 approximately 559 signatures to a petition which was sent to Attorney General J. Howard McGrath on January 20 demanding that the Justice Department take action against the recent violence in Florida. The committee has also prepared a pamphlet entitled "Democracy as Practiced in Florida" which has been sent to the editors of 118 college newspapers in the Midwest.

The Nation deserves applause for its splendid exposé of the products of reaction in Florida and elsewhere.

Governor Stevenson's Record

Dear Sirs: The article by Len Schroeter in the February 9 issue of The Nation on racial violence in Cairo, Illinois, does not give an accurate account of the role of Governor Adlai Stevenson and the Illinois Commission on Human Relations.

It may be true, as Schroeter suggests, that the Governor did not reply directly to a telegram from Roy Wilkins, but he answered it by being closely and personally in touch with the brewing violence in Cairo. The director of the Illinois Commission on Human Relations, Russell Babcock, was in Cairo on January 26 and intermittently afterward. As a professional race-relations adviser with vast experience with racial violence, he was not foolish enough to tell anybody that—as Schroeter says—"there was nothing to worry about." Indeed, Schroeter, before making these serious charges against the Governor and Babcock, did not talk with either of these gentlemen.

The tragic fact is that the Cairo school board has been breaking the state law for years in maintaining segregated public schools and that after some Negro children enrolled in "white" schools in January, there was violence; and there is still high tension in the community. For this, many are to blame, and probably no governor and no official commission can do enough. Yet two days after the bombing, four white persons were arrested, and the Governor and his commission have been doing a great deal to establish law and order—and justice—in Cairo. Thus in our judgment Schroeter is mistaken in asserting—whenever he wrote his article—that "more energetic action might have been looked for from the liberal Governor Adlai Stevenson."

Nobody is perfect, but we were tremendously impressed with the vigorous and courageous role of Governor Stevenson and the Illinois commission during and after the race riots in Cicero last summer. We have continued to be impressed with the role of the Governor and the Illinois State Employment Service in recently eliminating all discriminatory job orders. And in the handling of the Cairo tension and violence the Governor has not marred his enviable record.

SPARTACUS

The Strange Story of a Book

IN A PREVIOUS statement in The Nation I told the readers of this magazine something about why I and no commercial publisher brought out my new novel, Spartacus. I feel that it is of great importance now to detail something of the history of this book since its publication not so long ago. For the history of this venture becomes more than the story of just a book.

When I made the decision to publish this book myself late in October of 1951, I ordered a thousand copies to be printed, to be sold by subscription at $5 apiece. While the manuscript was still being corrected, these thousand copies were sold, and I increased the first printing to 2500 copies. However, these books were so quickly subscribed to that while the book was still on press I ordered a second edition of 7500 copies.

I still had not plated the book, nor did I yet consider it in terms of mass publication. People who had no idea of the contents or the value of the book were ordering it and sending money in advance to pay for it. However, there were sufficient of these amazing orders for me to decide to make plates and to go to press with a third printing.

Plates were manufactured, and at the end of December I ordered a third printing of 5000 copies, bringing the total now printed to 15,000 copies. At the same time Liberty Book Club had ordered its own edition of 6500 copies, so I could say that 20,000 copies of the book were already in print. By January 15 the bulk of the 15,000 copies I had ordered for myself had been sold, and I ordered a fourth printing of 3600 copies.

By February 1st it became apparent that these 3600 copies would soon be exhausted, and at the time of this writing I am giving instructions for a fifth printing of 5000 copies. Thus only a few days after the official date of publication, there are 23,600 copies of Spartacus in print, not including the Liberty Book Club Edition.

The price of Spartacus, clothbound and in a dust wrapper, is $2.50. Use the coupon below. Send check, money order or cash. If sending cash, 50¢ in stamps may be enclosed along with the bills.

NATION

I do not wholly know how to account for the strange success of this book. But I realize that in publishing it I have had an experience unique to American writers, for over 4000 letters have been written to me concerning this book and my writing in general.

From these letters I came to understand that through my own life and struggle, books I write have symbolic importance in terms of the struggle for American culture and for the rich American traditions of freedom and democracy. Reading these 4000 letters has been one of the most moving experiences of my whole life. From them I learned enormously. I came close to people who read books and who know what they want in reading.

I had gentle and generous and warm and good advice from the very old, the very young, the worker, the professional, the housewife, the artist. I have nameless letters from people in government service, and heart-rending letters from young men in the armed services. I have letters from Negro people, from Jewish people, from Americans whose ancestors came over on the Mayflower, and from Americans whose ancestors came over in steerage a generation ago.

From these letters I have learned a tremendous lot, and I am profoundly grateful for them. I have quoted many of them, but now there are too many to quote from here, and I do not think that there is too much point in quoting.

Spartacus is a book which tells of struggle, of the fight for human dignity, and of the age-old and timeless resistance to tyranny which will some day liberate all of mankind. It is a book which people have not been afraid to buy. Storekeepers, who only a year ago were intimidated, are carrying this book on their shelves, and already more than two hundred public libraries have ordered it directly from me.

Now I want to use this book, if it is possible, to batter down some of the ramparts of ignorance, intolerance and censorship that have been erected in America over the past several years. I already have some indication that this book, which commercial publishers were afraid to publish, may be a unique best seller of our times. But that depends, in the last analysis, upon you.

I urge you to order Spartacus, to read it, to let me know what you think of it and how it can be distributed even more widely in a land where so much of the process of distribution is concentrated in the hands of a few.

I am not simply asking you to help me. I am asking you to help in a mutual struggle upon which so much depends.

Lawmakers on Television

Oklahoma City

TELEVISION has had a multitude of "firsts" as it has integrated itself into the life of the nation, but perhaps the most important was marked up by WKY-TV in Oklahoma City when it televised the proceedings of the Oklahoma legislature twice weekly during the whole past session. Considered an experiment by many, although not by station manager P. A. Sugg, who conceived the idea, the program was so successful that it will undoubtedly be continued, and perhaps expanded, in the future.

The first of these telecasts was made on January 2, 1951, when the outgoing governor, Roy J. Turner, addressed the opening session. The cameras were on hand again to cover incoming Governor Johnston Murray's address a week later. The following week the lawmakers granted the station permission to begin its twice-weekly telecasts.

Several of the legislators objected to having their actions exposed to the candid eye of the TV camera. "It's the silliest thing I ever heard of," one said. "We have some ham actors in both houses," he went on, "and if one man gets up and makes a fool of himself, the people back home will think we're all that way." Another complained, "The press and radio are continually harassing us every time we open our mouths. I don't see why we should let television do it too."

The state's newspapers were jokingly pessimistic. The Shawnee News-Star said that house members would have to decide among themselves who were to be the heroes and who the villains of the show and make their roles clear—"the public doesn't like to be puzzled." J. Leland Gourley, publisher of the Henryetta Daily Free-Lance, declared: "All may go well at first, but just wait until the lawmakers start getting their fan mail and their constituents tell them what a bunch of jackasses they are."

Actually the conduct of the legislators before the cameras was exemplary. Television even accomplished, on its first day, what the lieutenant governor had been unable to do for sixteen years. Senators marched into the house in a body for the house-senate joint session. The reaction of the public soon dispelled the fears of those who had worried that television might give a false view of them. It was seen that there could be no bias or political prejudice in the report of a session by direct telecast.

Television, of course, cannot follow all the work of the legislature, for much is done in committee meetings, and some sessions last all day. The WKY-TV telecasts were scheduled from 2 to 3 p. m. each Tuesday and Thursday. House and senate leaders tried to discuss the bills of greatest public interest during those hours, but the audience still caught only a brief glimpse of what the legislature was doing.

One of the most valuable results was the stimulation of public interest in government. As all journalists know, people are always eager to read about something they have seen happen. "When WKY-TV started its telecasts of the legislature we had a great increase in calls about the bills they were debating," reported Ralph Sewell, city editor of the Daily Oklahoman. "Viewers who had been watching the debate on a bill would call up to find out what had finally been done about it." Television also helped clarify some of the parliamentary procedures that we had been trying to explain for years—such as the difference between the 'committee of the whole house' and the house itself."

WKY-TV's news bureau chief, Ewing Canaday, handled the commentary for the telecasts and interrupted the continuity only to identify a speaker or explain a complicated parliamentary procedure. He usually had the clerk of the house on hand to help him do this.

Preparing for the one-hour telecast required about six hours' work by three or four engineers. WKY-TV has a special mobile unit for remote telecasts, but after it was parked outside the Capitol building, engineers had to carry in hundreds of pounds of equipment—cameras, tripods, and cables—and set it up in the house galleries. The microwave relay parabola also had to be lined up with a relay station on top of a downtown skyscraper, from which the signal could be sent to the transmitter building north of the city. Technical direction was handled from the control room in the mobile unit.

Skepticism about the legislative telecasts among the legislators changed to wholehearted approval in a short time. Representative Kessler of Oklahoma City said he only wished it were possible to have a camera and microphone in every committee room so that no secrets could be kept from the public. Another member of the house called the program a great step toward bringing the people and the legislature closer together, "and that, of course, makes for better government." He recalled how difficult it used to be, in the days of bad roads and poor communications, for the people to keep in touch with their representatives. "About all they could do was elect a man, send him to the legislature, and hope he would do the right thing. Instead, most of them did as they pleased."

During the past session one member, when asked if he would yield the floor, answered, "No, I'm not going to yield. I've got five minutes on television and I'm going to use it."

FINAL RESULTS OF INDIA'S FIRST GENERAL election since attaining independence are still to come, but one thing is clear: a bold democratic experiment has been triumphantly vindicated. Universal suffrage, introduced by the new constitution, raised the electorate from 30 to 176 million men and women, 85 per cent of them illiterate. Yet the polling was carried out with complete order, and there have been very few reports of fraud or corruption. Moreover, the right to vote was exercised by more than 50 per cent of those eligible—a greater proportion than in our own last Presidential election. As anticipated, the Congress Party, headed by Prime Minister Nehru, won a large majority. In the central Parliament, or House of the People, it will have about two-thirds of the seats, and it will control most of the state assemblies. The chief surprise was the concentrated strength shown by the Communists and their allies in certain districts, particularly in the south of India. They will apparently form the second-largest party in Parliament, and if they can obtain the support of a few independents, should be able to organize governments in two important states—Madras and Travancore-Cochin. Both of these mainly rural states are exceptionally poverty-stricken, and the Communists successfully exploited the long-smoldering discontent of millions of peasants owning little or no land. On the other hand, the Communists made no headway in industrial areas like Bombay, where they might have been expected to do well. Their victories, therefore, are a warning to the Nehru government to tackle land problems more vigorously. It should be the better able to do so, and to meet this new challenge from the left, since the extreme right-wing, orthodox Hindu groups were heavily defeated.

ON MAY 15, 1941, ACCORDING TO TESTIMONY developed at the Nürnberg war-crimes trials, a Luftwaffe physician wrote to his friend Himmler asking for "two or three professional criminals" to be used as guinea pigs for medical research. The physician got his two or three; in a matter of days the number grew into two or three hundred; in a matter of months, into thousands and tens of thousands—all drawn from Himmler's inexhaustible store of concentration-camp humanity. Thus was ushered in one of the most fiendish chapters of Nazi history. The great tradition of German science degenerated into senseless butchery in the hands of Nazi "researchers." The Roentgen ray became a weapon for mass sterilization; the discoveries of Koch were harnessed, not to the cure of disease, but to its propagation. The researchers froze their victims, cooked them, crushed them in vacuum cabinets, inoculated them with diseases known and unknown. Reports on the experiments were submitted regularly to German army and S. S. medical leaders, including General Walter P. Schreiber, commander of the German Military Medical Academy, who on several occasions himself assigned doctors to this kind of experimental work. Today Dr. Schreiber, brought to the United States by the army, is teaching at the Air Force School of Aviation Medicine at Randolph Field, Texas. A group of Boston physicians, their consciences outraged, are demanding his prompt expulsion and an investigation of his admission to this country. The Boston Globe and other newspapers and individuals have taken up the fight. It is inconceivable that any American should want to stay out of it.

THE LARGEST WHITE-COLLAR STRIKE IN history ended last week when 15,000 members of the Insurance Agents International Union (A. F. of L.) voted by a narrow margin to accept a compromise settlement offered by the Prudential Life Insurance Company. The workers had asked for a $20 increase in their weekly minimum wage. What they got was an average increase of $5.36—not in their minimum wage, but in commissions and expenses—plus a per capita lump payment of $150. Moreover, the increase was provided for in a two-year contract which is not subject to wage review. This was the best that could be offered, apparently, by a company which had spent $5,000,000 in advertising to fight the strike and which in the course of the dispute was able to lend the International Business Machine Company $115,000,000. The workers did win compulsory arbitration of grievances, pension-plan concessions, and under certain circumstances the right to work week-ends on other jobs. But they lost their demand for a union shop. "Our most significant gain," said a strike leader, "was the fact that we now have a union recognized by the company as well as the workers." It is apparently a tough union, too; the rank-and-file vote to return to work ran only three to two after a WHOLESALE ARRESTS IN ARGENTINA ARE being justified by stories of conspiracies and assassination plots directed against President Perón and his wife, Evita. A more probable explanation is that Perón, unable to arrest the inflationary crisis produced by his economic policies, is seeking to prevent in advance the organization of an effective opposition to take advantage of growing discontent. Since 1949, when the government announced that wage-price relationships had been stabilized, prices have risen at least 80 per cent. For a time real wages kept pace with this increase, but in recent months they have been declining and they seem destined to drop still more since Perón is being forced to reverse his agricultural policies and pay farmers higher prices in an effort to check the steady fall in production of wheat and meat. Hitherto the Institute for Promotion of Foreign Trade has bought these and other commodities for much less than the prices at which it sold them to foreign markets. The profits accumulated in this fashion have been used to stimulate industrial production and finance grandiose public works. Thus the urban workers, organized in Perón's trade unions, have been kept happy. Farmers, however, have cut back production, while in the past two years output has been further reduced by severe drought. As a result exports have declined sharply and Argentina's trade deficit has attained record proportions. Now Perón, in an attempt to save the situation, is calling for austerity, to be signalized by two meatless days a week, and has promised the farmers a 33 per cent increase in prices. But if he is to check further inflation, he will have to clamp down on the expansion of urban investments, which will cause unemployment, and limit new wage increases. Evidently, under these circumstances, he is not sure how far he can rely on the loyalty of the "shirtless ones" who have been the mainstay of his regime.

THE AMERICAN ISOLATIONIST IS A QUEER political animal. He is not really opposed to war; he merely wants others to do his fighting for him. Like the late Henry Ford, the isolationist says, "Let's you and him have a fight." Consider, for example, recent remarks by Senator Taft about American policy in the Far East. He would arm and equip not only the Nationalist Chinese on Formosa but also the anti-Communist forces in Burma, Thailand, and other Asian countries. But under no circumstances—that is, "unless we were absolutely sure of winning"—would the Senator favor sending American forces to the areas where American-equipped Asians are fighting the good fight against Communists. Asked if American forces should be sent to areas where it was clear the "anti-Communist" forces could not hold out alone, the Senator replied: "No, they would just have to fall." Asians, both Communist and anti-Communist, will surely take note of this cynical remark.

A WELCOME SIGN OF GROWING MATURITY in the political arm of American labor was seen early this year when the C. I. O.'s Committee to Abolish Discrimination and the United Automobile Workers' Fair Practices and Discrimination Department participated in hearings before Secretary of the Interior Chapman on the proposed regulations governing contract relations between Indians and their attorneys. Apparently labor has finally recognized the political importance of alliances with "have-not" groups. So far as the memory of living Westerners extends, this is the first time organized labor has taken a stand on behalf of American Indians. Behind this departure is the significant fact that Indians, formerly denied the franchise, are now voting in several Western states, and that their vote could represent the margin of victory in a close election. Incidentally, the Indians and their allies, including the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the American Jewish Committee, the American Bar Association, and the unions, won a sweeping victory, convincing Mr. Chapman that the proposed regulations should be withdrawn.

Lisbon: Peace or Provocation?

BY FRED KIRCHWEY

AFTER so much initial pessimism it was natural that the decisions at Lisbon should have been greeted in the American press with almost breathless enthusiasm. On paper at least, a step of revolutionary significance was taken in the handsome Parliament building which ordinarily serves such narrow and formal uses. The unborn European defense community with its still more embryonic six-nation army was unanimously endorsed by the fledgling North Atlantic Council against political odds which had recently seemed too great to be overcome. How great were these odds is made evident by Alexander Werth in his story this week of France's agonized retreat on the issue of rearming Germany. The result at Lisbon was an American victory, and the general in command was Secretary Acheson. Whatever sort of history was made there, the chief credit or blame will be his.

But Lisbon is a small paragraph in a long tale, most of it still untold. The next chapters will open in the far more real parliament halls of the Allied powers, and at Bonn, where the neatly dovetailed plans must be ratified if they are to be anything but votes recorded on paper. That ratification will mean an even tougher fight than the pre-Lisbon debate reported by Mr. Werth, is indicated in the prompt defiant statements issued by the chief non-government parties in France, both left and right. In Germany a different but almost equally bitter struggle is promised; its next rounds will take place in the negotiations over the new "contractual relations" between Bonn and the chief Western Allies. And beyond ratification, if it is won, lie the monumental problems of financing and bringing into physical and political being the European-NATO defense system. Viewed in the context of Europe's economic crisis and the profound instability it has bred, the prospect is one which should provide sober second thoughts to the most exuberant editorial page. The fact is, everything but the decisions remain to be accomplished, and the real obstacle to accomplishment is the feeling, first, that the danger of Soviet attack is not great enough to warrant the fantastic effort and sacrifice demanded by the American program and, second, that it may be increased rather than exorcised by the creation of an armed alliance stretching from Turkey to Norway—including the Germans.

This feeling, voiced in the French Assembly even by Jules Moch, the bitterly anti-Communist former Defense Minister, can hardly have been diminished by the analysis of Russia's aims and intentions which the North Atlantic Council deputies submitted to the NATO Foreign Ministers at a "highly restricted" session at Lisbon. Summarized in the New York Times by C. L. Sulzberger, the unpublished report presented a picture of intensified cold-war activities on the part of Russia, ranging from efforts to "prevent harmony in ideas between Western Europe and the United States" and neutralize and unify Germany, to an attempt "to extend Communist influence over India," reinforce Soviet bonds with Communist China, neutralize Japan, "foment tension in Southeast Asia," sap Western influence in the Middle East, and "encourage anti-imperialist moves in such areas as Egypt and Morocco." The significance of the analysis, described by Mr. Sulzberger as "exceptionally important," is obviously not in its familiar ingredients but in the fact that it was prepared as a basis for determination of policy by the Western alliance. As such, it is truly an astonishing document, for it offers no hint that Moscow plans to carry out its purposes by military means—not even in Asia. While the report declares that Russia's policy is, in Mr. Sulzberger's words, "revolutionary, expansionist," and aimed at establishing a "world Communist system under Moscow's domination," it also insists that Moscow wishes "at all costs to avoid 'excessive risk' to the Soviet Union itself." As a result Soviet policy "is always sensitive to the real or imagined fears of encirclement and preoccupied with the security of the highways leading to the Eurasian land mass." The document also ascribed to Moscow "the desire not only to prevent the rebirth of Europe's economic development but then, afterward, to push Communist governments to power in that area." While the report sees no likelihood that the Soviet Union intends to withdraw from Germany to support its unification propaganda, it considers as certain Moscow's refusal to permit a "rearmed and unified" Germany to associate with the West.

One could not read Mr. Sulzberger's outline of this "exceptionally important analysis" without wondering what earthly relevance it had to the revolutionary scheme of an integrated, armed "free" world agreed upon in unfree Portugal. Rather it was an argument for moderation in military planning, a warning against the creation of a German army, a clear call for positive, democratic solutions in Asia and the Middle East. It made a case for diplomacy rather than force alone; for an effort to dispel compulsive fears and suspicions, rather than match and top them. In fact, the NATO deputies produced a document which could be better used by an opposition party in the French Assembly than by M. Schuman.

The same copy of the Times reported the collapse of the Mexican-United States talks on military aid. The headline blamed "red pressure," but Mexico's resistance to any agreement which commits it to "the defense of democracy" throughout the world needs no nudge from Moscow. Next day Indonesia's Cabinet fell on the same issue; some eight nations are balking at the conditions imposed by the Mutual Security Act. Even more pertinent perhaps is the challenge to military commitments abroad contained in the Berry resolution adopted last week by Congress and on the foreign policy debate in the House of Commons. From one side of the world to the other men and governments question the validity of American insistence that arms come first and all else, even food and shelter and independence, comes only after Russia and its "revolutionary, expansionist" purposes have been contained. There is the further suspicion, spread not by Moscow agents but by men in our own Administration, in Congress, and in the armed services, that containment means the active instigation and support of counter-revolution, that no matter how much we talk of "defense" and "peace" we plan the ultimate rolling-back of Soviet power. To such a program few nations will voluntarily commit themselves, the less if they feel themselves directly in the way of that power.

An interesting if unintended commentary on the pre-conceptions of American policy was made by John Foster Dulles on the very day the Lisbon agreement was announced. Demanding a revival of "dynamism" in our international relations, Mr. Dulles said that Soviet communism "represents today the active, dynamic element, and the free world represents the static, passive element." Although he may fully approve of an armed Europe and surely disapproves of Moscow, the State Department's Republican adviser declared that communism had won its victories primarily through social ideas and that almost no part of its expansion had been due to the old-fashioned method of open military aggression. Pointing to our vast expenditures on arms and for loans and grants to other countries, Mr. Dulles emphasized the urgency of "non-material" methods. "Today," he said, "a revolutionary spirit grips over half the human race. There are passions that cannot be allayed by oil royalties or suppressed by foreign guns." The statesmen assembled at Lisbon drew up a plan that makes sense only if Russian "dynamism" is harnessed to a policy of old-fashioned, open military aggression. On any other assumption it is a self-defeating monstrosity, for it stands squarely in opposition to those social and political changes which, if Moscow's purposes are being accomplished chiefly by ideas rather than war, alone could check the expansive force of communism and counter its revolutionary appeal.

Needed—a Victor Hugo

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

IN THE present state of the world—with former fascists and collaborators regaining power and anti-fascists persecuted or pushed aside—no literary figure of the past century has a more pertinent message for us than the great Victor Hugo. It is appropriate, therefore, to celebrate the centenary of his exile, which was an event of primary importance for France and all Western Europe, and to listen again to his formidable voice, denouncing not only the tyrant but even more the cowards who always find some pretext for giving up the struggle. His love of liberty and hatred of oppression are an inextinguishable flame.

Victor Hugo was above all one of those embodiments of the French spirit in whom thought and action are one. He was not satisfied simply to "agree in principle" with the people's aspirations and express his resistance to arbitrary power in disillusioned and impotent verse. He denied that a poet could excuse his retirement to an ivory tower in the face of injustice by claiming to be too sensitive to enter the political arena or too sophisticated to agitate for a cause. "If in our epoch of social and revolutionary change," he wrote a century ago, "an author feels that he is required to defend the people's rights, he must accept the requirement, unless he would betray the people, as an order to perpetual combat." But for Hugo there was an even lower category of intellectuals than the ones who withdrew from the struggle—those who fought on the wrong side, absolving themselves on the ground of "defending their country" or pretending that their "first duty was to prevent anarchy." Change "anarchy" to "communism," and his words are beautifully applicable today.

Goethe believed that a poet should turn his back on the turbulence and pressures of contemporary life and construct a private Olympus, where his sensibility would be protected from the clamor of the masses. Hugo, like Voltaire and Rousseau and the more enlightened leaders of the French Revolution, threw his whole being into the great battle of the age. His political development was extremely significant. He came from a conservative family, his father having been a general under Napoleon, and in 1818 the young Hugo was a royalist. In 1824 he called himself a royalist-liberal, in 1827 a liberal, in 1828 a liberal-socialist, in 1830 a liberal-socialist-democrat, in 1849 a liberal-socialist-democrat-republican.

It was in this last year that he became the poet par excellence of the struggle for liberty; Péguy called him later a pagan prophet. His anger at the intervention of French troops against the Roman Republic in aid of the Pope completed his ideological progress from conservatism to extreme radicalism. After that he joined the left leaders, Alexandre Ledru-Rollin and Jules Favre, in defending the republic in fiery speeches. When actual fighting broke out, he abandoned the usual weapons of a writer of his rank—the platform and the press—and helped man the barricades across the Paris boulevards, where the people challenged the government's armed forces.

He was a statesman; underlying his virulent imprecations against tyranny were the constructive ideas of a man eminently qualified to rule. He used his pen with a unique mixture of aggressiveness and charm against the Emperor and the intellectuals who would see liberty betrayed rather than risk their careers. When he referred to Napoleon the Little, in contrast to Napoleon the Great, he used the phrase to castigate all the moral pettiness of the regime. If someone reminded him of what he owed to France, he replied that he placed devotion to justice and to the common man above conventional love of country. In his poetry was coined the language of the people's tribunal. He was at the same time prosecutor and judge. He brought the accusation and passed sentence. He disregarded a public opinion "artificially created by using the money of the rich to distort the truth." "That is not the voice of the people," he said; "that is the voice of lackeys."

While he became more and more radical as time went on, his early writings expressed a sense of humanity which made his evolution entirely logical. His dramas, especially "Cromwell," which denounces the greed for power of the English revolutionary leader, and "Ruy Blas," in which a commoner dares to oppose the nobility, and his powerful novel, "Les Misérables," still read with emotion by European workers, are clearly the precursors of the new theater and the new social novel. "Les Misérables" was admired by both Tolstoy and Dostoevsky and strongly influenced Russian literature of the late nineteenth and early twentieth century.

But it was as exile that Victor Hugo attained his full grandeur. When he crossed the Belgian border dressed as a workman, his disguise symbolized his identification with the proletariat. He had the worker's determination never to give up, no matter what temporary defeats he might suffer. His exile did not lessen his ardor. It only made him a stronger, more resolute fighter and heightened the splendor of his burning lyrics. His finest poems were composed in exile. When his companions fell prey to dejection and fatigue, they could always be roused by his words. In one of his poems he said: "If we are a thousand—magnificent; if we are five hundred, here we are; if we are only a hundred, that hundred will fight; and if I alone remain, I will keep the banner of liberty flying." He rebuked the pessimists who despaired because for the moment the French people were so apathetic: "You may think the French are dead. But that is not so. A people needs a long time to digest a revolution. A people which has devoured a monarchy is like a boa which has swallowed a tiger. It sleeps, but beware! It sleeps, but it will wake." Attacking the stupidities of clerical reaction, he wrote: "Does anyone believe that the instinct of liberty, the Europe of Luther, the France of Voltaire, can be destroyed by the blows of a cross? What idiocy!"

With his keen political sense he understood that he must wage war simultaneously on the monarchy and the papacy. Bonapartism and clericalism were two aspects of the same despotism, and if for Bonapartism one reads fascism and if one perceives the parallel between the support given to Napoleon the Little by the Catholic church and the support now given by that same church to reaction everywhere, Victor Hugo's glorious exile seems an episode of our own time.

The stage is set again for Victor Hugo. In "Histoire d'un Crime," which he wrote during his exile, he described the betrayal of the French people. Today he could tell the story of the crime committed against the spirit of the Liberation, which aroused such great hopes at the close of World War II. His irreverent and incisive pen would find abundant material in a period like the present, when reaction, recovered from its defeat in 1945, is again gaining ascendancy over the confused and divided progressive forces. Victor Hugo would not abandon the struggle. As in 1852, he would rally the people to new efforts.

The Fifth Freedom

Last year President Truman, speaking to the American press but addressing President Nikolai M. Shvernik of the U. S. S. R., urged the Kremlin to permit freedom of travel. But it is not the Kremlin which has arbitrarily barred hundreds of distinguished foreigners from our shores in the last few years. Nor is it the Kremlin which, by administrative decree, is preventing hundreds of Americans, distinguished and ordinary, from traveling abroad. In truth, the marvel is not that President Truman's excellent advice has not been heeded by the Kremlin; the marvel is that it has gone unheeded by our State Department and Congress.

Freedom to travel is by no means an exclusively American concept. But it is one especially cherished by us. It was at American insistence that Paragraph

2 of Article 3 was included in the United Nations Declaration of Human Rights: "Everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own, and to return to that country." For a variation of the principle, known as the freedom of the seas, we have fought long and bitter wars. And having defended it successfully against Barbary pirates, British men of war, and German U-boats, it seems inconceivable that we should now be losing it to Washington bureaucrats moving in obedience to arbitrary rulings and legislation born of cold-war hysteria.

In the three articles below The Nation presents a broad review of several aspects of this threat to the "fifth freedom," together with a program designed—in part at least—to remove it.

OUR PAPER CURTAIN

BY FOWLER HARPER

SOMEWHERE in the neighborhood of a quarter-million American citizens apply each year for passports to travel in foreign countries. A much smaller but nevertheless substantial number of foreigners apply for American visas to come here. All sorts of people travel abroad for all sorts of reasons. Business men, artists, scientists, students, scholars, writers, foreign correspondents, and invalids travel in the pursuit of their business, their profession, or their health; still others merely in the pursuit of happiness.

But a foreigner can pursue none of these things in the United States, nor an American abroad, without the consent of the State Department. Last spring Dr. Ernest B. Chain, a British chemist, a Nobel prize-winner and co-discoverer of penicillin, was denied a visa to come to this country on business of the World Health Organization, of whose antibiotics committee he is chairman. In the late fall he was again denied a visa when he wanted to attend a dinner in New York in honor of the seventy-seventh birthday of the President of Israel.

In 1947 Dr. Martin Kamen, professor of biochemistry and radiation physics at Washington University, St. Louis, and a distinguished scientist, was denied a passport to go to Israel, where he had been invited by the Weizmann Institute of Science to deliver a series of lectures. In 1948 Dr. Kamen was denied a passport to attend a scientific conference in Paris on isotopic exchange and molecular physics, sponsored by the Rockefeller Foundation. In the same year inability to get a passport prevented him from accepting an invitation from the Australian government to be a visiting professor at the national university at Canberra. In 1950 he was, for a fourth time, denied a passport, on this occasion to attend a scientific symposium in England.

It seems pretty clear that the professional work of these two scientists has been seriously interrupted and their careers interfered with. What is more important, perhaps, the progress of science, which knows no political or geographical boundaries, has been retarded. In the case of Dr. Kamen, the usual reason was given by the Passport Division—that his travel abroad would not be "in the best interests of the United States." In the case of Dr. Chain, no reason at all was given. Presumably, however, he was refused entry because the State Department did not think his visit here was in the best interest of the nation. These, of course, are not isolated cases. Corliss Lamont, scholar and writer, was recently denied a passport to travel in Italy and France in connection with his work. In 1948 Representative Leo Isaacson, a member of a political party headed by an ex-Vice-President of the United States, was not allowed to attend an international conference in Paris as an observer for the American Council for Aid to Democratic Greece, although passports were granted to several members of the Council. In 1950 Paul Robeson, singer and lecturer, was prevented from fulfilling engagements abroad by revocation of his passport.

On September 10, 1951, the International Congress of Pure and Applied Chemistry opened its meeting in New York, but a dozen of the world's leading chemists, several of them official delegates, were not present. They had been denied visas. Among them were five scientists scheduled to deliver important papers. One was Professor L. Ruzicka, a Swiss chemist, a Nobel prize-winner, and one of the distinguished scientists awarded an honorary degree at the Harvard Tercentenary Celebration in 1936. Another was Mlle Marguerite Perey, discoverer of chemical element 87, called Francium. Ironically, President Truman, a few days before, in a message to the American Chemical Society on the occasion of its Diamond Jubilee, had written: "It is a striking tribute to our democracy that so great a number of scientists can assemble here free from suspicion of one another, and free from fear of outside interference. This kind of personal freedom is our most precious national asset." It is too bad that the President's speech writer does not always know what the chief of the Passport Division is doing.

Chemistry is not the only science that is suffering from the current dearth of American visas. According to the New York Post, scientists of international reputation have been barred from attending recent sessions of nuclear physicists and geneticists. The Post, moreover, reported that the American Psychological Association, which planned in 1954 to play host here to the International Congress of Psychology, will transfer the sessions elsewhere unless "the McCarran act is changed in such a way as not to embarrass our guests."

THE Internal Security (McCarran) Act prohibits the issuance of a visa of any kind to anyone who is or ever has been a member of certain described organizations, which of course include the Communist Party and the Nazi Party. The law as to passports is not so clean-cut. The McCarran act forbids the issuance of passports to and their use by persons who are members of "Communist-action" or "Communist-front" organizations after they have registered as such or have been ordered to register by the Subversive Activities Board, as provided in the act. But to date no organization has registered or been ordered to register by the board, and when such an order is issued, the case will go all the way through the courts. It is clear that the State Department, in denying passports to Dr. Kamen and hundreds of other American citizens, has not acted under the McCarran act.

What, then, is the source of the Passport Division's authority to deny American citizens the right to leave the country? The "authority," if such it be, is pretty slim. An act of Congress originally passed in 1866 merely provides that the Secretary of State may issue passports under rules and regulations made by the President. The Secretary, through the Passport Division, handles these matters under an Executive Order from the President which empowers him to deny passports or restrict their scope and use in accordance with the "best interests" of the United States. The department has interpreted this order as vesting in the Secretary of State unrestricted discretion, subject to the review of no court in the land, to say who may and who may not travel abroad. In practice, this means that the Passport Division has that power—except in the rare instance when, owing to the political pull of the applicant or other reason, a higher official overrules it.

On some occasions—when the applicant has been convicted of crime or when a traveler abroad engages in criminal or highly immoral activities—the division will assign specific reasons for refusing or canceling a passport. But if the grounds are political, the applicant is merely advised that his exit from the country is deemed not in the "best interests" of the United States.

People who want to leave the country are advised by the department that "any applicant who has been refused a passport may request further consideration of his case and may present any additional evidence or information which he may wish to have considered." This sounds fair enough so far as it goes. But it does not go very far. When an applicant is merely told that his attendance at a scientific meeting in Paris or acceptance of a visiting professorship in Sweden is not in the "best interests" of the United States, what "additional evidence or information" can he submit which would have a bearing on whatever reason may be in the Passport Division's individual or collective mind? There are many disappointed applicants to testify that if they try to pry into the matter, they get the run-around. Thus all they can do is guess.

Dr. Kamen guessed it was because he had been accused of releasing classified information concerning the Manhattan Project, on which he worked during the war. He had denied this vigorously. The Un-American Activities Committee found that he had, in fact, made some such disclosure but also found that he had done so innocently. In any event, his present scientific interests have nothing to do with atomic research, and the Atomic Energy Commission advised the State Department that it saw no objection to his going abroad. But the Passport Division did.

An applicant for a visa is, if possible, even more in the dark about the reason for refusal. He is told nothing except that he cannot get the visa. Dr. Chain guesses that since he has never engaged in any political activity at all, it is because he went to Czechoslovakia for the World Health Organization to restore a penicillin plant. It is surmised that Professor Ruzicka was considered a threat to the security of the United States because he had failed to resign from an academy of science in one of the Iron Curtain countries to which he had been elected before the curtain was dropped. And Mlle Perey is thought to have been excluded because she had invited Mme Marie Curie to the dedication of her research laboratory some ten or a dozen years ago.

The unsuccessful applicant for a visa gets no semblance of a hearing. All he can do is try to pull wires if he is lucky enough to know somebody who knows somebody. In the case of the citizen who is denied a passport, it is pretty clear that such hearing as he gets is not worth much. He finds himself in the intolerable position of having to convince somebody that it is in the "best interests" of the country for him to leave it when an adverse decision has already been made for reasons he is not told. It is little wonder that the Passport Division seldom changes its mind once the exit permit has been refused.

Bad as it is, the McCarran act is much fairer in this respect. Members of subversive organizations are forbidden to use passports. But before an organization is proscribed, it has a full hearing before the Subversive Activities Board, with an opportunity to cross-examine adverse witnesses and the power to subpoena favorable ones. Thereafter the organization is entitled to full judicial review. The assumption that Congress, in authorizing the President to issue passports, intended to vest in him unbridled discretion to deny them without a hearing is hardly consistent with the elaborate safeguards provided by the Internal Security Act.

Before World War I anybody could leave the country and travel almost any place without a passport. Most countries now refuse to grant a visa for entry unless the applicant holds one, and so long as the national emergency continues, it is a criminal offense for a citizen to leave the United States without a passport. Thus, one of the great liberties recognized and protected by the common law, freedom to go where one wants as long as one does not interfere with the person or property of somebody else, is arbitrarily restricted by a procedure that has none of the safeguards usually associated with due process of law.

Nor is it an answer to say that it is a "privilege" and not a "right" to leave the country. When the applicant's profession or business depends in large measure on his chance for foreign travel, something more than a privilege is involved. To be sure, all or at least most legal rights are qualified. They may be restricted when the public good so requires. And no one will deny that the national security is a public good of the highest order. But in finding that a Corliss Lamont or a Paul Robeson would be more of a threat outside than inside the country, the government must act with a modicum of respect for the decencies of legal procedure which have prevailed since Magna Charta. And while a foreigner has no right to visit us without our permission, arbitrary discrimination without explanation does not foster that good-will in other countries which we so sorely need today. We can hardly expect the French or the Mexicans to take seriously the notion that a transit visa for the rector of the University of Paris to fly from LaGuardia Field to Mexico City to attend the four-hundredth anniversary of the University of Mexico would be a threat to the security of the United States. The State Department took it very seriously.

THE NAZIS COME IN

BY MILTON FRIEDMAN

NAZIS and others with bona fide fascist records are experiencing little difficulty with the United States visa regulations which are keeping from our shores so many distinguished democrats. It is true that there is a paper barrier against fascists. An amendment to the Internal Security Act of 1950 bars all present or former members of "totalitarian" parties except those who were coerced into joining or were not more than sixteen when they enrolled. But the ninth proviso, third section, of the Immigration Act of 1917, which gives discretionary power to the Attorney General to admit "otherwise inadmissible aliens applying for temporary admission," makes the barrier very fragile indeed. Moreover, the Central Intelligence Agency is empowered by Congress to import annually 100 aliens who possess strategic skills. It is not required to divulge their identity.

The ninth proviso and the C. I. A. are affording avenues of admission to some interesting people. Dr. Walter P. Schreiber, former commanding officer of the Department of Medical Science of Hitler's Supreme Command, to whom some unflattering references were made at the Nürnberg war-crimes trials, recently arrived to join the faculty of the United States Army Air Force School of Aviation Medicine at Randolph Field, Texas. Dr. Otto Reuleaux and about fifty other Germans were granted visas to attend an international meeting of industrialists held in New York in connection with a convention of the National Association of Manufacturers. Dr. Reuleaux held the Nazi title of Defense Economy Director and is on the original 1945 War Department list of those who participated in and benefited from the Hitler regime. Some of his colleagues who accompanied him to New York were also Nazi Party members and beneficiaries of the regime.

Dr. Andrija Artukovic, war-time Minister of Justice of the Nazi puppet government of Croatia, traveling under an assumed name, entered the United States as a visitor on July 16, 1948. His signature is recorded on anti-Semitic decrees, and he is charged with zealously implementing Hitler's extermination program. His temporary visa was extended three times. To escape extradition, Dr. Artukovic has applied for status as a "refugee from communism." Another Balkan collaborator cleared by the immigration service is Viorel Trifa, who participated in the pro-Nazi revolt in Bucharest in 1941 as a leader of the Iron Guard and also played a role in anti-Semitic activities.

Although the Displaced Persons Act expired last December 31, the official machinery has been kept functioning to admit 54,774 additional Volksdeutsche from Eastern Europe. Many of these people, according to Rabbi Irving Miller, ex-president of the American Jewish Congress, "volunteered for service with the execution squads which gassed and otherwise exterminated six million Jews and millions of other faiths." When Congress amended the D. P. act in 1950 it provided especially for immigration visas for General Wladyslaw Anders's Polish Corps. Among those who joined Anders's group after the war were such personalities as Roch Mankowski, commander of the Nazi concentration camp at Krems; Father I. Nahajewski, chaplain of Hitler's Ukrainian S. S. division, which murdered thousands of civilians; Dr. Wladyslaw Dering, named on the international list of war criminals for surgical experiments on living human beings at Auschwitz; Henryk Gutman, commander of camps in Austria. Approximately 11,000 visas were issued to Anders's men, who were welcomed under the Statue of Liberty as part of the "huddled masses yearning to breathe free."

PASSPORT PROCEDURES

[The American Civil Liberties Union, disturbed by restrictions on freedom of travel imposed by the United States, last week published an extensive memorandum on the subject, including in it a series of suggestions for amending passport-issuance procedures. An abridged version of the A. C. L. U. recommendations is printed below.]

1. THE Secretary of State should be asked to appoint a commission of three eminent citizens to examine the files of the Passport Division, the Secretary to use [the commission's report] as a basis for the formulation in advance of standard grounds for denial of passports and for the creation of administrative machinery for conducting a review.

2. While the A. C. L. U. recognizes that the United States government must have the power to protect the nation against any "clear and present danger" (and under present circumstances perhaps also against dangers which are neither wholly clear nor demonstrably present), the "right to travel" should be recognized subject only to reasonable restrictions and safeguarded by due process of law. No restriction is reasonable unless it is expressed in clear criteria defined before the event. An Act of Congress is needed which will make the issuance of a passport to an American citizen mandatory, and will prohibit its revocation, except for specifically stated reasons.

3. The A. C. L. U. is convinced that the Department of State has on occasion denied or revoked passports for reasons connected with the applicants' political beliefs or associations, as in the case of members of extreme left-wing groups who wished to go abroad to attend conferences or to fulfil speaking engagements. While the union recognizes that criticism of the United States by citizens traveling abroad has some tendency to impair the prestige of the United States, and that many such criticisms are untrue and unfair, it sees no reason for foreclosing abroad utterances of the sort that constitutional guaranties permit within the United States. On the other hand, if the State Department has evidence from which it can reasonably infer that the passport will be used for the purpose of engaging in conspiratorial activities against the peace and security of the United States, refusal of the passport would be proper.

4. The passport provisions of the McCarran act, in their present form, should be repealed, because a passport should not be denied solely on the basis of membership in an organization.

5. Whether or not clear and comprehensible standards for the issuance or denial of a passport are established, procedural safeguards against abuse of discretion are urgently needed. A formalized procedure should therefore be established within the Department of State to review initial determinations respecting passports; the department should be required to reveal the basis for denials or revocations (except when it appears and is demonstrated to the satisfaction of a court that the applicant may be involved in espionage or sabotage and that the disclosure of sources might impede counter-intelligence); and judicial review of abuse of discretion should be provided.

6. Appropriate cases should be selected or instituted to test (a) the constitutionality of the denial of notice and hearings of any sort to persons refused passports; (b) the constitutionality of denials or revocations of passports on the basis of political beliefs and associations; (c) the applicability of the Administrative Procedure Act to the issuance of passports; and (d) the extent of right of judicial review, independent of that act.

France in Torture

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

Paris, February 20

A DYING man, supporting himself on crutches, made his way to the rostrum of the National Assembly and told of his experience in Buchenwald—he had been a cripple ever since, and now, very soon, was going to die. "We Frenchmen who survived Buchenwald swore that never again should Germany be allowed to build up its military power. I have come here to renew that oath. I am going to die, Mr. President. I am going to die because of what the Germans did to me. I warn you, do not trust the Germans!" Deeply moved, the whole Assembly rose and cheered. Men had tears in their eyes as they watched George Heuillard, a Radical deputy, painfully make his way down the steps and start back to the hospital.

In terms of practical politics this kind of scene has no weight. But emotionally it has a great deal, and it was typical of the atmosphere of the five-day debate on the European army. "The gravest decision since Munich," "the most difficult problem France has had to face since the war"—that was the way many of the speeches began. Philippe Barrès, Gaullist deputy, said that not in all its long history had France been called upon to make a surrender like this.

The critics of the European army showed the greatest conviction and self-assurance; the government spokesmen were defensive, dwelling continually on the "lesser evil." Even the soprano trills of that prima donna of the M. R. P., Pierre-Henri Teitgen, sounded out of tune, for those who formerly sponsored "Europe" have lost their ardor since hearing what Adenauer means by "Europe." One of Adenauer's underlings recently told the Monde correspondent: "Just wait till we have fifteen divisions, and we'll talk a different language to France." And Adenauer himself said at Hanover last December 13: "Our chief reason for wanting to enter the European army is to be able to recover our eastern territories."

"Europe" cuts no ice any more, now that Churchill has made plain the British position. "Yes, we wanted Europe, but we don't want this abortion of a Europe," Jules Moch said. A Europe—or a European army—without Scandinavia, and especially without Britain, made no sense at all. Britain alone could give it balance. Without Britain, there was only a Franco-German tête-à-tête in which France would become, before long, the junior partner. M. Schuman must be absolutely firm about not allowing Germany into NATO, M. Moch went on. Germany was bursting with territorial ambitions and only too ready to provoke a war with Russia. He (M. Moch), was one of the authors of the Pleven plan, but now he felt like "denying his paternity of the European army." He warned that if the government did not take sufficient notice of the wishes of the Assembly, or was overruled by the United States, the Assembly would in the end refuse to ratify the European-army treaty.

M. Moch made two other important points. He said it was essential to obtain an Anglo-American guaranty that the Germans, if "integrated" into the European army, would not "at the signal of a clandestine General Staff" suddenly break loose and declare themselves autonomous. And since the Russians were willing to talk disarmament in the U. N. Disarmament Commission, it was only right to give the commission a chance to make its report on June 1 without sabotaging its work by hasty decisions on German rearmament.

The theme that there was no hurry about this rearmament ran through many speeches. M. Daladier horrified the government by expressing the view that the "peripheral defense" of Europe by the United States air force was not a myth at all but on the contrary the best solution for France. The Americans would in any event not send many troops to Europe and would therefore rely on the Germans to do the dirty work—and, by heaven, the work would be dirty! As for Germany, it could very well remain disarmed and kept under four-power control; unfortunately, the Western powers had never taken seriously suggestions to that effect. Daladier, like others, said that if the United States wanted to rearm Germany, at least France's hands should stay clean.

M. Delbos, speaking for the government, was conscious of the danger that the Germans might suddenly detach themselves from the European army—leaving it, as another speaker put it, as empty as a lobster shell—and insisted that integration would "more or less protect us against such danger." Government spokesmen found it equally difficult to cope with another argument: the original Pleven plan had provided for "gradual" integration; now the whole business (except for overseas troops) would be handed to the Germans on a platter.

The discussion went on for days, with the government looking more and more unhappy. "The paradoxical thing is that the German people as a whole are not keen on rearmament," one speaker remarked. "But Adenauer is able to get more and more insolent every day because he sees the United States on its bended knees begging him to rearm."

In the end M. Schuman got his vote, but he was not given carte blanche. The Socialists consented to save the government from defeat on three conditions: (1) no German units to be recruited until all powers have ratified the European army treaty and a common organization has been set up; (2) no inclusion of Germany in NATO; (3) further attempts to be made to get direct British participation in the army.

February 25

And now Lisbon. Schuman had to present certain face-saving demands, buttressing them with accounts of the high feeling in the Assembly and emphasizing the danger that no agreement would be ratified if the terms were too stiff. He did succeed in obtaining acceptance of the principle that no German soldiers would be recruited until the agreement had been ratified by all six parliaments. This means that the formation of a European German army is postponed for about a year, which is perhaps the most the French could have hoped for.

For the rest, Lisbon was less satisfactory to France. In practical terms Germany becomes a member of NATO. Great Britain refused to yield to the urging that it somehow join the European army. And France obtained no guaranty against the danger of Germany breaking away from the European army. Le Monde said bitterly: "Those Frenchmen were right who foresaw that the Atlantic Pact implied that Germany would first rearm according to American wishes and later according to its own."

Ocala: Echo of Injustice

BY STETSON KENNEDY

Miami, Florida

AT THE order of the United States Supreme Court, Florida gave Walter Lee Irvin a brand-new trial, featuring the same prosecutor presenting the same testimony with the same witnesses, a jury as white as ever returning the same verdict, and the same whittling judge handing down the same sentence—death.

There were, however, certain differences from the earlier trial. State authorities, hoping to get a conviction that would stand up, had the trial shifted from Lake County to Ocala in neighboring Marion County, and had a few Negroes summoned as prospective jurors. The white population affected a lack of interest in the proceedings to preclude charges of mob influence, and the local press confined itself to desultory comment.

The story of the "Groveland Four," of whom Irvin was the only one whose fate remained in doubt, began in Groveland, Florida, in 1949 when Willie Padgett met his wife, Norma Lee, coming home after dawn with tavern-keeper Lawrence Burtoft. Both Mr. and Mrs. Padgett said that she had been abducted the night before by four Negro youths, but it was not until some time later that she added the charge of rape.

Mrs. Padgett's charges precipitated a wave of violence. The Ku Klux Klan led a mob which shot up the Negro section, burned three homes, and drove all Negroes from the town. When Irvin, Samuel Shepherd, and Charles Greenlee were arrested, the mob demanded that Sheriff Willis McCall surrender them for lynching. Instead, he deputized the mob and sent it on a man hunt for a fourth "suspect," Ernest Thomas, who when found was killed by a fusillade of bullets. Irvin and Shepherd were subsequently tried and sentenced to die; Greenlee, only sixteen at the time, was given life imprisonment. Upon appeal to the Supreme Court, the convictions of Irvin and Shepherd were set aside (Greenlee disassociated himself from the appeal, fearing to antagonize the court) on the ground that Negroes had been systematically excluded from the jury, which moreover had been influenced by the mob and an inflammatory press.

While being transported to a new trial originally scheduled for Tavares, Shepherd and Irvin, handcuffed together, were each felled by three bullets from the gun of Sheriff McCall. Shepherd died instantly; Irvin clung to life by pretending to be dead. In the hospital Irvin charged that he and Shepherd had been shot down in cold blood. McCall insisted his prisoners had attempted to escape. A coroner's jury, closing its eyes to a score of holes in the case for McCall, exonerated him.

A new trial was then set for Ocala, opening February 11. Defense counsel argued that Circuit Judge Truman Futch, who had pronounced the original death sentence after presiding over the first trial, should disqualify himself for the second. But Judge Futch rejected the plea, asserting that far from being prejudiced he was merely "familiar with the case." Throughout the proceedings the Judge whittled on a succession of cedar sticks.

Retained by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People to defend Irvin were Orlando attorneys Alex Akerman, Jr., and Paul Perkins. Thurgood Marshall, the N. A. A. C. P.'s chief counsel, and his assistant, Jack Greenberg, both of New York, were also permitted by the judge to participate, but not until they had been castigated by the prosecutor as "outside agitators" engaged in "vilifying our state."

Ocala's white folks joined in a tacit gentleman's agreement to ignore the courthouse; seldom was the white section of the courtroom more than two-thirds full. Those who showed up maintained a façade of impartiality. But the prejudice was there. A poll prepared by the firm of Elmo Roper was offered in evidence to support the defense plea for a change of venue. Based on interviews with 518 whites in Marion County, the survey indicated that 43 per cent were "positive" of Irvin's guilt, an additional 20 per cent had also prejudged him to be guilty but were not quite so certain, while 25 per cent admitted they did not know. Only 1 per cent thought him "probably"—not positively—innocent. As for the possibility of mob action, 84 per cent of the 151 Negroes queried thought "something might happen" if Irvin were freed, but only 16 per cent of the whites would admit as much. Apparently this was the first time a public-opinion poll had been submitted as court evidence. The judge rejected it as hearsay.

The prosecution sought to answer the poll by parading a dozen witnesses across the stand to affirm that Marion County represented the millennium in harmonious race relations. Among them were five Negroes, well-to-do professional men, who outdid the whites in praise of local conditions. Dr. L. R. Hampton, dentist, spoke of the "love and respect" in which local whites held Negroes, adding that he knew of no Ocala white who was prejudiced against Negroes. Asked under cross-examination if he did not think the refusal to seat Negroes on juries was a manifestation of prejudice, Dr. Hampton replied: "I don't know if we are properly intellectually informed enough to serve on juries." In a more cryptic vein the Reverend L. N. Anderson declared: "Marion County is the only county I would put up against Jerusalem in Christ's time." Only Mr. Anderson knows whether he was likening the trial of Irvin to Pontius Pilate's surrender of the innocent Jesus to the mob for crucifixion.

Of the hundred prospective jurors summoned, seven were Negroes. With Negroes constituting 50 per cent of the county's population, it remains for the Supreme Court to decide whether this represented systematic exclusion. Of the seven called, two excused themselves on the ground that they had opinions about the case; two said they were opposed to capital punishment; three were dismissed by peremptory challenge of the prosecutor.

While the state rested its case on the identification of Irvin by the Padgetts, the defense introduced two new witnesses. The first was Pfc. Burtoft, who flew in from Fort Jackson, South Carolina, to testify that when Mrs. Padgett arrived at his tavern she had said nothing of being raped, and moreover had said she could not identify any of her abductors "because it was so dark."

The second new defense witness was Herman Bennett, private criminologist from Miami, who declared that in his opinion the plaster casts made of footprints at the scene of the alleged attack had been made by Irvin's shoes—but that the shoes had been empty when the tracks were made! This was strongly indicated, he said, by the fact that the soles were sharply arched, as though the shoes had contained shoe-trees rather than feet. Deputy Yates, who had made the casts although he admittedly lacked training for such technical work, admitted further that he had made them after having obtained the shoes from Irvin's home. To discount Bennett's testimony the state merely brought out that he had been employed by the N. A. A. C. P.

Already the N. A. A. C. P. has moved for a new trial in the circuit court. Actually a pro forma requirement, the move will certainly be denied, and the appeal will then be addressed to the state Supreme Court. In essence the defense charges that Irvin was deprived of a fair and just trial. Among the errors cited are the court's refusal to admit the testimony of the Roper poll and to grant a change of venue.

Irvin's tragic plight is heightened by the fact that the state, mindful of the unfavorable publicity the trial would bring, tried to induce him to plead guilty in exchange for a life sentence—which, with time off for good behavior, could mean parole after seven years. His attorneys left the decision to him. He made the only choice that would leave him at peace with his own conscience. "If I had pleaded guilty," he told reporters later, "I'd just be lying on myself."

Corporate Cupid

BY JUANITA TANNER

ALUCE magazine survey would hardly be expected to have the voltage of a Kinsey report, but Fortune's survey on "The Wives of Management" in its issues of October and November, 1951, turned out to be quite engrossing. The magazine's own editors say that it gave them the "heebie-jeebies." What startled them was the eagerness of the wives interviewed to adapt themselves to the requirements of the corporations for which their husbands worked.

That such amenability should astonish and alarm the editors of Fortune seems a little odd in view of the magazine's basic premises and the results of its previous surveys of women and business. These have dealt chiefly with the girls as consumers or as employees, but they have been revealing. For instance, there was a depression-era survey in which Fortune gravely used its yardstick on the height of hemlines and showed statistically that skirts and the stock market rose together; hems dipped to the ankles in hard times, when manufacturers needed to dispose of surplus yardage. Then there was the survey which established that executives tend to regard female employees much as the Victorian father regarded his daughters—pleasant creatures to have around to feed the male ego in those later, harsher years when reassurance is required.

Taken together, these earlier surveys should have given a smart trend-spotter all he needed to forecast the results of the recent one on corporation wives. The report on style changes proved women's infinite adaptability. The executive views of the feminine function in business, with their implication that salaries are defined in terms of daughterly allowances, made it certain that the brighter girl would seek another kind of career. Balked in her expectation of equal pay for equal work she will find a way to command a man's salary even if it involves marrying the man and buttering up his boss.

The gentlemen, then, were warned. And if Fortune now finds such an embarrassing pliability in the girls that it heads its editorial conclusions "In Praise of the Ornerly Wife," what was to be expected of women denied direct rewards yet asked to be the equals—the survey stresses this—of alert, aggressive, and "dedicated" executives? Does anyone seriously suppose that a demand for wives who will keep up with husbands described as willing to knock themselves out in the company's interest can do other than produce women able to outdo their husbands in yessing management?

Does this show the girls really mean it? Don't be silly. A woman who does what she can to increase her husband's earnings is simply, like the corporation, exploiting the worker. Her interests and those of the corporation are, as Fortune somewhat wonderingly observes, identical up to a point. The wife may well object to the over-exploitation which kills the worker; her interest, unlike the company's, is for life. In the same way a sea captain's wife may question the tradition which invites the captain to risk his life to save a company ship. But that doesn't mean she wants her husband to relax on the bridge—or around the office.

Only business conservatism could so long have overlooked the obvious alliance. Even now the companies are relying on wives' doing their part with little prompting. A salesman's wife may win a deep freeze as a reward for cooperation in record sales, but no company offers Paris frocks or Elizabeth Arden treatments or diamond bracelets for wifely aid. Nor do the corporations as yet recruit wives in the women's colleges in the way that they go after the bright boys. But since a girl's suitability shows earlier—as the surveyors remark, the attitude is fostered in nursery schools—we may yet see management's talent scouts observing the conduct of Cynthia, aged four, and Shirley, six.

Halfway through the survey the magazine began to have misgivings. The second article confesses some regrets over the whole undertaking; perhaps too many wives read Fortune. An even more dangerous possibility is surely that men, given the lowdown on how their wives groom them for jobs, will balk. What man smart enough to be a big executive wants surveillance in the company's interest for twenty-four hours a day?

Will not men with enough gumption to be useful to industry shrink from marrying a female of the foreman type? If divorce were the only result, corporations, the Fortune survey showed, would not object, but a revolution against marriage would be different. Masculine coyness might have to be countered by incentive raises and marriage-counsel bureaus, the beginnings of which can already be discerned in the more elaborate corporations. But surely, if the present trend continues, the occasion for marriage counseling in the sense of teaching a man to distinguish one woman from another will disappear. The survey emphasizes the standardization of women to the point of interchangeability, like car parts.

Surprisingly, it is this standardization which Fortune, in its final editorial pronouncement, seems to deplore. What do the gentlemen want? You can't cut wives to a pattern and then object to their lack of individual character. It is somewhat as if a successful Lothario should complain that the girls were too easy. Some things, such as freedom of thought and expression, must be given up in efficient corporate organization, state or business.

Women are realists. And so any time the corporation gets disgusted with the wire-pulling of wives, it should know what to do. Give the smart secretary—who admittedly makes the ideal executive's wife—a chance at the top executive job herself, with a man's pay. Test the plan by asking, in strictest confidence, which she would really prefer—marriage to a vice-president or a chance at a pay check and expense account of her own, on even the lower, $10,000 level? Then watch fashions in feminine aspirations change again.

General Willoughby and the Sorge Spy Ring

SHANGHAI CONSPIRACY. By Major General Charles A. Willoughby. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.75.

WHILE he was Chief of Intelligence for General MacArthur in Japan, General Willoughby got access to the Japanese police records on the activities of the "Sorge spy ring." According to these records, Dr. Richard Sorge was an extremely successful agent for the Soviets in Japan from 1931 to 1941, when the Japanese police at last caught up with him. While in the custody of the Kempetai and the special higher police, Sorge made a long confession. He was then secretly tried and duly hanged. General Willoughby's story is mainly based on his confession and the confessions made by his associates in similar circumstances. It is a rattling good spy story.

Yet General Willoughby, like General MacArthur, who writes the preface, considers it to be much more than that. They feel that it is of immense significance to every good citizen. It should excite burning indignation against men like Sorge and his assistants, for their work was "sinister" and "vicious"; it was sabotage and betrayal. And the story should make good citizens perpetually vigilant lest their friends or neighbors be secretly working for some Soviet spy ring, since Soviet spies are everywhere and are very clever. They do not usually openly proclaim their devotion to communism and the Soviet Union, and if they speak Russian they tend to conceal it even from their intimate friends. General Willoughby finds all this "frightening." "One begins to wonder," he writes, "whom one can trust, what innocent-appearing friend may suddenly be discovered as an enemy."

While there can be no doubt about the genuineness of General Willoughby's indignation and anxiety, it is often hard to trace the roots of his emotions. According to his account Richard Sorge was sent from Shanghai to Japan in 1931, when it seemed that Japan's attack on Manchuria might be the prelude to more ambitious aggression. Mainly through his own intimacy with the Nazi diplomatic and military representatives in Japan and through the intimacy of his chief assistant with Prince Konoye, Sorge was able to assure Moscow that Japan would not attack Russia. It was this assurance that enabled Russia to withdraw its troops from the Far East for the desperate and successful defense of Moscow. If General Willoughby's account of this is authentic, it would seem that Sorge played a critical part in enabling the Soviets first to halt and then to defeat Hitler's invading army. Surely all the Allies should feel gratitude to the man whose skill and courage contributed so much to the Allied cause at such a critical phase of the war. It is not clear from his account of this period whether General Willoughby recalls that in 1941 the Soviet Union was Britain's ally and Nazi Germany Britain's enemy. In 1942, if my memory is right, General MacArthur declared that the hopes of the civilized world rested on the courageous shoulders of the Russian army. Maybe Sorge felt the same way in 1941. It is puzzling to know why General Willoughby is so indignant.

Many things are puzzling in this book. General Willoughby states that Sorge, through his influence over German embassy officers in Tokyo, was "a primary architect of the Tripartite Anti-Communist Pact of September 1940, which inevitably hastened the war." This is bewildering.

It is just as hard to discover the principles by which General Willoughby evaluates evidence as to discover the principles governing his moral judgments. The great body of evidence he produces against Sorge, and against those who he alleges worked in "the ring," comes from the confessions extracted by the Japanese police. In his preface General MacArthur mentions that his command worked against Communists with the "modernized" Japanese police force during the Occupation, but the force had not been "modernized" in 1941. General Willoughby expresses his admiration of the Japanese authorities for giving "the most dangerous spies ever captured" "the benefit of every protection offered by Japanese law" and for sentencing only two of the twenty "guilty" men and women to death when all had earned the death penalty under Japanese law. He concedes that the police may have treated some of the accused a bit roughly.

Is General Willoughby really as innocent as this? Have his researches not given him any fuller information about the methods of refined and sustained mental and physical torture which it was the established custom of the police to use in order to extract confessions from political prisoners? Would General Willoughby accept as authentic the confessions which Soviet courts extract from political prisoners? Does he know of any important difference between the Soviet and Japanese methods of getting confessions? It is impossible, from reading his book, to know what evidence General Willoughby considers necessary to establish guilt. It would seem that he places great confidence in the notion of guilt by association. Against some of the people whom he charges with Soviet espionage this seems to be the main, or only, evidence he produces. But the people who associated most intimately with Sorge and who trusted him most completely were the senior men in the German embassy, including the Gestapo chief. Is it not possible that some of the Americans or British who associated with Sorge were equally ignorant of his mission?

It is true that General Willoughby attempts to supplement and strengthen his evidence by vague references to reports by the Shanghai Municipal Police, and by publishing a statement by four lawyers in Tokyo who seem to take his report on the Sorge activities seriously. It would still be impossible for a reader of this book who has even an elementary training in the appraisal of evidence to reach firm conclusions about the truth of the General's assertions. For some of his statements the evidence seems strong if not conclusive; for others it seems non-existent. And his whole approach is too highly charged with spleen and pettiness to win easy assent from any except those who already share his personal and political attitudes. It is hard to get excited when he considers it worth while, ■ part of his indictment of some British or American writer, to reveal that this writer, at a time when the Soviet Union was our ally, had some articles published in magazines for which known Communists also sometimes wrote. Yet this is the sort of evidence which General Willoughby seems to feel a rich reward for his researches.

It would still be wrong to take his book too lightly. It has some importance. It is important, not for what it proves or fails to prove about individuals whom it charges with Soviet espionage, but because it reveals so clearly the professional standards and the political values of the officer in whom General MacArthur presumably placed full confidence to help him assess the military and political situation in the Pacific from 1941 to 1951. General Willoughby is right in believing that he has written ■ frightening book.

W. MACMAHON BALL

The Victorian Ethos

LESLIE STEPHEN: HIS THOUGHT AND CHARACTER IN RELATION TO HIS TIME. By Noel Gilroy Annan. Harvard University Press. $5.

THE rigors of the Victorian fate have worked grimly with Leslie Stephen. In his own age he was a man of signal rank: heir, product, and apostate of Clapham Evangelicalism; member of the "aristocracy of intellect" that ramified the tangled genealogies of Arnolds, Huxleys, Mills, Macaulays, Trevelyan, of Wilberforces, Darwins, Thackerays, Prinseps, Stephens; editor of the Cornhill and the "Dictionary of National Biography"; author of "The Science of Ethics," "An Agnostic's Apology," "Hours in a Library," the monumental "History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century," and ■ long list of literary studies; husband first of Minny Thackeray and then of Julia Jackson Duckworth; friend of Meredith, Morley, Hardy, James, and ■ virtual pantheon of illustrious contemporaries; ■ hero of liberal rationalism, an arbiter of sanity in criticism, and a character who epitomized the central conscience and noblest scruples of his era. As such he was commemorated in F. W. Maitland's admirable memoir of 1906. Yet he who rebelled against the generation of his fathers was in turn rebelled against by the generation he fathered. Except to specialists he survives today less as ■ hero of his time than its victim; less as its conscience than as its spirit grown vexed, morbid, and mortified.

Meredith probably initiated this rueful verdict when he drew his friend, in Vernon Whitford of "The Egoist," as "Phoebus Apollo turned fasting friar." Lytton Strachey elaborated it when, in ■ sweeping devastation of Arnold, he used Stephen as ■ peg on which to hang the whole Victorian ineptitude in aesthetics, its "essential and fatal weakness," its "incapability of criticism"—a judgment later seconded by J. W. Mackail and Desmond MacCarthy. And when Virginia Woolf, who knew her father's virtue as intimately as his failings and had testified to it in her Mr. Hilbery of "Night and Day," created her Mr. Ramsay of "To the Lighthouse"—the egotistic, thought-dried skeptic in whom rationalism has become introverted and life-resenting—the verdict of Bloomsbury seemed complete. Stephen, it appeared, had found his appropriate legend, and it was a legend of frustrated spirit and the "undeveloped heart."

This legend Mr. Annan has undertaken to correct in a book that proves to be one of the most attractive studies in the Victorian ethos yet produced by the conflict between sanity and sensitiveness, the accounts left standing in the red by "Eminent Victorians." In the first full examination Stephen's thought and mind have yet had, he assesses the defects but also the worth of the Clapham heritage; the honesty if also the aridity of Stephen's agnosticism; the austerity but also the sustaining vision of his moral ideal of man and society; the conflict between sanity and sensitiveness, between ■ self-sufficient philistine ethic and an intense emotional hunger, that found release less in Stephen's irritable devotion to his brilliant family than in the strenuously mystical Alpinism which drove him to conquer that Schreckhorn in whose "spare and desolate figure," "quaint glooms, keen lights, and rugged trim," Hardy, in his moving tribute sonnet, saw a "semblance" to his friend's personality.

He examines with particular care Stephen's caliber ■ critic of literature: not only the inflexible suspicion of its "feminine" or "singular" elements that deprived him of any intimate experience of Donne, Keats, Coleridge, Tennyson, or lyric poetry in general, but the severe sense of moral and social values that enabled him to write estimates of certain Elizabethans, of Defoe and Eliot, above all of his hero Wordsworth, which, if they lack Arnold's finer perception, still succeed in defining the moral relevance of art, in correcting the excesses of aestheticism, and in suggesting valid social bearings in a way that makes them crucial documents in modern criticism. Mr. Annan admits Stephen's incapacity in treating poetry, but when he meets the Strachey-Mackail-MacCarthy charge of total insensitiveness by suggesting that "he had not too little, but too much poetry in him and drank it in such draughts that he could not savour the delicacies or tell the vintages," he begs the question in his effort to cope with the self-denying contempt in which Stephen held both criticism ("After all, what does a real genius ever learn from criticism?") and literature itself ("Literature is, in all cases, a demoralising occupation, though some people can resist its evil influences. It is demoralising because success implies publicity. A poet has to turn himself inside out by the very conditions of his art, and suffers from the incessant stimulants applied to his self-consciousness").

The defense of Stephen's criticism made by such apologists as the Leavises, like the place Mr. Annan accords him in "the judicial tradition of Johnson-Arnold-Eliot," rests, finally, less on what he wrote directly about literature than on the force of his moral seriousness, the severe ethical and personal honesty in which he framed his judgments; more on the scholarship and rational method—derived from his other hero, Mill—of his non-literary investigations than on the direct experience of poetry or prose he deliberately hindered by a moral suspiciousness from which he never could or wished to free it.

"A rationalist is always a bad life if one wants to insure against the short memory of posterity," Mr. Annan concludes. It is "muddlers like the imaginative Coleridge, intricate minds like F. D. Maurice . . . prophets, seers, even charlatans," who "have a longer life." But that fate, he believes, "a positivist such as Stephen" would accept. To him a life is "well spent in destroying superstition and selflessly working for the future"; his "future insignificance is a sign that others have built on his work and profited by his blunders." Lowes Dickinson, for one, would not admit this martyrdom to be the appropriate sentence on such sons of Cambridge as Stephen, Henry Sidgwick, and Maitland. For him they constituted "a type unworldly without being sentimental . . . able to be skeptical without being paralyzed; content to know what is knowable and to reserve judgment on what is not. The world could never be driven by such men, for the springs of action lie deep in ignorance and madness. But it is they who are the beacon in the tempest, and they are more, not less, needed now than ever before."

This judgment Mr. Annan has documented with tact and sympathy; and his book, enhanced by some fine unpublished photographs of Stephen, his wives and children, and of Henry James, does sound justice to a character whose worth now reemerges from post-Victorian strictures to declare its value to its own age and to ours.

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

Early Virginia

BEHOLD VIRGINIA: THE FIFTH CROWN. By George F. Willison. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $4.75.

AMERICAN history began at Jamestown; the earlier settlements up the Atlantic coast and the Spanish outposts in the Far West were out of the main stream of the developments from which the American nation grew. The poor plantation of the Virginia Company, which struggled for decades at the edge of disaster, laid the foundation upon which an independent nation was built 170 years later.

Yet the early years of the Virginia colony have remained obscure. Despite the meticulous research of a generation of scholars, Virginia is still, in the popular mind, enveloped in a vague haze of legends in which John Smith, Pocahontas, and the gallant cavaliers are hopelessly confused. Perhaps the Virginians lacked the flair for public relations by which New Englanders spread the fame of the Puritans and Pilgrims; certainly this history is not as well known as it should be.

George Willison's book is therefore welcome. In concise, readable form he tells the story of the establishment of Jamestown and the emergence from it of a mature and stable culture. With proper emphasis on the difficulties and hardships of the process, upon the diversified quality of the early settlers, and upon the knavery and greed from which so many miseries proceeded, he traces in lively and entertaining manner the coming into being of what the Crown had hoped would become its fifth dominion.

The book falls into two uneven sections. The first twenty chapters, dealing with the years of establishment from 1607 to 1624, are detailed, tolerably accurate, and well written. There are gaps in Willison's understanding of the subject even through these pages, but he displays here the knack of incorporating contemporary statements into his narrative and imparts to his account an authentic flavor of the times.

In its last eight chapters, however, the book falls apart. This section attempts to cover the century and a half between 1624 and the American Revolution. It is disappointingly cursory and unsatisfying. Perhaps this section fails because there are not readily at hand the convenient compilations of documents which Willison quotes on the earlier period; his information in these last chapters seems haphazardly gathered and incomplete. A more important reason for the failure is the author's incomplete comprehension of the forces that were involved in the trials of early Virginia.

Willison has rejected of course the once-traditional glamorous view of the first families. But he has gone to the opposite extreme and regards the subjects of his story with undisguised contempt. Those who were not gullible fools were dishonest rogues or stupid money-seekers. No scheme ever worked as it was intended to; disaster attended every enterprise; and the company and the colony "made the same mistakes over and over again." Yet out of the confusion and darkness, out of the greed and ignorance, there did emerge a substantial community in which a civil and social order took root and developed. This was furthermore a community that by the middle of the eighteenth century would advance to the conceptions of human rights and dignity that animated its statesmen of the Revolutionary era. How, from such drab origins, did these grand results ensue? In "Behold Virginia" there is regrettably no hint of an answer to this question.

The art of history is not simply that of telling an interesting story. There is a larger purpose to it—to present to men the knowledge of their past through which they may be able to arrive at an understanding of themselves. Through most of this book Willison tells a story that will hold his readers' interest; but he misses the opportunity of doing them this larger service.

OSCAR HANDLIN

Anchor to the Past

JEFFERSON SELLECK. By Carl Jonas.
Little, Brown and Company. $3.

THIS book is a life-size portrait of a vanishing American—the conservative Midwestern small manufacturer who has seemed in the past—particularly to himself and to many of those just below him in the social hierarchy—to embody all the civic virtues. It is a retrospective “autobiography” dictated at the suggestion of Jefferson Selleck’s physician, after he has survived a coronary occlusion, and one of its real assets is its admirably successful conveyance of the illusion that Selleck has told us everything about himself there is to know.

The style is determinedly flat and factual. This emphasis on daily statement has its use as social comedy when Selleck ruefully enumerates, item by item, just what happens to his twenty-thousand-dollar annual income (he winds up in the hole every year); but it can also be tedious and unrewarding, as when he grimly repeats the platitudes by which he claims to have lived.

It seems to me that one’s reaction to a painstaking and painful portrait photograph such as this must be directly affected by one’s opinion not merely of the figure who sat for the portrait but rather of the wall upon which it hangs, and indeed of the entire house; for Jefferson Selleck is not so much a person as a collection of attitudes toward American life which are for the most part narrow and uninspired, and the author’s implied sentiment is one of wry sympathy verging on the patronizing for this hero who got along with his wife, loved his children, hated Roosevelt, and was in favor of the great outdoors and Bob Taft. Indeed, Jeff Selleck himself is at his best when he gives us a genuinely individual insight into his relations with an earlier generation with which he was not wholly in sympathy but which he felt had much to offer in terms of the continuity of the American experience.

What Mr. Jonas is saying can perhaps be summarized in something like the following terms: the generation of middle-class Americans who were born into comfortable circumstances, who voted for Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover, who were bewildered by the depression and angered by Roosevelt can be seen in retrospect as men who, if limited intellectually and shallow culturally, were good fathers, good members of the community, and good Americans, essential weavers of the fabric of American life. This basically warm attitude of the younger generation toward boom-and-bust parents, overlaid with a bittersweet irony that has reminded virtually every reviewer, for obvious reasons, of J. P. Marquand, may account for the excellent reception which the book has got from critics and public anxious for an anchor to the past not too obviously incrustured with the barnacles of conservatism.

For me “Jefferson Selleck” is like an extended love-letter from the author to his father. I do not mean this in any personal sense—which would be both unfair and irrelevant—but rather as a somewhat exaggerated indicator of the vast distance separating writers like Mr. Jonas from their immediate predecessors, who looked upon their fathers as symbols of repression and whose books were instinct with rebellion against the entire success myth. Jefferson Selleck’s children have gone beyond the success myth; they mock their father’s stuffiness, but they love him and in the end they respect him. Only the most unsophisticated members of the upper middle class will resent this skilful and profoundly conservative novel.

JAMES BROOKS’S three-dimensional kaleidoscope scenes at the Peridot reveal him to be about eight times more thoughtful and fluent than any other Manhattan abstractionist. Brooks usually achieves something with tangled lines and geologic textures that looks like the cross-section of a rock pile—but a rock pile sledged out of a cathedral. He works simultaneously in all parts of the picture—including the reverse side of the canvas—troweling, blotting, kneading, evaporating the pigment with a sensuality that sinks his imagery into the very threading of the linen. However he does it, he handles his medium with more respect and feeling than I can impute to any of the more prominent daubers in the Rorschach League. What you see from a distance is a rich chunk of harmonized, understressed oranges or greens, curious for its poetically ambiguous intermixing of wetness and dryness, earthiness and restraint. When you get closer, the density of the color fades away into dustiness and gauziness, and the picture, though still compositionally alive, seems as thin as a Brooks Brothers’ shoulder. As he works from plane to plane over his Euclidian field, rather than in, out, and around volumes, Brooks falls into a wheel-like motion that leads to hypnosis through rhythmic repetition, contrast, balance. The Pollocks, Poussette-Darts, and deKoonings, more nervous and more emotion-ridden, have set out to destroy this sort of connectivism by a reliance on roughness, complication, and the anarchy of happenstance; yet perhaps it is Brooks—neat, subtle, and quietly profound—who strikes closest home with his skilful, analyses of the Gatsby personality.

Everybody has said all there is to say about the John Sloan retrospective at the Whitney. The formula is this: the early canvases are somber, humanistic, near-masterpieces out of a conservative but prolific era in American art, and as for the rest, especially the last experimental works, one either admires or deplores them, depending on one's opinion about awkward honesty. My own stand here is affirmative; and I find Sloan an admirable example of the unloved lachrymose plodders of art.

Alfred Leslie, at the Tibor de Nagy gallery, is a pseudo-roughneck who likes to thumb his nose at polite art customs. In trying to shock he offers among other things a twelve-foot picture of opaque, brownish-black scum with a three-foot white stripe in the bottom left corner; an incoherent self-portrait constructed vaguely around the four letters of a dirty word; and a tangled, smeary abstraction half on paper half on canvas, fastened together with black plumbers' tape. "Oh, to hell with it all" seems to be his guiding emotion and ultimate goal in painting. A sort of Bronx cowboy abstractionist, Leslie carries his scorn for "training" to the farthest point, a place where color can never be deepened beyond the simplest, quickest mixture, where paint must never, never be put on smoothly, where the "rough, untrammelled" look and simple bedraggled light-dark harmony are the only possible things to be tried for. Despite the clutter and primitivism, some of the pictures have a nice worn luminosity, as though a shadow had been pummeled and kneaded by other darker or lighter shadows. Each painting looks half painted, but upon closer observation it comes together into a harmony of delicate flickering curves and light waves. His most successful works are seven-tenths empty and three-tenths as busy as Times Square.

THREE unfamiliar works of Vivaldi on a Decca LP—the Concertos in A major and G minor for strings and cembalo and Concerto in D minor for oboe d'amore, strings, and cembalo—have the distinctive poignant loveliness and charm of his music; a fourth, the Concerto in G major for strings and cembalo, I find interesting. The performances by the Virtuosi di Roma under Renato Fasano are excellent, even with a bare-sounding bass line which results from the use of a harpsichord, audible mostly only as a timbre, to fill in the harmony. The recorded sound, which requires stepping up of bass, is somewhat coarse.

Mozart's Piano Concerto K.503 is performed on a Decca LP by Carl Seeman with the Munich Philharmonic under Fritz Lehmann. This is the work Tovey chose to illustrate his famous exposition of the Mozart concerto form; yet it is the least played and least known of the great examples of that form; and the reason is that its first movement sets out to affect the listener's ear and mind not with the usual succession of immediately appealing melodies, but with grandeur of style, and a now dramatic, now subtle play with tonality to which the eighteenth-century ear was more sensitized than ours. These may require repeated hearing to exercise their effect; but it must be hearing of effective performances; and in the Decca performance the music doesn't have the required grandeur (as it happens the recorded sound lacks solidity), nor is the play with tonality projected effectively. Bass must be stepped up; surfaces are poor. Seeman doesn't play any more sensitively in Mozart's Variations K.455 on a theme of Gluck, which still retain for me the additional attractiveness they acquired from Balanchine's "Mozartiana"; and there are cuts in the slow variation near the end.

The beautiful Andante movement of Mozart's Sinfonia Concertante K.364 provides the occasion for one of Balanchine's most wonderful creations; and his choreography is probably one reason why I find the other movements more engaging than I used to. The solo violin and viola parts are played on the Decca record by Joseph and Lillian Fuchs—with superb mastery of their instruments, but with an expansive vehemence which doesn't seem to me suitable to the music; the orchestral part is played well by the Zimmler Sinfonietta, a group of Boston Symphony musicians. The solo instruments are well reproduced; the sound of the orchestra is harsh.

On a Period record are Mozart's Divertimento K.247 for strings and horns, mostly quite charming; the engaging March K.248; and the early Symphony K.182, with lots of flourishes and bustle and a few lovely and startling details in the first movement, a charmingly graceful middle movement, and some striking details again in the finale. The performances by the Ton-Studio Orchestra under Hans Michael and Gustav Lund are very fine; the recorded sound is now veiled, now a little sharp. One side of my review record wavers in pitch.

Two brilliant works of Berlioz, the Overtures to "Benvenuto Cellini" and "Le Corsaire," seem to be played well on a London record by the Paris Conservatory Concerts Orchestra under Münch; but the recorded sound is muffled and indistinct. Ravel's "Bolero" is on the same record.

Dvorak's engagingly melodious Symphony No. 4 is excellently performed by the superb Amsterdam Concertgebouw Orchestra under Szell. The recorded sound has the characteristic London spatial depth, but lacks radiance and luster.

The densely polyphonic, wonderfully rich and subtle writing that is heard in Debussy's "Iberia" is also to be heard in "Gigues" and "Rondes de printemps," the other two pieces in the set of "Images" that are almost never played here. All three are played by the San Francisco Symphony under Monteux on an RCA Victor LP; and the performances make me wonder all over again at the to-do in recent years about Monteux as one of the giants to whom recognition has come belatedly. For they reveal again his lack of feeling for cohesiveness of tempo and continuity of momentum, especially in "Iberia," which in addition is heavy, graceless, and almost uninterruptedly loud. The recorded sound has the characteristic Victor warmth and richness, but not all the brightness it should have on top, unless one can step up the treble considerably.

In its Treasury series Victor has issued an excellent LP dubbing of the 1936 recording of Toscanini's beautiful performance of the Brahms-Haydn Variations with the New York Philharmonic. His performance of Beethoven's First Symphony with the B. B. C. Symphony comes off the same record with the first movement bright and clear, the other movements not.

Another Treasury LP dubbing reproduces Casals's playing in Dvorak's Cello Concerto excellently; and the orchestra is brilliant in the first movement, but dim in the last. And still another gives us the different sound of Casals's playing in the much older recording of the Boccherini Concerto, with Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" on the reverse side.

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Where the Voter Is Worse Than the Politician

Dear Sirs: The antecedents of Republicanism in Oregon stretch a good deal farther back than one would suppose from reading Richard L. Neuberger's entertaining article on the Webfoot State in The Nation of January 26.

Except for Portland and its environs, Oregon was settled by Southerners, mostly from eastern Tennessee and Arkansas. In 1860 its Governor Lane was on the extreme pro-slavery ticket with Breckenridge. During the Civil War sentiment was strong for the "Republic of the Pacific." The war over, Oregon refused to ratify the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments until 1930. In 1924 the state went completely under the control of the Ku Klux Klan, tried to organize economic eviction of Jews, and abolished all parochial schools—an act which was later declared unconstitutional by the United States Supreme Court. Six years later Oregon seems to have had a fit of remorse, for it gave Julius Meier, a Jew, and a candidate for the governorship on an independent ticket, more votes than were received by the Republican and Democratic candidates combined. Previous to Meier's election, an anti-Communist law was passed by the state legislature which makes the Smith act appear quite liberal. What is important to understand about the political scene in Oregon is that the voter is much more reactionary than the politician. This fact is borne out by the frequent rejection of reform measures passed by the legislature and submitted to the people in referendums.

ERNEST M. WHITESMITH

Is Duplessis for . . .

Dear Sirs: The Nation of October 20, 1951, contained an article, Quebec's Bitter Brew, by Henry Montcalm. The paragraph dealing with "the crux of the matter" says "Duplessis's role in the axis is to insure that the French Canadians submit to conscription, to heavy taxation, and if necessary to foreign war." Dr. Eugene Forsey, in The Nation of December 29, points out that "Mr. Montcalm does not offer a tittle of evidence to support this statement," but in his reply Mr. Montcalm avoids the issue.

If Henry Montcalm has the slightest shred of evidence that Premier Duplessis's role "is to insure that the French Canadians submit to conscription," it is his duty to reveal it, because there is plenty of evidence to the contrary, and it would profoundly affect the result of the coming elections. A great many people are going to vote Union National simply because of the conscriptionist record of M. Lapalme's Liberals, and because they believe it is precisely the existence of M. Duplessis's government which, since 1945, has stood between them and "the bitter brew" of conscription.

GORDON O. ROTHNEY

Montreal, Canada

. . . or Against Conscription?

Dear Sirs: I'm sure Professor Rothney knows his Quebec far too well to expect Premier Duplessis to document his position on conscription or discuss it at press conferences. But the fact that all mention of opposition to conscription, national registration, compulsory training, or war has been dropped from National Union propaganda during the past year, and even talk of provincial autonomy, that Premier Duplessis conspicuously refrains from attacks on the St. Laurent government, while directing his fire at the Provincial Liberals who have made some effort to dissociate themselves from Liberal foreign policy, is evidence that the decision on conscription has been made. All emphasis now is on cooperation with Ottawa, and on the great benefits which Duplessis has conferred on Quebec in the way of industrial development. I agree entirely that if the people of Quebec realize the changed role of the Duplessis government, it will have a profound effect on the election. But none of these matters, I think, will be brought out clearly until Duplessis in Quebec and the Liberals in Ottawa are safely in power for another five years. Then we shall see. I refer Dr. Rothney to the following passages quoted from Devoir, the Montreal Catholic daily, doubtless already familiar to him.

Is there a non-aggression pact between M. St. Laurent and M. Duplessis? National Union had always fought the foreign and military policy of the Mackenzie King regime, and exploited the grievances of the French Canadian against this policy in the electoral campaigns of 1944, 1948, 1949. But confronted with the invasion of Korea, N. U. did not react. The Minister of Roads in the Duplessis Cabinet even talked of building strategic routes. It was widely rumored that M. Duplessis had given orders not to oppose the military policy of the Federal Government in the by-elections held last fall in Quebec. That seemed rather unlikely. But now [after the St. Laurent speech praising Duplessis] the wisecracks will not fail to cry that they were well informed when they affirmed that M. St. Laurent would observe a sympathetic neutrality with regard to M. Duplessis.—February 28, 1951.

The new Quebec-Ottawa axis passes through Washington. M. Duplessis will show us that is the best way to Rome. Mr. Howe agrees. Vive American national unity.—March 1, 1951.

For considerations of federal politics, M. St. Laurent has believed he must reach an understanding with Premier Duplessis. What are these considerations?—of an international order, the wish to avoid Quebec resistance to the participation of Quebec in eventual war? of an economic order, exploitation of Ungava ore and canalization of the St. Lawrence? It is not clear as yet, but the desire for rapprochement with M. Duplessis is evident and admitted by all the chief interested parties at Quebec.—March 1, 1951.

HENRY MONTCALM

A Partial Victory

Dear Sirs: In your issue of September 22, 1951, you printed an article on the Pechan bill then under consideration by the Pennsylvania General Assembly. Readers of that article may be interested to know that teachers and other public employees in Pennsylvania have weathered the storm of reaction which set in during the 1951 session.

In January, 1951, a bill was introduced in the legislature which authorized a state-wide investigation of subversive activities, and another which required registration of "subversive persons" with the Attorney General. Later in the session a bill was submitted, written by Supreme Court Justice Michael A. Musmanno, outlawing members of the Communist Party and "other" revolutionary organizations. In a wave of hysteria the Musmanno bill was passed by an overwhelming majority. But bills aimed specifically at public employees fared differently.

As a result of a widespread campaign initiated by the Teachers' Union of Philadelphia, only one of these latter bills finally got through the legislature. That bill was the Pechan "loyalty oath" bill which was heavily amended during the closing days of the session. While up for consideration this bill was under constant attack from over a hundred organizations—the Pennsylvania Association of Universities and Colleges, the state A. A. U. P. chapters, the Private School Teachers' Association, the Pennsylvania Federation of Teachers (A. F. of L.), and so on—which sent over eight hundred lobbyists to the capital to fight the bill. The only groups which favored the measure were the old-line veterans' organizations and the D. A. R., and even they faced rebellion from local affiliates.

The American Legion, which had boasted that it would march 6,000 legionnaires to Harrisburg to lobby for the bill, delivered about 200 men, in full uniform, accompanied by a band which played military marches in the rotunda of the Capitol while the House of Representatives was in session. Veterans representing the A. F. of L., C. I. O., and church and teachers' groups opposing the bill outnumbered the legionnaires.

The measure itself is a bad piece of legislation. Under its provisions a person can be found to be "subversive" if he belongs to an undefinably "subversive" organization. But the pressure brought to bear against the bill did modify some of its provisions. For instance, "reasonable doubt" of loyalty was struck out of the bill as a cause for discharge of a public employee (including teachers), although it was retained as a cause to deny employment to new applicants; a provision which would empower the state Attorney General to require sworn answers from public employees to questionnaires to be drawn up at his discretion was dropped from the measure, as was the use of the United States Attorney General's list of subversive organizations as a means of discharging employees. The bill was further amended to allow a hearing for anyone accused of being "subversive," at which court rules of evidence must be adhered to.

The Teachers' Union of Philadelphia has launched a campaign to provide legal aid for victims of the Pechan act, to test the constitutionality of the act, and to rally support in the legislature for the act's repeal during the next session. First step in the repeal campaign is the state-wide circulation of a special issue of the Teachers' Union News, which contains the full text and analysis of the Pechan bill. Copies can be had by writing to the union, 13 South Twenty-first Street, Philadelphia 3. Philadelphia FRANCIS P. JENNING

"TOO FEW FACTS ON KOREA"

That was the headline on an article by Hanson Baldwin in the New York Times on October 2, 1951. The communiqués from the Far East, he wrote, "smacked too much of propaganda and too little of fact censorship in Korea has been severe and often captious."

Now, at long last, you can learn the truth. From American and U. N. documents, from the leading American and British newspapers, the hidden history of the Korean War—the inner connection between war, propaganda, and politics—has been ferreted out. Only an experienced and fearless newspaperman could have done the job. A scholarly reporter, with extraordinary tenacity and patience, has done the digging that was necessary. Nation readers know him. The former Washington editor of the Nation and PM, now the brilliant crusading columnist of the Compass, has written a book as exciting as a detective story and as documented as a lawyer's brief.

THE HIDDEN HISTORY of the KOREAN WAR

by I. F. STONE

Leading publishers in the United States and England found I. F. Stone's HIDDEN HISTORY OF THE KOREAN WAR terrific—but too hot to handle. The editors of Monthly Review read it and felt its publication was essential in the fight for peace. We decided to publish the book ourselves.

The retail price will be $5—too steep for the wide distribution the book should have. However, by direct sales in advance of publication, we can sell the book at considerably less than $5. We are, therefore, making these offers:

1. PRE-PUBLICATION PRICE OF $3.00

The book is scheduled to appear in April. Send in $3 in advance of publication and we will send you the book postpaid, as soon as it is off the press.

2. COMBINATION SUBSCRIPTION-BOOK PRICE OF $5.00

A subscription to Monthly Review costs $3 per year. Send in $5 and we will give you a year's subscription and send you the book postpaid, as soon as it comes off the press.

Monthly Review is an independent magazine devoted to analyzing, from a socialist point of view, the most significant trends in domestic and foreign affairs. It is edited by Leo Huberman and Paul M. Sweezy.

Professor Albert Einstein, in his article "Why Socialism" in Vol. 1, No. 1 of Monthly Review, (May, 1949, said: "Clarity about the aims and problems of socialism is of greatest significance in our age of transition. Since, under the present circumstances, free and unhindered discussion of these problems has come under a powerful taboo, I consider the founding of this magazine to be an important public service."

IF PRESIDENT TRUMAN WAS SINCERE IN saying a few weeks ago that he did not like the Franco regime, he should like it even less today. The scandalous trial of the strike leaders of Catalonia, which provoked a storm of indignation throughout Europe, has been followed by word, not yet officially confirmed, that the death sentences against nine of the thirty defendants have been carried out. It is significant that most of the condemned men belonged to the anti-Communist National Federation of Labor (C. N. T.). In a great protest meeting in Paris called by organizations and individuals representing widely diverse political views, speeches were made by Camus, Silone, Sartre, and other outstanding intellectuals. Sartre said: "How can we claim to be democrats if we remain silent in the presence of Spain—this concentration camp of the Western democracies?" In London the opening of the festival of Spanish dances and songs under the auspices of Spain's ambassador, Miguel Primo de Rivera, was converted into a demonstration of protest, the crowd shouting "Down with Franco the Murderer." Among the many organizations protesting strongly against the new wave of terror in Spain, of which the recent death sentences are only a sample, is the International Federation of Free Trade Unions at Brussels, to which both the A. F. of L. and the C. I. O. adhere. We hope American labor will join in this public condemnation of a regime to which our government is daily drawing closer in spite of Mr. Truman's expressions of platonic disapproval.

A SOLID PHALANX OF SOUTHERN SENATORS backed by exactly half the Republicans present succeeded on February 28 in blocking further progress on the Alaska statehood bill. By a majority of one the measure was returned to committee so that consideration could be given to a fantastic plan for "dominion status." This scheme, which is almost certainly unconstitutional, would allow Alaskans to vote in Presidential elections, to have a representative in the House, and to elect one non-voting Senator. Strangely enough, this cynical proposal to preserve intact the veto powers of the Southern bloc was supported by Senator Taft, who argued that Alaska was still an "economic dependency" of the federal government and that the 1948 Republican platform had merely promised "ultimate" statehood. However, the Ohioan joined with Senator Knowland in seeking to have the Hawaiian statehood bill taken up as next business, thus giving point to Senator O'Mahoney's charge that he was "on both sides of the statehood question." That seems to be true of other Senators, including Majority Leader McFarland, who supports the Alaska bill but has been using every possible parliamentary maneuver to head off the Hawaiian measure. Thus the aspirations of both territories are being made the football of party politics. It may be that neither will succeed in casting off the shackles of colonialism until their inhabitants make it clear that if they cannot obtain full statehood, they will demand independence.

AN ATTEMPT TO INCREASE TAXES TO PAY for defense has proved the downfall of the government headed by Edgar Faure as it did of its predecessor. This does not mean that a majority of the French Assembly is hostile to rearmament. When the Premier asked for a vote of confidence on a resolution providing credits for the French contribution to NATO and for the Indo-China war, he secured a majority of 512 to 104. Nevertheless, a few hours later his plan to increase taxes was defeated by 309 to 283, and his resignation followed. M. Faure fought hard to achieve a balanced budget. "If you refuse your confidence," he told the deputies, "you will be favoring inflation, which is the highest and unfairest form of tax"—an economic truism with which the French people have become painfully familiar. Nevertheless, the pressure of special interest groups adversely affected by one or another of the tax proposals moved some thirty of Faure's fellow Radical Socialists and numerous members of the Independent and Peasant parties to join forces with the more or less permanent opposition composed of Communists and Gaullists. The collapse of yet another effort to maintain a stable centralist coalition revived the idea of a Government of National Union, comprising all major groups except the Communists. However, when the veteran Paul Reynaud sought to organize a Cabinet of this kind, he found the way blocked by the unwillingness of the Socialists to cooperate with the anti-labor SOMETHING MUST BE DONE QUICKLY IF internal and external insolvency is to be avoided. French foreign-exchange reserves are now so low that an embargo on all dollar imports may become necessary, cutting off industry from supplies of raw materials. Moreover, advances from the Bank of France to the Treasury are nearing the limits fixed by law, and the next government may find itself without funds to pay salaries and other bills. Nevertheless, it is hardly correct to describe the French economic situation as "tragic"—the expression used by former Premier Paul Reynaud during the Assembly debate. The agriculture and industry of France are highly productive, and as the country is still largely self-contained, its economic position is fundamentally less precarious than that of Britain. French troubles are not organic but nervous. Chronic mishandling of finance has led Frenchmen to hoard wealth instead of using it productively. Tucked away in safe hiding places they own billions in gold and dollars—more than enough to give France one of the strongest economies in the world. But these hoards will not see the light of day until France has a stable government and a balanced budget. Neither of these objectives is in sight, and it may be that they will not be achieved without some kind of political explosion.

THE AGREEMENT BETWEEN THIS COUNTRY and Mexico under which Mexican nationals are recruited for employment here has been extended for three months to give Congress time to consider new legislation for reducing the traffic in illegal or "wetback" immigrants. A similar "emergency" extension, followed by protracted "hearings," was used last year to jockey the Mexican government into consenting to a continuance of the agreement before the terms had been fully approved. Last year more than 518,000 illegal entrants were arrested, 7 per cent more than in 1950, and some 50,000 of them were "air-lifted" back to Mexico at a cost of $1,500,000. Even should Congress enact pending legislation aimed at curbing the wetback traffic, the damage will have been done, for by the end of the three-month period the new season will be under way, and further extensions will be in order. As a hedge against the possibility that Mexico will refuse to extend the agreement, the Associated Farmers of California have opened negotiations with the South Korean government. According to H. W. Stroble, secretary-treasurer of the Associated Farmers, the importation of South Korean workers would reduce the cost of caring for the Korean people and would give at least some of them a chance "to see how democracy works." How Mr. Stroble thinks a democracy ought to work was clearly exposed in the report of the 1940 LaFollette investigating committee on the smashing of the Salinas lettuce strike in 1936, a semi-military maneuver directed with great skill by Mr. Stroble.

"VENEZUELA SHOULD JOIN THE COUNTRIES Which Work Their Own Oil," reads a recent headline in El Universal, leading daily of Caracas, capital of a dictatorship in which anything written about oil can hardly escape censorship by the ruling Junta. Moreover, the opinions quoted in the article are those of Venezuela's chief oil expert, Dr. Ezequial Monsalvo Casada of the University of Caracas, who in 1949 was a member of a diplomatic oil mission abroad. Thus the shadow of Iranianism falls across the holdings of Standard Oil and Shell on the shores of Lake Maracaibo, the world's biggest single oil-export area. Dr. Monsalvo argues that Venezuela has enough competent man-power—much of it schooled in Texas and Oklahoma petroleum institutions—to run its own oil industry and urges nationalization in three steps: (1) action "to repair the grave injustice" of the present practice of refining all Venezuelan crude in the neighboring Dutch islands of Aruba (Standard Oil) and Curaçao (Shell Oil); (2) building up of Venezuela's own tanker fleet; (3) "the exploiting companies must drag out by the roots the colonial prejudice with which they still regard us and treat us." This is a large order, especially—as Iran has already found out and as Dr. Monsalvo undoubtedly is aware—the building up of a tanker fleet. It is a fairly safe bet that Dr. Monsalvo and the Junta are interested not in nationalization but in dangling the threat of it before Shell and Standard in order to wangle better terms. But it is a dangerous threat to use, for regardless of whether the oil companies take it seriously, one day the people of Venezuela might. Where will the Junta be then?

IN A SERIES OF AMUSING EDITORIALS, William T. Evjue, editor-publisher of the Madison Capital-Times, has been lambasting the latest political shenanigans of the National Association of Manufacturers. The N. A. M. is not only sponsoring a coast-to-coast chain of "workshops" and "clinics" on "freedom" but going in heavily for "old-time" religion. A recent pamphlet entitled "Christianity and Capitalism" develops the thesis that Christian ethics can flourish only in the friendly and altruistic environment of a capitalist society. The same theme runs through the publications of many religious "fronts" active in the Middle West, such as the Christian Freedom Foundation and the American Council for Christian Laymen—the latter run by Verne P. Kaub, recently retired from the public-relations office of the Wisconsin Power and Light Company and a member of the advisory board of Allen Zoll's National Council for American Education. Individual corporations, such as the Texas and Pacific Railway, are harmonizing with the religious note through full-page newspaper advertisements which drive home "sound" economic principles under the guise of an "institutional" religious message. All this has emboldened the Republican National Committee to hire, for the first time in its history, an official party chaplain. He is the Reverend W. H. Alexander of Oklahoma City, who claims that the Lord gave him direct orders to be a candidate for the United States Senate in 1930. "I will do my best," he told the press after the announcement of his new appointment, "to win a victory for Christian America." The "Christian American" section of the Republican National Committee intends to use Mr. Alexander in small towns and rural areas where the "old-time" religion is still strong. As Mr. Evjue suggests, the N. A. M. and the Republican high command are out to prove that the Lord is a Taft Republican.

SOUTHERN REACTION TO THE FBI ARREST OF the ten Klansmen in North Carolina has been encouraging. From the governor's mansion in the Tarheel state, Kerr Scott said, "I think people all over the state are pretty happy about the arrests," and the mayor of Tabor City in Columbus County—where the arrests occurred—declared that "Columbus County is just like the rest of the nation, and we feel that there is no place for this outlaw action. Any organization that tries to break up democracy is riding for a fall." Superior Court Judge Henry A. Grady of New Bern, North Carolina, who was the state's Grand Dragon of the KKK when it was disbanded some twenty-five years ago, commented, "There is no place in North Carolina for the Ku Klux Klan . . . if those fellows are guilty, I think they ought to suffer the severe penalty of the law." Elsewhere throughout the South similar editorial and civic commendation for the government's swift justice appeared. William G. Cole, editor of the Whiteville News Reporter, and the Reverend T. C. Gant, Baptist pastor, warmly applauded the event. Other publications, such as the Charlotte Observer, the Raleigh, North Carolina, News and Observer, the Richmond, Virginia, Times-Dispatch, and the Atlanta, Georgia, Journal, also favored the federal police action. Perhaps this small measure of positive news from a South so recently shamed by racist outrages in Florida and Texas might provide the United States Department of Justice with the incentive needed to bring the perpetrators of the Moore murders before our courts of law.

Lattimore Strikes Back

O WEN LATTIMORE spoke for all free-minded Americans when he launched his lusty counter-attack on the McCarran Internal Security subcommittee. Indeed, he did better than that, for his testimony must have put heart into many Americans who have been cowed by the campaign of insinuation, bullying, and slander conducted from the privileged sanctuary of House and Senate hearings. It takes courage these days to march into battle bearing the weapons of outraged patriotism and a clear conscience; too many of those attacked have been reduced by fear to humble protestations of innocence or apologetic alibis. Lattimore is a man, not a frightened bureaucrat. And if his blazing indignation led him into small inconsistencies or lapses of memory, the broad truthfulness of his testimony remains undamaged.

But Owen Lattimore, besides proving that courage still breathes in America, has performed another major service. He has challenged the courts to test the accuracy of the charges against him, and his own honesty. The McCarran committee, like the House Un-American Activities Committee, has welcomed the testimony of the most suspect witnesses—men and women processed by the Communist Party machine who have recanted and turned state's evidence. The reputations of high government officials and other citizens of standing have been laid waste by a word from such witnesses. Undoubtedly the conviction of Hiss helped spread the feeling that denunciations by informers constitute valid proof. Their power has been further fortified by the backing they have had from committee members and counsel, from Joseph R. McCarthy, and from outside pressure groups like the China Lobby. The result, as the New York Times said last Saturday, has been to build up "a corrosive atmosphere of mistrust and suspicion throughout the country and particularly within the government of the United States."

We have seen the by-products of this evil business in the growing timidity of officials in Washington and the foreign service. In the name of "Americanism" the Congressional inquisitors have deliberately undermined the nation's integrity and effectiveness and diminished us in the eyes of democrats in all countries. Panic is not the full explanation of this miserable business. It stems largely from crude motives of political advantage, exaggerated by the oncoming Presidential contest.

The methods of the various Congressional loyalty inquiries have nothing to do with "security"; on the contrary they dangerously distort the whole question by making security procedures appear synonymous with police-state techniques. This distortion and its evil results Professor Lattimore has challenged. No doubt he has done so in his own behalf, but if the committee succeeds in catching him in a misstatement they think might be construed as perjury, the bigger issue also will be fought out where it should be—in a court of law with proper democratic safeguards. And if he wins a victory there, it not only will clear his name but will defeat the plans of McCarthy, McCarran, and Company to bring down bigger game than Lattimore. For without question their real targets are Ambassador Jessup and Secretary of State Acheson—and through them the Administration as a whole.

It is in the context of these broad political purposes that we present the sections of the Lattimore testimony which follow.

FREDA KIRCHWEY

EXCERPTS FROM HIS TESTIMONY

On "Perjurer" Budenz

ALL kinds of attempts have been made to depict me as a Communist or a Soviet agent. I have in fact been falsely identified as a fellow-traveler, sympathizer, or follower of the Communist line or promoter of Communist interests. Now I want to make my position clear. I am none of these things and have never been. . . .

One of the most shocking things that has happened in the proceedings is that not one of the witnesses against me has ever been asked in examination or cross-examination a question that would test his motives or his reliability. Most shocking in this respect has been the suppression or at least the bland ignoring of evidence already of record. The counsel of this subcommittee, Mr. Morris, was the counsel of the Republican minority of the Senate subcommittee on Foreign Relations (the Tydings committee) and therefore had intimate knowledge of this record evidence. It has also been widely reported in the press, I will cite just one example, a rather striking one—that of Louis F. Budenz.

The proceedings of the Tydings committee show that Budenz's accusations of me before that subcommittee were a complete fabrication concocted for the specific purpose of his appearance there. They show (1) that until he was recruited to tell his fantastic yarn Budenz never mentioned me to the FBI despite hundreds of hours of testimony (transcript, p. 1116); (2) that in 1949 when he wrote an article for Collier's denouncing many persons for their participation in the Chinese situation, Budenz made no mention of me (transcript p. 1096); (3) that when he published a book in 1950 dealing with the same subject, he made no reference to me in his manuscript, inserting a passing mention only after I was publicly attacked by Senator McCarthy. All of this material was available to your committee, and your counsel, Mr. Robert Morris, was thoroughly familiar with it, but not one syllable of it was entered in your record, nor was Mr. Budenz asked a single question concerning it. . . .

In connection with this man Budenz, Senators, I call your attention to the fact that the personal history and character of Louis Budenz was thoroughly gone into in the hearings before the Tydings committee in 1950.

I exposed him as a liar before the Tydings committee. Since then a distinguished newspaperman, Mr. Joseph Alsop, has publicly challenged him as a perjurer, and has demanded of this committee that the record of Budenz's testimony be sent over to the Department of Justice for examination to see whether he should be prosecuted for perjury. . . .

On Freedom of the Press

I want to say clearly that in my own work as editor of Pacific Affairs [official publication of the Institute of Pacific Relations] from 1934 to 1941 I was not dominated or directed or influenced in any way by Communist or pro-Communist people or attitudes. Pacific Affairs was not an American publication. It was an international publication. . . .

I call your attention to my analysis of Pacific Affairs during the years I edited it which appears on pages C 1 to C 5 of my statement of May 2, to the Tydings committee, which I have just handed to you, and from which I wish to quote a few paragraphs.

May I remind you that throughout this period there was nothing reprehensible or even unusual about the occasional publication of significant left-wing views or the analysis of left-wing movements in Far Eastern countries? Such views and analyses appeared in all the leading journals of the United States and the whole Western world. In those days, before Kohlberg, McCarthy, and Budenz undertook to revise the American tradition of free inquiry and free speech, nobody dreamed of accusing an editor or publisher of being a Russian spy because such views were printed.

I have made a new tabulation for you of all material published in Pacific Affairs under my editorship. Of a total of 250 contributions, only 17—written by 11 persons—could possibly be called, by anyone, left of center because of facts or opinions favorable to Russia, Chinese Communists, guerrillas, or leftist movements in Asia. Remember this was an international magazine. Ninety-four articles were definitely right of center, and 143 either dealt with non-political and non-economic subjects or presented purely neutral points of view. There was nothing even remotely like a "mobilization" of Communist or leftist writers.

I would also like to point out that the same 11 people who contributed the 17 articles I have mentioned as representing left-wing positions contributed, during the same years, a total of at least 204 articles to reputable non-Communist periodicals, including the Saturday Evening Post, Reader's Digest, Literary Digest, American Mercury, Fortune, and the Atlantic Monthly. . . .

By promoting the publication and discussion of important facts and opinions the I. P. R., in my opinion, was making and is still making a valuable contribution to our shockingly meager information about the Far East. To use political intimidation to curtail or eliminate the free market of facts and ideas to which the I. P. R. has contributed would be a catastrophe to the best interests of this country.

In a free country the discussion of foreign policy cannot be monopolized or patrolled by the government. The people of a democracy and the officials who handle foreign policy in the government need to be able to draw upon a wide field of academic and private research, done by people who are not subject to bureaucratic controls. It is right that the Congress should interest itself closely in both the issues and the conduct of foreign policy, but it is not right that the Congress should make itself the censor of academic research and personal opinion. . . .

On a Strong State Department

I believe that it is as important to the welfare and safety of this country to have a strong State Department and an able foreign service in our diplomacy as it is to have effective military forces. I believe that the usefulness of our foreign-service personnel has already been jeopardized by the work of this committee—both directly by attacks on irreplaceable personnel and indirectly by impairing the confidence of the nation and our foreign allies in our State Department and by instituting a reign of terror among our foreign-service personnel.

First, as to the direct injury: it is a fact that almost all the few men with outstanding experience and knowledge of China have already either been eliminated from the Department of State or are working in other parts of the world, in the hope of keeping them out of the line of fire of a bitterly partisan political fight and out of range of the venom of men who are determined to find evil where none exists.

The three outstanding examples of men sacrificed to the hysteria that has been whipped up in this country by the China Lobby—a hysteria to which this committee, I am sorry to say, is contributing—are John Stewart Service, O. Edmund Clubb, and John Carter Vincent. Any one of these men would have been capable of holding, in our Far Eastern policy, the kind of respected position that is held with regard to Russian policy by George Kennan; but where are they now? . . .

Each of these men is a loss to the State Department—and there are few men of the same caliber left. The indirect damage to the conduct of our diplomacy is even greater. The more politically controversial our problems of diplomacy are, the more vital it is that the experts in the State Department should be able to discuss them fully, frankly, and without fear, and should be free to consult with academic experts. But we have reached a point of general intimidation at which our diplomatic representatives must feel under great pressure to report back to Washington only what it is safe to report, and make only those policy recommendations that they feel sure will not result in political attacks on their careers.

I am reminded, Senators, of something that once happened to the Russians. In 1939 they invaded Finland, sure that they were going to have a walkover, but suffered serious military defeats and tremendous damage to their prestige. Does anybody doubt that this was because political intimidation had made yes-men of the Soviet diplomats reporting to Moscow? Communist doctrine and the party line required them to report that the Finns were groaning under bourgeois-capitalist oppression and would welcome the Russian invaders. They dared not report the truth: that the Finns were a democratic people, willing to fight against even the Russian colossus in defense of their liberties. The consequence was that Russia walked into a booby trap.

The anger of the American people will be great, Senators, if the political reporting of the State Department degenerates to this point because of political persecution, intimidation, and the demand that the China Lobby be empowered to lay down a line to the State Department. What booby traps is the China Lobby laying on the road ahead of us? . . .

On Harold Stassen

In 1949 I was invited by the State Department with about thirty other people to take part in a discussion of Far Eastern policy; and as part of the preparations for that discussion I contributed—also on invitation—a memorandum of my views. To the best of my recollection this is the only time, in more than twenty-five years, that the State Department has asked me for my views.

For the purpose of discrediting the Far Eastern policy of the present Administration, and presumably to keep himself in the newspapers as a perpetual Presidential candidate, Mr. Harold Stassen has attempted to make me the scapegoat of this conference.

Mr. Stassen accused me of leading, at this conference, a "prevailing Lattimore group" which advocated a Communist line. He then described a "ten-point program" which he claimed I had advocated. Mr. Stassen obviously did not expect the record of the conference would be made public. Accordingly, he let his imagination run riot and attributed to me all the opinions expressed at this conference with which he disagreed, and some that he just imagined.

As soon as I learned of Mr. Stassen's statements I appealed to the State Department to release the full record of the conference. I publicly asked Mr. Stassen to join me in this request, which he did not do.

As soon as I could obtain a transcript of my remarks I released it to the press, and later the full transcript of the entire conference was released. You have that in your files, and I ask you to check it against what I say here. This transcript clearly showed that I had not advocated any of the ten points which Mr. Stassen had so irresponsibly labeled as a Lattimore program. . . .

In his second hearing, after the full record had been released, Mr. Stassen backtracked. He did not, of course, admit error. That would have been out of character for a Presidential candidate. . . . A member of this committee did his best to help Mr. Stassen. As "evidence" Mr. Stassen cited the fact that I made the not very brilliant or original remark that there was a "new situation" in Asia.

"That meant the recognition of Communist China, doesn't it?" asked Senator Smith, eagerly coming to his aid. "That is right," said Stassen.

How much more silly can the part-time president of a great university get? . . .

On ex-Communist Wittfogel

I turn now to the ex-Communist, Karl August Wittfogel. In his testimony Wittfogel tried to create two impressions—that in the early years of our acquaintance we were friendly with each other on the basis of mutual Communist sympathies, and that after he finally stopped being a Communist, in 1939, he broke off relations with me. Both of these pictures, drawn by Wittfogel's inventive hindsight, are maliciously false. . . .

The flimsy statements by which Wittfogel attempted to show that I knew he was a Communist are complete nonsense. The chief one is a story that in my presence Dr. Woodbridge Bingham had asked him if he had ever been a Communist and he said no. He then tried to suggest that I flashed him a smile implying that I knew that what he really meant was that he was a Communist. The truth is that I have not the faintest recollection of this whole conversation, but if I smiled at all, it was certainly a non-Communist smile. Now I would be willing to believe that Communists have an arsenal of secret signals, but I would never suppose that it included anything as good-natured as a smile. In fact, I thought that these grim conspirators regarded a smile as a bourgeois gesture—practically as an enemy of the state. If I am wrong, and if a smile is a secret red signal, I confess that I used to smile a great deal. In the pre-McCarthy days I used to think that life was lots of fun.

Wittfogel also made the ridiculous assertion that the fact that I used the terms "feudal" and "feudal survival" in describing Asiatic societies showed that I was a Communist. His claim that these terms are nothing but litmus papers for telling Communists from non-Communists is ridiculous. . . .

If the use of terms like "feudal survival" is a test of communism the following quotation may be of interest. It is from the American Anthropologist, July-September, 1951, p. 403, and is from a review of a book about Japan: "But here [in Japan] as in Germany, industrialization was so late and so rapid that many feudal elements survived."

The author who thus uses the hideous and forbidden expression "feudal elements" is Esther S. Goldfrank (Mrs. Karl August Wittfogel). I hasten to say I know nothing of her political views, and in any event I wouldn't accuse Wittfogel of anything on account of his association with his wife. . . .

On Collaboration with Communists

One of the principal targets of the China Lobby's criticism in the controversy about the history of our Chinese policy has been the proposal for a coalition between the Nationalists and the Communists—or more properly for a working arrangement between the two, in order to avoid a civil war in which, as informed observers knew and as events proved, the Chiang government would be bound to lose. Even General Marshall's motives have been assailed by the China Lobby because he advocated this, in spite of the fact that it is a matter of record that this policy was first sponsored by Secretary of State Byrnes, who has never been attacked for it and should not be.

It is nonsense to say, as had been dogmatically asserted before this committee, that coalition or cooperation with Communists always ends with the Communists taking over.

The Free French cooperated with the Communists, and the Communists did not take over France. Today about a third of the French Deputies are Communists.

The post-war government of Burma began as a coalition with Communists, but the Communists were later expelled and armed action taken against them.

The Indonesian Nationalist movement began as a united front with Communists, but the Indonesian government has since taken armed action to suppress them.

The British cooperated during the war with Indian Communists, but the Communists did not take over India.

In saying this I do not want to be misunderstood as advocating collaboration with Communists. This is always dangerous—as dangerous as a partnership with a bear. It should be tolerated only where there is no alternative. My point is only that coalition is not necessarily surrender, and that coalition may reasonably be advocated in particular circumstances by persons whose sole objective is the ultimate defeat of communism. . . .

On Preventing War

In defending ourselves against totalitarian aggression abroad and infiltration within, we must not, despairing of our heritage of freedom, try to take refuge in the brutal kind of police state that we fought against when we destroyed Hitler and defeated Japan. . . .

War may come upon us. We may have no choice other than to endure and inflict its horrors. But the moral values that we are defending cannot be defended if we take upon ourselves the inhuman and brutal responsibility of preventive war. The demands of civilization and humanity are that we make every effort, unless and until we are forced into war, to protect ourselves and the values of civilization by means short of war.

The policy which I have described, as well as the policy to which our government and the United Nations are committed at the moment, is the policy of containment of aggression and of building up the conditions and forces of freedom. . . .

Gentlemen, of this I am certain: so long as this program of maneuver is our policy, so long as we choose the difficult and great course of peace, we are completely dependent for success on the validity of our information, the skill with which we analyze the information, and the ability not only of our diplomats but of our non-government, academic, and private research students and analysts. We cannot hope to play this dangerous game, and certainly not to win it, unless we have the facts as to what is going on. Our observers must be allowed to report the facts as they see them, without the fear that their motives will be misconstrued if they tell the truth. We must know the facts favorable to our enemy as well as those that we like. Of equal importance, we must have the views and opinions of all who have any special competence. Their views must be freely stated and stoutly maintained, so that those who have the ultimate decisions to make may have the fullest choice of various alternatives and so that the people may understand the issues at stake. . . .

Germany and Lisbon

BY CAROLUS

Bonn

THE West German press published the results of the Lisbon conference on Ash Wednesday, and to the German people, who learned they were to be remilitarized whether they liked it or not, the news seemed darkly in keeping with the day. In the Catholic provinces of the Federal Republic the carnival season was over and the gloomy period of fast was beginning. Two days before, on Rose Monday, at the climax of the revelry in Cologne, judgment had been pronounced on Lisbon. A million people stood in the streets, in front of the ruined buildings, to watch the carnival parade. One of the humorous floats was labeled "European Army." It showed a huge amorphous figure mounted on a truck, a futuristic monster, more fantastic than any creature of Picasso's imagination. Behind it marched a company of German soldiers in ragged, crazy uniforms, armed with canes and brooms, and then came a group of smartly turned-out Allied officers proclaiming themselves "The Victors." The float was greeted with scornful laughter which turned into thunderous applause for the German soldiers and then, at sight of the self-styled victors, into boos and hisses.

Every city and town in Germany, one reads in the local papers, reacted to Lisbon in the same way. The people are furious that the government, against their will and without authorization from Parliament, agreed to contribute German divisions, and billions of marks as well, to NATO defense. The Social Democratic opposition is determined that the agreement shall not be carried out and is renewing its demand for a general election. It maintains that the Parliament has no right to create a German army; that the constitution must be changed before that can be done. The constitution, of course, can only be changed by a two-thirds' vote of the Parliament, and the Adenauer government has but a scant majority. Moreover, the opposition insists, since the present Parliament was chosen under such different circumstances from those prevailing today, the will of the people should be consulted in new elections.

Six million organized workers support the Social Democratic position, although Christian Fette, president of the General Federation of Labor, has declared that Germany has a duty to the European community and should make a conditional military contribution to its defense. His statement has evoked violent protests, and revolts against his leadership are brewing in many unions. The question what can be done if the government majority imposes remilitarization is passionately discussed by rank-and-file unionists, and occasionally one hears talk of a general strike. That such a drastic measure is even thought of shows how severe is the crisis brought on by the Lisbon decisions and Adenauer's arbitrary action.

German democracy will be the first sacrifice to Lisbon. German social progress will be the second. Bonn has agreed to spend twelve and a half billion marks a year on armament, of which something over one billion will be allocated to Berlin and another billion used for the existing frontier guards and military pensions. Adenauer's Finance Minister says he will not raise taxes but will ask the several Länder to increase their contributions to the federal government 13 per cent, which will make them give up 40 per cent of their revenues. That will mean an end to their public-housing projects and a sharp curtailment of relief for the nine million refugees from the east and the even needier pensioners, disabled veterans, war widows, and orphans.

If Dr. Adenauer and his ministers are proud of their success in obtaining a German army, many deputies are deeply disturbed. Even those representing government parties recognize that remilitarization will have serious consequences for both domestic and foreign politics. Their greatest fear is that it will perpetuate the division of the country and increase the danger of war. They might not go so far as to vote against the government, but in secret they hope that rearmament plans will finally be wrecked on French opposition. Like the deputies from the middle-class parties, most of the bourgeois newspapers are skeptical about the results of Lisbon and assert that Acheson claims a great success for domestic political reasons.

No responsible politician, no sober journalist, believes in the much-talked-of fifty divisions. The Bonn General Anzeiger recalls Göring's promise before the war that no enemy plane would penetrate to the skies over Germany and cautions against underestimating Russian strength. The Stuttgart Wirtschaftszeitung says: "Whatever the Americans do in pursuit of their own aims, and whatever action is taken at Bonn and Paris, we must never cease to demand that the great powers use this critical year not only for rearmament but for an earnest attempt to mitigate the conditions that make rearmament necessary." The Social Democratic Press Service found the Lisbon decisions "astonishing," since they were a virtual admission that "the United States feared it would be unable to implement its European policy." In that case "the value of the policy in defending Europe against the Soviet threat must be questioned." The agreement between the United States and Bonn on the subject of the German contribution had only made the desired European unity more difficult to achieve. Never had France and Germany been farther apart, and passions were being unloosed in both countries that were widening the gap. "New parliamentary elections," the Social Democratic organ continued, "are of international importance for the reason that any rearmament measure that the government forces through the present unrepresentative Parliament will never be carried out."

Many deputies and trade-unionists express themselves in less diplomatic language. "For the first time," they say, "communism has a chance in West Germany."

A Blow to Disarmament

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

United Nations, New York

THE reactions reaching the United Nations from the capitals most directly affected by the decisions of the Lisbon conference—Moscow, Paris, Bonn, London—are still either too scanty or too official to offer a real basis of evaluation; the Soviet press, for instance, has limited itself to predicting that the Western rearmament program drawn up at Lisbon will further complicate the economic situation of member nations. But even in the present mood of American exultation over "the huge psychological success," to use Walter Lippmann's definition, achieved at a moment of rather dark anticipations, when the obstacles within the Atlantic coalition had begun to appear almost insuperable, some signs of concern are perceptible. After all it is only a week or so before the new Disarmament Commission, agreed to at Paris, will meet here for the first time—under the shadow of the armament agreements of Lisbon.

The creation of the commission by the Big Four representatives who met privately in the Palais de Chaillot from December 1 to December 10 was in the last analysis the only positive accomplishment of the Sixth Assembly. It was the determination of the small and middle-sized countries to prevent the United Nations from becoming the major victim of the cold war that inspired the resolution, introduced by Iraq, Pakistan, and Syria, later amended by Norway and Lebanon, and finally adopted unanimously. I remember saying at the time to some of the delegates: "This is all very well, provided that before the commission starts work nothing irreparable is done about the rearmament of Germany."

Nobody expected a miracle. The new commission would inherit all the fundamental disagreements that had hampered the efforts of the Assembly. But from the moment Mr. Vishinsky announced that the Soviet Union would participate there was a feeling that the disarmament question would at least remain in the area of East-West discussion. Now, after Lisbon, some of the small powers that placed more hope in that limited but concrete possibility are asking themselves what the commission can do beyond reviving the well-known spectacle of reciprocal recriminations.

The answers of such delegates as will comment are colored by the different ways in which they interpret the consequences of Lisbon, especially in regard to the American and Russian positions, since it is evident in advance that if neither power is willing to make use of the Disarmament Commission, any attempts the other powers may make in the direction of a rapprochement will be fruitless. About America the sentiment is more clear. It is generally assumed that the United States believes Russia has already lost the chance to prevent the development of the Atlantic coalition on the lines laid down by Washington. Of course as long as billions of dollars and innumerable sacrifices are demanded from the parliaments of the various countries, including the United States Congress, the menace of Russian aggression will continue to be the keynote of American policy within and outside the United Nations. But this does not conflict with the fact that, since Lisbon, the dominant American feeling, expressed privately, is that "Russia is now in our pocket" and while the Kremlin may still cause a lot of trouble, in Indo-China, in Malaya, and even in Korea, it will not be able to keep the West from becoming the most powerful armed combination of all time. In this state of mind the United States is not likely, in the coming session of the Disarmament Commission, to accept any plan that would imply a diminution of the balance achieved at Lisbon.

But of course Russia, in Washington's pocket or not, is still on the scene, and its reaction is awaited in United Nations circles with both curiosity and anxiety. One long-held assumption remains still up in the air. It had been expected that the Kremlin, while ready to meet the West on certain other issues and to retreat diplomatically where necessary, would be adamant on the question of the rearmament of Germany. But German rearmament suddenly dominates the international picture, and, to the amazement of certain people in the United Nations with whom I have talked here, Russian diplomacy appears to be dispersed among various lesser issues. The question arises whether, instead of a frontal counter-attack, Moscow may not plan a flank movement, making the most of the undeniable impact that the recent appeal of the Grotewohl government in favor of a peace treaty has had on Bonn. In any case, whatever Russia's reaction to the Lisbon agreements, it is feared in United Nations circles that the Soviet representative will not appear in the Disarmament Commission in a very cooperative mood.

Another Crisis for Ike

BY WILLARD SHELTON

Washington

SWEEPING political predictions would be unwise in advance of the New Hampshire primary, which will provide the first test of the relative popularity of various candidates. But certain facts may be noted. The Eisenhower forces are seriously in need of a really smashing victory in the Republican balloting. On the Democratic side, Mr. Truman can afford to lose a few primaries to Senator Estes Kefauver; he can undoubtedly win renomination by his party if he wants to. But an excellent showing by Kefauver, followed by Mr. Truman's voluntary withdrawal from the race, might make the Tennessee Senator a factor in the Democratic convention. If Mr. Truman does decide to step aside, however, his heir apparent still seems likely to be Governor Adlai Stevenson of Illinois, who is working just as hard as Kefauver, though in a different way, to make himself "available" if the occasion arises.

One primary does not decide a Presidential nomination, as was proved in 1948 when Stassen swept Wisconsin and then was abruptly checked in Oregon by Dewey. But in New Hampshire Eisenhower has little to gain and much to lose, whereas Taft has much to gain and little to lose. The Eisenhower people made the mistake of claiming New Hampshire for their own. Eisenhower was backed by the Republican governor and by the organization groups that in 1950 renominated Senator Tobey. But ever since Taft decided to enter the primary, Governor Adams has been rather irritably denying to reporters that Eisenhower is a sure winner.

The plain fact is that the Republican organization in New Hampshire is divided, and Taft is supported by most of the Republicans who in 1950 nearly succeeded in throwing Tobey out of the Senate as "too liberal." If Taft gets from four to seven of the state's fourteen convention delegates and makes a good showing in the parallel preferential voting for candidates, it will be a worth-while victory.

The trouble with Eisenhower's campaign is that owing to his absence from the country it has never got off the ground. Instead, it has run into a series of crises, with Ike's supporters here constantly demanding more overt declarations from him to make up for the failure to materialize of the "spontaneous" draft they once dreamed of. Eisenhower handled the first crisis for them by his "green light" press conference during a flying trip to Washington, when he said, in effect, that he would not disavow those who were working for him. In the second crisis he let Senator Lodge announce that as civilian president of Columbia University he had declared himself a Republican, confirming Lodge later in a statement issued at Paris.

When a third crisis arose, various Eisenhower supporters began clamoring for him to "come home" by May 1. "He can't win," they wailed, "unless he campaigns." Why they imagine that Ike will "come home," in the face of his very clear statement that under no circumstances would he ask to be relieved of his duty in Europe, surpasses understanding. But the demand is a sign of their fear that Taft is about to seize the nomination by weight of fire power.

They have reason to be apprehensive. Taft is campaigning with intelligence and determination. He is the only front-running candidate in a position to make hard-headed deals for delegates, to promise patronage and rewards and jobs. The Republican professionals who control delegates are not interested in pie in the sky or convinced by theoretical claims that only Ike can win in November. They are beginning to suspect that maybe Taft can win in November—or at least that only an alliance with Taft holds out a clear prospect of reward. Many newspapers are now running syndicated newspaper articles purporting to explain Eisenhower's political creed in his own words. To the delegate-controlling politicians these will not seem a satisfactory substitute for Ike's presence.

Senator Lodge of Massachusetts and Senator Ives of New York may feel that their own reelection chances would be ruined with Taft heading the Republican ticket. But Senators ordinarily do not control delegates; governors and state chairmen and party bosses control them. If Eisenhower has the popular pulling power that is claimed, New Hampshire is the place for him to show it.

For the Democrats, nothing will be clear until the President makes his announcement of intentions. Back in 1951 he said that he had already made up his mind, but a few weeks ago he asked reporters to stop bothering him about it, because he had a very difficult question to decide. Mr. Truman obviously would hate to contemplate the possible election of Taft, who has already promised to repudiate the President's foreign policy, change the military leadership, and do something different—nobody knows just what—in the Far East. Whether Mr. Truman will eventually decide that he has made the Administration record and is thus the best person to defend it may depend on the extent to which he is influenced by Mrs. Truman's desire to get out of the White House as against the desire of various White House cronies to hang on to their perquisites.

Assuming that Truman does not run, the Stevenson boomlet is at least as important as Kefauver's open drive for the nomination or Senator Robert S. Kerr's role as a Truman stalking horse in Nebraska. The weak men around Truman have an abiding hatred for Kefauver as the "crime buster" who helped the Republicans beat Scott Lucas in 1950 in Illinois. What actually beat Lucas, of course, was the over-ripe record of the Democratic Party in Chicago, its mistake in nominating a wealthy cop for sheriff of Cook County, and the undistinguished Senate career of Lucas himself. The cronies will never understand this and they still despise Kefauver. Of more weight is the fact that there are not enough primaries in the country for the Tennessee Senator to get the delegates he will need to win against Truman's open opposition.

Senator Richard B. Russell, who announced his candidacy late last week, will have strong Southern support, but since 1936, when the Democratic National Convention substituted nomination by simple majority for the two-thirds' rule, the South has held no veto power over the Democratic nominee. Russell is an able man, far more statesman-like than most of his Dixiecrat supporters, but the Democrats will not nominate an anti-civil-rights candidate unless they decide to commit hara-kiri. Northern industrial and Negro votes are more important to the party than the Southern Electoral College votes. The real question about Russell is whether, after being beaten in the convention, he will support the Democratic nominees or bolt to whatever Dixiecrat movement gets under way.

Stevenson has certain clear-cut advantages. He is not challenging the President's control of the party, he is a proved vote getter, and he is considered by some White House strategists to be ideally situated to appeal to the three groups of greatest importance to the Democratic Party—organized labor, farmers, and Northern minorities, including Negro voters. He swept Illinois in 1948 by 570,000 votes, when Senator Douglas obtained a plurality of 407,000 and Mr. Truman one of 33,000. He has administered his state honestly and skilfully. Most important of all, perhaps, he has been getting an excellent press since he visited Truman here last month.

Stevenson will not talk to reporters about his own Presidential prospects, but he willingly discusses national issues, and his ideas square well enough with Truman's. A Committee of One Thousand, with impressive names and leadership, is ready in Illinois to back him if the word comes. In Washington, Stevenson's friends have quietly opened an office under the leadership of a liberal Chicago lawyer, George Ball.

The President has said he "hopes" to make his announcement before April 29—the last day on which he can file in Missouri as a candidate for his old job in the Senate. A probably unreliable rumor is that he may choose to make his declaration on March 29 at the Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner in Washington, fourth anniversary of the famous dinner at which he confidently told the $100-a-plate party faithful that "the next President will be a Democrat—and you're looking at him."

Most of his real friends here would like to see the President voluntarily retire. If he loses in the election he will feel personally repudiated, and if he wins he will face four more years of terrible struggle to implement a program with a divided party.

Mix-up in Minnesota

BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

Duluth

IT IS hard to say just what Minnesota voters will decide in the Presidential primary on March 18. A peculiar combination of circumstances has reduced the balloting to an absurdity: while six delegations originally filed, only one avowed candidate for the Presidency is entered, namely, Harold E. Stassen.

This will be the first Presidential primary under a 1949 law supposed to have been tailored to meet Stassen's future political requirements. The law provides that if a candidate wants to take his name off the ballot he must sign an affidavit stating "that he is not a candidate for the nomination of President for the party for which he has been filed and that if nominated by such party he would not accept." Stassen may have had both MacArthur and Eisenhower in mind when this tricky measure was drafted.

The six delegations which originally filed included one for Stassen, one for Eisenhower, two for MacArthur, a favorite-son delegation for Senator Hubert H. Humphrey, and a delegation for Senator Estes Kefauver. The last appears to have been a "stooge" delegation entered without Kefauver's consent by elements unfriendly to Senator Humphrey. Kefauver has since said: "I do not wish to be a candidate in Minnesota; I desire that my name shall not appear on the ballot." General MacArthur has also asked that his name be withdrawn, but neither Kefauver nor MacArthur has signed the affidavit which the statute requires. Last week Attorney General J. A. A. Burnquist ruled the requirement invalid, and acting on this ruling, Secretary of State Mike Helm struck the Kefauver delegation and the one formally pledged to MacArthur from the ballot. But a delegation filed for one Edward C. Slettedahl, state chairman of the "Fighters for MacArthur," who refers to himself as a "stand-in" candidate for the General, remains in the running. Since Senator Humphrey has disavowed any personal Presidential hopes and Kefauver and MacArthur have succeeded in withdrawing, the contest is between Stassen and Eisenhower.

The Eisenhower leaders apparently decided to enter a slate of delegates in Minnesota only after Stassen had barged into the New Hampshire primary. Taft has powerful support in Minnesota but has refused to enter the primary on three grounds: it is his policy not to compete with favorite-son candidates; he is heavily committed in the Wisconsin primary (April 1), which his supporters regard as crucial, and also in the New Hampshire primary (March 11); and he believes that he will get many "second choice" votes from both the Stassen and Eisenhower delegates. Some politicians here feel that he is making a serious mistake, since he might stand a good chance in a three-cornered Taft-Eisenhower-Stassen fight.

Early surveys revealed wide popularity for Eisenhower. In a poll taken among 450 employees in a Minneapolis industrial plant he received more votes than all other candidates combined. Democratic strength in the area, normally 51 per cent, was shown to be down to 28 per cent. A poll taken in Northfield, with the college vote at St. Olaf's and Carleton excluded, gave Eisenhower 274, Taft 195, Stassen 184. A poll taken by Dick Bruner of the Mankato Free Press indicated that Republican county chairmen in the Second District thought Kefauver would be the hardest Democratic candidate to beat; Democratic-Farmer-Labor leaders said that Eisenhower would be the strongest Republican nominee.

Nevertheless, enthusiastic receptions given Stassen in such communities as St. Cloud, Willmar, and Rochester have apparently disturbed those in charge of the national Eisenhower campaign. Senator Frank Carlson, co-chairman of the Eisenhower for President Headquarters, has since been quoted as saying that his organization does not support the Eisenhower slate in Minnesota. Actually Stassen's reception in Minnesota has been hearty largely because he is campaigning as a favorite-son candidate in a state in which he was governor for three terms. Should he roll up a big vote in Minnesota, in default of any opposition, his chances in Wisconsin will be improved. In any case, he has precipitated a real crisis for the Eisenhower forces.

Perhaps the most noteworthy political fact in the Minnesota situation is that for the first time since 1948 the number of professed Republican voters now exceeds the Democratic-Farmer-Labor total. A recent poll indicates that 37 per cent of the voters now think of themselves as Republicans, 33 per cent as D. F. L., 23 per cent as independents, and 7 per cent as interested in minor groups. The same poll shows a marked movement of independents into the Republican Party and a similar movement from D. F. L. into the independent ranks. In short, the independent vote is leaving the Democratic Party, although it may of course swing back.

A court action has been filed to disqualify the Eisenhower delegation on technical grounds.* Stassen denies any hand in this maneuver, but it is widely believed that his supporters engineered it. One of the persons taking part is a former Republican Congressman who appeared on the platform with him when Stassen announced his candidacy in Philadelphia last December 27. State Railroad and Warehouse Commissioner Leonard Lindquist has denounced Stassen for trying to choke off the Eisenhower slate and charged that the "Stassen dictatorship in Minnesota G. O. P. politics is killing the spirit of many party workers." It is interesting that Lindquist, one of the Eisenhower delegates, is a member of a law firm of which Orville Freeman, who is expected to be the D. F. L. candidate for governor, is also a member. In a number of areas I have sensed a pretty close relationship between certain D. F. L. elements and the pro-Eisenhower people.

Stassen has unquestionably lost strength in Minnesota since 1948. The old-line Republicans feel that in many cases he has "used" them and then let them down. On the other hand, the starry-eyed "internationalist" Republicans, who were enthusiastically pro-Stassen in 1948, are now for Eisenhower, as are many of the followers of former Governor Luther Youngdahl. Stassen is regarded with some cynicism by many elements. A story I heard everywhere is that two states now claim Harold Stassen, but Pennsylvania would gladly yield to Minnesota and Minnesota to Pennsylvania. As usual, he is taking an opportunist line. He is against the "soft internationalism" of the Democrats on the one hand and against the "semi-isolationism of the 1920's" on the other. He favors a "dynamic" policy in which we will use "more American ideas and fewer American dollars." He wants the gold standard restored and advocates inducing corporations to sponsor profit-sharing programs by the grant of tax benefits. Asked how he stood on McCarthy, for whom he campaigned vigorously in Wisconsin in 1946, he said: "I feel the cure for McCarthyism is to remove all those who have shown a weakness toward the communistic attitude"—which is hardly a repudiation.

Postscript:* The state Supreme Court has now ruled the Eisenhower delegation off the ballot. It will ease the tension for Senator Edward J. Thy and others who indorsed Ike before they knew that Harold intended to be a candidate in Minnesota. The Eisenhower forces seem to have been bluffed out of this primary by the reception accorded Stassen. The likely effect will be to strengthen Stassen in Wisconsin and to complicate still further the Eisenhower strategy. Yet the latest polls still show Eisenhower a heavy favorite over Stassen.

Some of the ablest political reporters in the state imparted to me their secret belief that Eisenhower might upset Stassen—a possibility which seemed to be anticipated with universal pleasure. But there is so little real interest in the primary that Minnesota must be put down as a "mix-up," a puzzle. After studying the curious situation, John C. McDonald of the Minnesota Tribune decided that he would "take Red-eyed Sadie in the third." I'm inclined to agree.

Clinical Study in Queens

BY CHARLES R. ALLEN, JR.

THE Fifth Congressional District in the Borough of Queens in New York City, where registered Democrats outnumber registered Republicans nearly three to one, has just sent a Taft-minded Republican to Congress in a by-election. News of the event was greeted with considerable apathy by practically everyone in the country except the chairman of the Republican National Committee, who called it "the handwriting on the wall for Truman." That may be putting it a little strong, especially as the defeated Democrat was almost as violently anti-Truman as his successful opponent. Nevertheless, the cozy little election has its points of interest for all parties concerned, including the trend spotters.

The Fifth District is a community of modest small homes interspersed with garden apartments of the hey-neighbor-turn-down-your-radio variety. Politically it is an area in which the Democrats are often more successful in getting out the registration than the votes. It went for Roosevelt in 1932 and 1936, wildly for Willkie in 1940, and mildly for Dewey in 1948. It elected a Republican Congressman in 1946 and a Democratic Congressman in 1948 and 1950. In 1949 it sent a Democrat to the City Council by a vote of more than two to one.

The successful Republican candidate in the by-election was Robert T. Ross, a veteran of the Eightieth Congress who was attempting a come-back. The Republican National Committee was so determined he should win that it sent Bernard Lamb, a by-election expert, down from headquarters to help him. Lamb and Frank Kenna, chairman of the Queens Republican Committee, did a bang-up job of machine campaigning. "We hit the people with four separate mailings and reached 75,000 of the district's 106,528 voters directly by telephone," Kenna said. "We figured all we had to do was to get out the vote—any vote—and we'd win." Well, they didn't exactly get out the vote; only 30 per cent of the qualified voters went to the polls, which is not such a hot figure even for a by-election. But enough of the 30 per cent voted Republican to make Kenna consider that his 75,000 phone calls were not wasted.

The issues? Kenna summed them up in three words—"crime, corruption, communism." He added that sometimes the three words were conveniently wrapped up in one—"Trumanism." He said the word had a magic effect, even on Democrats. "At first we thought we had to remind the Democrats, in our approach to them, of the corruption in their own party. But we soon found out they knew all about it. After that we just told them, 'Get out and vote!'"

Did the Democrats vote? Kenna says sure they did—they voted for Ross. "Look at Forest Hills," he said. "Three hundred Democrats are registered there. But only three votes were cast for the Democratic candidate on the voting machines. Do you mean to tell me that of three hundred Democrats, only three voted?" Conversely, said the persuasive Kenna, it is impossible to believe that the 17,000 who voted for Ross were all Republicans. "Give us a break and say we got out 50 per cent of our enrolment. That still means we captured at least 4,000 Democratic votes."

Were any other issues placed before the voters in the course of the campaign—foreign policy, inflation, local issues? "There was a local issue," answered Kenna. "Airplane crashes. We're living here near LaGuardia Airport just as the Elizabeth people live near Newark Airport. But I can't say it was much of an issue. It turned out the Democratic candidate was just as much opposed to airplane crashes as our candidate."

The Democratic candidate was Hugh Quinn, whom the district had sent to the City Council in 1949. Quinn managed his own campaign with no help from the Democratic National Committee. Indeed, in the face of aggressive Republican charges of "corruption, crime, and communism," Quinn waged an indignant "not me" campaign, deliberately divorcing himself from anything that smacked of the Truman machine. He even dropped the Democratic star from his campaign literature, possibly because it had exactly the same number of points as the Russian star. Still, his disguise apparently was not good enough. "Truman licked me," he moaned when he received news of his defeat.

Well, there it is. But how would the election have gone had Quinn put on an aggressive campaign, welcoming the support of the Democratic National Committee and making use of the facilities of the New York Telephone Company? That is for the trend spotters to decide. But it does seem that the election showed two things rather clearly. The first is that a "not me" campaign will prove no more effective in 1952 than a "me too" campaign proved in 1948. The second is that the Republicans have decided to campaign, at least on the local level, on the "Trumanism" issue as the obverse of the Democratic "McCarthyism" coin. The Democrats will now have to decide whether their best counter-offensive is to change the word by urging Truman to remove himself from it or to give it another and more salutary meaning.

Tito's Unique Yugoslavia

BY FRITZ STERNBERG

TO STUDY the Yugoslav economic problem one really needs to visit Yugoslavia—many of the relevant facts are still not available elsewhere. I spent last September in Yugoslavia, traveling about the country, visiting factories, talking with officials; my visit culminated in a series of long discussions with high officials in Belgrade in charge of economic policy. After examining my notes and the material I had collected, I began to understand why Russia's systematic efforts to destroy the Tito regime by an economic blockade are not likely to succeed; Yugoslavia's ability not only to free itself from the role of satellite but to hold its own against the Soviet Union and the other states in the Russian orbit was at least partially explained. Answers to other puzzling questions also emerged, such as why the revolution in Yugoslavia had developed so differently from the Russian revolution, and why the Yugoslavs have been able to establish their independence of Moscow while the other Eastern countries remain under Soviet domination. A few of the factors responsible for the unique situation in Yugoslavia are analyzed in this article and one to follow.

When the Bolshevik Party came to power in Russia through the October Revolution, World War I was practically over, and once the party had consolidated its control, it was able to carry out a gigantic social transformation by expropriating the great feudal landowners, who had played such a decisive political role, as well as the relatively small number of capitalists. The imperial Yugoslav armies were defeated by the Germans in World War II just as the czarist armies had been in World War I, but Tito organized his partisan forces while the fight was still raging. The Germans—like the Japanese in China—controlled the cities and railroads but never conquered the whole country. The partisans—like the Chinese guerrillas—could not be completely defeated. When Hitler's occupation forces in Yugoslavia were weakened as a result of German military setbacks elsewhere, the partisans seized one sector of the country after another. And since the former Serbian ruling class had cooperated with the invaders, as fast as the partisans took over an area, they established their own political regime.

Thus the social revolution in Yugoslavia took place during the war, almost as a by-product of the war. Tito's men ousted those in control because they were collaborators and traitors. When the war ended, the revolution was also at an end. The new Yugoslav government, dominated by Tito and the Communist Party, possessed all the economic "commanding heights"—the big industrial concerns, the railroads, the banks, and so forth. It was not necessary, as it had been in Russia in 1917, to carry out a radical social transformation in the wake of a devastating war; the change had been accomplished by the partisans in the process of winning the war.

Yugoslavia is the only Eastern European country in which victory and revolution were in a sense one. In none of the present Russian satellite countries was there any important revolutionary movement while the war was going on. Where major upheavals did occur, at the end of the war or afterward, it was the Red Army that set them in motion and controlled them. And this brings us to the second point which distinguishes the Yugoslav situation from that of other Eastern European countries.

FRITZ STERNBERG, economist and author, has recently brought out a new book, "Capitalism and Socialism on Trial." His second article on Yugoslavia will appear in an early issue.

When the war was over not one Russian soldier stood on Yugoslav soil. So little did Stalin foresee what was to come that the Red armies withdrew from Belgrade, which they had occupied in their thrust against the Germans, and at the end of the struggle Tito stood at the head of his own battle-tested and victorious forces and master of his country—just as Mao Tse-tung was master of China when the civil war was won. Leadership of his own army was Tito's first necessity for staying in power. But this alone would have been insufficient. He could have been overthrown after the break with Moscow had not decisive economic factors come to his aid.

ALTHOUGH Yugoslavia is still an industrially backward country, it is trying hard to develop its industry to the point where iron and coal can be processed at home: Yugoslavia wants a heavy industry of its own. The effort to make an agrarian, raw-material-producing country also an industrial country is evident on all sides. It can be clearly seen in the more advanced republics, Croatia and Slovenia, which in many respects are not far below the industrial level of Czechoslovakia, and even in Macedonia, whose economic development approximates that of Bulgaria or Rumania.

In line with this trend there has been a rapid expansion of cities and urban occupations. At the end of the war 80 per cent of the people were still engaged in cultivating the land and only 20 per cent in business or professions; today the proportion has shifted to 70 per cent in agriculture and 30 in urban occupations. At the end of 1945 the unions had only about a million members; today the number has doubled—1,600,000 industrial workers and 400,000 other employees. With increasing industrialization Yugoslavia has made a break with its own past and at the same time thrown off the restrictions by which Russia sought to transform it into an economic satellite.

Before the war Yugoslavia's development, like that of most other industrially backward nations, was chiefly determined by the influx of foreign capital. Foreign investments increased the output and export of certain raw materials, especially minerals, but did nothing to help Yugoslavia achieve a coordinated industrial structure. Thus while the country possessed all the formal attributes of sovereignty, its economy showed pronounced colonial traits, which of course effectively undermined its political independence as well. By expropriating most of the imported capital and taking control of the nation's economy, the Tito government sharply changed Yugoslavia's semi-colonial status. A Five-Year Plan was set up which aimed, among other things, at processing more and more raw materials at home and using them as the core of a heavy and light machine industry.

Knowing that Russia, after the October Revolution, had been transformed from a primarily agrarian into a mixed agrarian and industrial country, the Yugoslavs took it for granted that the Soviet government would support their industrial program. Their Five-Year Plan was, in fact, largely based on the assumption that the Russians would supply—partially on credit—capital goods and other necessities which they themselves did not yet produce.

But Soviet policy in Eastern Europe, as the years have revealed, is not concerned with helping the Eastern countries develop according to their own economic needs. On the contrary, Russia is evidently determined to gear the economies of the satellite states to its own and in so doing increase their dependence. The five-year plans announced in Prague, Warsaw, and Budapest are in reality part and parcel of the Russian five-year plans. In 1945, however, this policy had not clearly emerged; possibly it had not fully developed. In any case, Russia and the other Eastern countries purchased many of Yugoslavia's products and supplied their own goods in return. But they never fulfilled their credit promises; of the $125,000,000 credit that had been pledged to Yugoslavia, only $800,000—less than 1 per cent—was received. The execution of the Yugoslav Five-Year Plan was in consequence seriously hampered. In the period just after the war, however, Yugoslavia's foreign trade went chiefly to Russia and the Russian satellites. This was in sharp contrast to the situation before the war.

IN 1938 imperial Yugoslavia and Soviet Russia maintained no diplomatic relations, and the trade between the two countries was only 1 per cent of their total trade. About 15 per cent of Yugoslavia's exports went to Albania, Bulgaria, Poland, Rumania, Hungary, and Czechoslovakia, and some 16-18 per cent of its imports were obtained from those countries. In sum, more than four-fifths of Yugoslavia's trade was with countries outside the Soviet Union and its future satellites. The first two post-war years showed a very different picture: almost three-quarters of Yugoslavia's trade was with Russia and Russian-controlled areas.

Although relations between the two governments grew more difficult as Russia tightened its economic grip on Yugoslavia, the Soviet rulers undoubtedly believed that the strong ties which had been formed were insurance against rebellion. Just before their political break with Belgrade they had induced the Yugoslavs to shift large orders for capital goods from the West to Russia and the satellite states. After the break they imposed a strict blockade and must have expected it to bring about the downfall of the Tito government. By 1949, when the blockade was fully in effect, imports from Russia had fallen to a mere 1.62 per cent and those from the satellites to 11.6 per cent.

Today Yugoslavia's trade with Russia and the satellite states stands at zero. The government estimates that the blockade has cost the country about $400,000,000. That is a small sum by American standards; but since Yugoslavia's annual imports total only a little over $300,000,000, the blockade, in less than four years, has cost more than a full year's imports. One can easily realize how severe was its initial impact; only by temporarily suspending part of the first Five-Year Plan and distributing it over a longer period were the Yugoslavs able to survive the blockade's effect. They have also tried to offset their losses by boosting their foreign trade with countries outside the Russian orbit.

This has not been easy, even though Yugoslavia's pre-war trade was, as shown above, predominantly with countries outside Eastern Europe. For one thing, Germany used to have the leading role, contributing in 1938 more than a third of Yugoslavia's imports. Today Yugoslavia is consciously seeking to consolidate its political independence by trading with as many countries as possible. At the same time the character of its trade has changed with the new necessity of importing large amounts of capital goods to speed up the process of industrialization.

A third factor is even more important. In no country outside the Russian orbit have military expenditures taken as large a slice of the national income as in Yugoslavia—over 20 per cent in 1951 and 23 per cent in 1952. This proportion is not only higher than in any of the Atlantic Pact nations of Europe but also higher than in the United States, where, according to budget estimates, military expenditures will absorb 18 per cent of the American national income in 1952-53.

At present Yugoslavia's foreign trade is determined primarily by the rearmament program. Out of $300,000,000 worth of imports, about $100,000,000 worth are armaments. To pay for them Yugoslavia must export a considerable part of its raw materials, which necessarily slows down its own industrial growth. To understand the nation's present straits, one must remember that Yugoslavia, with a population of only 16,000,000, lost more than 10 per cent of its people in the war; the country was long a battlefield in the international struggle, and for even longer civil war raged on its soil. Then in 1948-49 the blockade was imposed, and in 1950 a drought caused poor crops and near-starvation.

Despite these gigantic difficulties the economic upsurge is unmistakable. In 1951 the harvest was better than in any previous post-war year, and there is now food for everybody in village and town. Despite reports to the contrary in some American newspapers, the winter sowing was about the same as a year ago. Complaints and resistance have certainly increased, but much of this opposition is due, not to worse conditions, but to the fact that since the government began to lift restrictions and decentralize its over-all controls, the peasants feel free to speak out. Things are looking up, and if there is no war the hardest years are thought to be over.

Some Plane Facts

THE recent crashes at Elizabeth have raised the question of moving airports farther away from urban centers. Although most are already well removed, nearly all airfields serving large cities, as well as many in smaller communities, have residential areas close by; some are entirely surrounded by built-up districts. The residents of many airport communities, their nerves frayed by the constant racket of low-flying planes and fearful of sudden death from the skies, are demanding an end to air operations in their midst, regardless of the crippling effect such a development would have on commercial aviation and its services to the community at large.

The answer to the Elizabeth tragedies is not in moving airports, but in improving planes and airline practices. The hard fact is that airline planes are not as safe as they can and ought to be. Moreover, the airlines, if they were so minded, could be much better neighbors as well as safer public servants. No attempt has ever been made, for example, to reduce noise; the men who run the airlines brush off every suggestion for changes in engine and propeller design or in take-off and landing procedure that might make life a little more bearable around airports.

During the past four years the passenger fatality rate of the scheduled domestic lines has held nearly constant at about 1.3 deaths per 100,000,000 passenger-miles. This is an improvement over the years immediately after the war. But it is no better than was achieved in the best war and pre-war years despite new and presumably safer planes and vast government expenditures for new airports and navigation aids. Deaths among occupants of buildings and homes struck by planes, moreover, are increasing in frequency; such accidents were rare before the war.

A good many factors have contributed to the airlines' failure to improve their safety record. One is their reluctance to buck popular prejudice against riding backward. Experiments in the United States and Great Britain going back to the war indicate that many more people would survive crashes if they sat facing the tail of the plane so that the back of the seat would take up the first shock. Post mortems have shown that many persons are killed by being snapped over their seat belts; this was the case in sixteen of twenty-eight deaths in a crash at Dallas, Texas, in 1949.

The basic reason, however, why the air safety record is no better is the stress laid by airlines on ever greater speed and economy of operation. Greater speeds allow more flights per plane per year and a greater return to the airline. Whatever may be said about customer preference, this is the reason for the parade of ever faster, larger aircraft since the war.

THERE are, in general, two ways to increase the speed of a plane. One is to use more powerful engines; the other to reduce the plane's "drag" by such measures as decreasing wing area. Since extra horse-power costs money, the airlines and the manufacturers who supply their planes chose the second device for increasing speed. Unfortunately, reducing wing area adversely affects flying characteristics. Other things being equal, the smaller its wings, the faster a plane must move in order to leave the ground, and the higher must be its landing speed.

The Constellation, DC-6, and other new transports have very small wings in proportion to their over-all size. As a result, their take-off and landing speeds approach 100 miles an hour. Such speeds are an imposition on the taxpayer as well as a built-in hazard. They are one reason why current transport craft require runways a mile or more in length. They decrease the margin left for pilot error and increase the risk of engine failure during the take-off run. And they raise formidable special problems, such as how to brake planes to a stop after landing or during a take-off emergency.

The braking problem is a good illustration of the difficulties that the wrong approach to plane design can lead to. In the past the main reliance was placed on wheel brakes and long runways. Wheel brakes cannot be applied full on in a take-off emergency or at the beginning of the landing run; the tires would blow out. And of course wheel brakes will not hold on icy runways any more than automobile brakes on icy roads; there have been several accidents as a result of planes skidding off runways. The airlines found a remedy, but it has caused as much trouble as the problem it was meant to cure. Their solution was not a plane with better take-off and landing characteristics, but a device to reverse the angle or pitch of the propeller blades, thus causing the propellers to act as a powerful air brake. The pitch-reversing mechanism, which will soon be in use on all major airlines, is wonderful when it works: it can bring planes to a complete stop in a few hundred feet. But it has already been involved in four accidents—the last two at Elizabeth and two earlier mishaps which by great good fortune caused no injuries—although it is surrounded by all sorts of safeguards supposed to guarantee that it will operate when and only when it is wanted.

Another built-in hazard in current transport planes is the practice of having one engine drive each propeller. As an emergency precaution the Civil Aeronautics Board requires that four-engined transports be able to take off on three engines, and twin-engined craft on one engine. Experienced pilots report that the precaution is worth little in a real emergency, since the stoppage of a propeller causes a violent shift in the trim of the plane. The difficulty would be obviated by putting two smaller engines on each propeller shaft—a measure that would increase initial costs and fuel consumption but would make the plane easier to handle in case of engine failure. Smaller engines would also reduce the overall frequency of engine failure—still a leading source of accidents and occurring much more often than either the airlines or their special pleader in the government, the C. A. B., cares to admit. One major line averages more than forty failures a month.

The cockpits of pre-war transport planes used to be cited as the ultimate in complexity. They were simple then compared to now. The other day I started to count the instruments and controls in the cockpit of a current four-engined airliner. I gave up at 210 and I was still nowhere near done. Many, of course, are duplicates—there is a complete set of engine instruments, for instance, for each engine—and all the others can be individually justified as contributing in some way to the safe operation of the plane. But the total effect of this fantastic array of instruments and controls has been to create two substantial new hazards—plane failure because of gadget failure, and plane failure because there are just too many gadgets for the small crews customary with the domestic airlines to handle.

Most of the instruments and many of the controls are electrically operated. It may be treason to the electrical age to make the remark, but electrical equipment is not reliable enough for such great trust to be placed in it. A simple analogy will make clear what I mean. Commercial vacuum tubes have a useful life of about 1,000 hours. This is sufficient for dependable operation of a six-tube home radio. It is not enough, as any TV set owner knows, to assure trouble-free operation of a TV receiver with five times as many tubes and five times as great a chance of set failure because of tube failure; TV sets often need to be repaired several times a year. Similarly, most of the electrical instruments and controls on transport planes, taken individually, are fairly reliable.

Taken together, the failure rate is high enough to be a major cause of accidents.

The array of instruments and controls in the cockpit has also increased the burden of the plane crew beyond safe limits. And paradoxically, instrument complexity is itself an outgrowth of the domestic airlines' insistence on small crews in the interest of operating economy. Twin-engined planes carry only a pilot and co-pilot; four-engined craft have two pilots and—at the insistence of the C. A. B.—a flight engineer. Radio operators are not carried. This has made necessary the use of voice radio for all communications as well as of devices designed to make radio navigation simple enough for the pilot or co-pilot to handle. Code radio and ground direction finding, which involve fewer items of equipment and are more reliable in bad weather, have been used with success for years abroad. But they require a separate radio operator. Voice radio and our present radio navigation equipment, moreover, do not relieve the pilots of the communications and navigation burden.

Aside from too high landing and take-off speeds, and the substitution of gadgets for man-power and sound basic design, the race for ever greater speed and operating economy has led to too many new types of planes. As against one in the pre-war period, the famous Douglas DC-3, five distinct plane types have been introduced since the war—the Constellation, the DC-6, the Stratocruiser, and two twin-engined transports, the Martin and Convair. As is inevitable with complicated high-performance equipment, early versions of most of these planes have had unsuspected flaws in design. One had its hydraulic lines too close to red-hot engine exhausts; another had glass-wool cabin insulation that acted as a wick and spread burning oil through the plane, thus turning a minor engine fire into a catastrophe; a third had a poorly designed wing panel that broke in a storm. The flaws were eventually corrected, but at a cost of more than 100 lives. In the meantime the airlines threw away the unique experience with the DC-4, a magnificent plane developed during the war and flown billions of miles all over the world by the air force and the airlines on military contract. If the airlines had stuck with the DC-4—which they regard as too slow—by now they would have a plane that every pilot knew backward and forward, and from which every design flaw had long since been eliminated.

What is needed to make air travel as safe as it ought to be and to relieve fears of another Elizabeth is clear. The first thing is to make safety again the prime consideration. The second is a type of plane that can take off and land at airports of reasonable size without the assistance of gadgets. We need a plane with fewer and simpler instruments and controls, making less for each member of the crew to do. We need two types of planes, and two only, embodying these characteristics—one for main-line and one for feeder service—so that engineers and crews can get used to their craft and the public will not be used as unwitting guinea pigs. Curiously, a working model of just such a plane has existed for more than a dozen years. It was designed by an engineer named Fred Weick and is called the Ercoupe. It is a two-seat private plane with ingenious simplified controls that make it as easy to handle as a car. Everyone who has ever flown it hails the Ercoupe as the plane of the future. But no one has ever tried to apply its principles to larger planes.

Gold "Hedge"—with Thorns

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

AN INCREASING proportion of the world's newly mined gold seems to be moving into private hoards. In the year 1950 output of gold in all countries, excluding Soviet Russia, amounted to 24,300,000 ounces, worth $850,500,000 at $35 an ounce—the fixed American price. Of this total, $410,000,000 was added to world monetary reserves, leaving $440,500,000 for hoarding and for use in industry and the arts. Assuming that the latter absorbed a quarter of the output—an arbitrary but generally accepted estimate—about $228,500,000 remained for the black, gray, and white markets that supply hoarders. In the first nine months of 1951 estimated output was $630,000,000, of which $175,000,000 went to swell monetary reserves. Again assigning 25 per cent to industry and the arts, we have a balance of $297,500,000, some 30 per cent greater than during the whole of 1950, available for hoarders.

The chief reason for this increase has been the sale by South Africa, which mines more than half the world's gold, excluding Russia, of 40 per cent of its output at a premium. This is contrary to the rules of the International Monetary Fund, whose policy is to channel all newly mined gold, except that genuinely employed in industry, into monetary reserves at the official American price, which sets the standard for the world.

Naturally this policy has been unpopular with gold miners, who finding themselves squeezed between rising costs and a rigid ceiling price, have long clamored for an upward revaluation of their product. Their discontent grew as they noted heavy gold sales in free markets at prices equivalent to $45 or $50 or more per ounce. At several meetings of the Fund's governors, the South African representative sought a higher value for the metal that his country produces in such abundance. But this proposal was blocked by the adamant opposition of the United States Treasury, which by virtue of its ownership of some 60 per cent of the world's gold reserves is in a position to dictate prices.

In 1950, therefore, the South African government decided to breach the ceiling unilaterally. It set aside 40 per cent of the gold delivered from the mines for sale at a premium as bars of 890 fineness, the standard used by jewelers. The purchasers melted these bars, refined them to the monetary standard, and turned them over to the brokers who cater to the hoarding trade. Although this was an obvious dodge to get around the rules of the International Fund, as was the Canadian plan of subsidizing high-cost gold mines, that body felt unable to do more than protest. Finally it seems to have concluded that since free-market sales could not be stopped, it might be advisable to reduce the premium by increasing the supply. Last fall, therefore, the Fund issued a statement in which it first reiterated its opposition in principle to premium sales and then declared that it was unable to undertake the policing of the industry. Most gold-producing countries, apart from the United States, took this pronouncement as tacit encouragement to follow South Africa's example. Consequently there is now an increasing flow of gold to the free markets, legal and illegal.

Franz Pick, in his "Black Market Yearbook for 1951," published by Pick's World Currency Report, writes:

Gold, in any form—bars, coins, sheets—remained big business in 1951. Actively traded in the financial centers of more than fifty countries, including cities behind the Iron Curtain, gold was the only insurance against mismanaged paper currency. It protected all its adepts in Argentina, Austria, Bolivia, Chile, Czechoslovakia, Iran, Israel, Uruguay, Yugoslavia, etc., where currency depreciated more than 10 per cent. And as the currencies of the world remain overshadowed by inflation, the yellow metal will continue to be in demand.

At the present time, however, that demand is not keeping up with supply. According to Mr. Pick's estimate, world trading volume of gold was 23 per cent greater in 1951 than in 1950. But as noted above, supplies increased by 30 per cent in the first nine months of 1951 alone, and undoubtedly the rate of increase was still greater in the final quarter as other gold-producing countries joined South Africa in feeding the market.

Under these circumstances it is not surprising to find the price of gold declining, even though in many countries the process of inflation has been accelerated during the past year. In Paris, which has become the world's chief gold-trading center since legal restrictions were lifted in 1948, the price fell from $44.75 per ounce in February, the high of the year, to $41.75 in December, according to the tables in Mr. Pick's "Yearbook." As I write, it has declined farther to $40.75, even though in the past few weeks fears for the franc, which has been plunging downward, have increased demand for the metal. These quotations are for gold in bars weighing a kilogram, the purchase of which is too big a transaction for the average hoarder. The more popular gold coins are more expensive, but as bar gold is being coined on a fairly large scale by both public and private mints in Europe, the premium commanded by coins is limited.

IS GOLD a good "hedge"? How far are those who hoard it protecting themselves against currency depreciation? The data furnished by Mr. Pick in his tables suggest to me that a good many people have bought this protection dearly. Suppose, for instance, that a year ago, when the inflation scare in this country was at its height, I had turned all the paper dollars I could lay hands on into gold, thereby risking severe legal penalties. I would have paid about $44 an ounce. If today, recovering from my fright, I decided to sell the gold, I would get back $40 or less. That would mean a loss of nearly 10 per cent, apart from the fact that the gold would have earned no interest and that the dollars I received from the transaction would have less purchasing power than those I started with.

Of course, a Frenchman who exchanged francs for gold a year ago would have protected himself from the subsequent depreciation of his national currency. But he could have done better by purchasing dollar bills or travelers' checks. The fact is that since the war the trend of gold prices throughout the world has been downward. In Paris the high point seems to have been January, 1946, when the bar-gold quotation was $112. Thus anyone who bought the metal that month has suffered a shrinkage in his investment of more than 60 per cent. That is perhaps an extreme case, but the range in the past five years in Bombay is from a top of $92 per ounce in December, 1948, to a low of $48 in December, 1951, and in Buenos Aires from $68.50 in December, 1948, to $42.50 in October, 1951. A roughly similar picture is shown in other leading markets.

The one great hope of the hoarders, who have found their gold "hedges" beset with thorns, is that eventually the United States will decide that the price of gold should move in conformity with other prices and will revalue the dollar. South Africans profess to believe that this step is "inevitable," and many gold brokers, I am told, expect it to be taken within the next two years. I suspect that this is a case of wishful thinking. Certainly I can see no advantage, and many disadvantages, for this country in such a move. It would, for instance, give impetus to inflation by enlarging our credit base. It would interfere with the rearmament effort by stimulating gold-mining and thus diverting man-power and materials from the production of more useful metals. The sole gainers would be the gold-mining companies and the private hoarders. Neither group, in my opinion, needs, or deserves, the unearned increment which they would automatically receive if the price of gold were raised.

Fallacy of the Folk Soul

NATIONS HAVE SOULS. By André Siegfried. Translated by Edward Fitzgerald. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.

I KNOW of few more harmonious lives than André Siegfried's. More than half a century ago he chose his career as a political geographer. He has roamed the whole earth, a keen, sympathetic, dispassionate observer. Although he writes for the press, and enjoys meeting all sorts and conditions of men, he is not a journalist: his works recall Tocqueville's and Bryce's rather than John Gunther's. A grand bourgeois, a Protestant, an impenitent liberal, he commands in this country a large and intelligent audience. It happens that I belong to Siegfried's generation and that I share, but do not cherish, most of his prejudices. This gives me the right to discuss his ideas with the fearless critical freedom that he has constantly sought to promote.

There are two books between these covers. The first chapter discusses The New Face of the World, the last The Definition and Destiny of Western Civilization. They are of capital importance. But the six intermediate chapters are essays in national psychology: Latin Realism, French Ingenuity, English Tenacity, German Discipline, Russian Mysticism, American Dynamism, and it is this aspect that the American title emphasizes. This cultural nationalism seems to me both unscientific and dangerous. Siegfried grew up at the time when Maurice Barrès was at the height of his influence: nationalism as "the willing acceptance of a determinism," the all-pervading influence of "the soil and the dead." (Hitler, Barrès's outstanding pupil, called it Blut und Boden.) The folk soul thus assumed is a romantic fallacy, wished upon the world by Herder and Fichte, among others; it inspired the great historian Michelet. To good Europeans, survivors of the Enlightenment, like Metternich and even Goethe, it was nonsense. But the wild hypotheses of one generation become the unquestioned truths and even the commonplaces of later ages; so that men as sane and as well informed as Alfred Fouillée, Salvador de Madiaga, and André Siegfried use their keen intellects not in challenging the Herderian dream but in giving it greater definiteness.

Siegfried has given up most of the nationalistic assumptions. He does not believe in races: all white "races" are represented in France. He does not fully accept the heaven-sent geographic unity of modern countries: France is Mediterranean, Continental, Atlantic; Germany never had any frontiers. (By the way, Siegfried thinks that Eastern Germany belongs with the East. Just as "Africa begins at the Pyrenees," "Siberia [as he puts it] begins at the Elbe.") But he still has faith in national psychologies. A brief review is not the place to wrestle with that popular misconception. A couple of examples will suffice to illustrate the nature of my objections. Inevitably, Siegfried insists on the English mind's distrust of logic, its deliberate cult of muzziness, its affectionate indulgence for stupidity (Sir Redvers Buller, Ernest Bevin, popular because bovine), its trust in "muddling through somehow." Whoever has conversed with such truly British thinkers as Julian Huxley, Harold Laski, Denis Brogan, knows that British dumbness has been greatly exaggerated. England has never muddled through: it has muddled into disaster, then retrieved itself—tragically late—through clear thinking, definite action, good organization. The refusal to think straight, so proudly proclaimed by the heroes of Munich, is merely the cleverest alibi when indefensible positions have to be maintained. Ponder this list—Bacon, Hobbes, Locke, Berkeley, Adam Smith, Malthus, Bentham, Darwin, Spencer; you will find that most of the ideas upon which the West has lived for the last three hundred years, obscure on the Continent, had to be formulated, clarified, systematized in England. I like to call myself a Voltairian, and I know that Voltaire is England's best gift to France.

As for French psychology, permit me to smile. Traits inherited from "our ancestors the Gauls," forsooth! We do not know how large an invading minority the Gauls were, or to what racial stock they belonged. Described by the Romans as tall and blond, they must have been Teutons. And what is it that "we" owe to them? Is it Celtic mysticism and melancholy? Is it Gallic wit? Is it the heavy plodding thrift of the Auvergnat peasant? Are all the French Cartesians? If so, were they not French before Descartes started his revolution? Did not the classics themselves proclaim that "reasoning may banish reason," and that "the heart has its reasons that reason does not know"? Did not the eighteenth century, so delightfully French, extol Bacon at the expense of Descartes?

Where, today, is the France that is supposed to have a soul? Among the Communists, the Gaullists, or that loose array of weaknesses called the Third Force? Who is "the Frenchman"? Is it Fernandel, as an amusing album would have us believe, or is it Pétain, De Gaulle, Laval, Herriot, Claudel, Gide? Is it the Protestant and Teutonic André Siegfried? Even in the same province the sharpest contrasts are seen. "Numa Roumestan" (a caricature of Gambetta), Thiers, Guizot, Charles Maurras, were all politicians from the South.

No, nations are not persons, and do not have souls. This might lead us to wonder whether the individual himself has a clear-cut, constant psychology. The sane reach a precarious balance, or impose a formal order upon a welter of impulses: but everyone harbors in his heart a whole menagerie, the tiger and the lamb, the dove and the serpent, the ant and the 'possum. We are different in different atmospheres. The Nazi engineer of mass murders may have been gemütlich at home; the captain of industry is no hypocrite when he attends a Christian service.

I enjoyed these middle chapters for their wealth of concrete information, shrewd observations, brilliant epigrams, while rejecting the romantic fallacy that they implied. The first and the last chapters seem to me profound—all the more profound because they are inconclusive: the true philosopher never answers a question except by raising a deeper one. We are entering a new age. The paleolithic and the neolithic led by imperceptible steps to the age of tools and handicrafts; but the machine revolutionized the conditions of life. It has made rugged individualism obsolete: "The new age is based on collective organization." America is fast adapting itself to the new conditions which it did not originate; probably because it was freer than the Old World from the thrall of tradition. But it insists on preaching an ideology absolutely out of keeping with its practices and with the very spring of its strength. Siegfried fully indorses Gerald Tanqueray Robinson: "America is facing the crisis with the military equipment of 1950 and the ideology of 1775. . . . Technology is the mother of the large-scale undertaking and the grandmother of state intervention; the pursuit of efficiency leads to the same collectivist nexus in Pittsburgh as in Magnitogorsk." The U. S. A. and the U. S. S. R. together are at the same time the promise and the menace of the New World.

We do not need, we cannot afford, reaction on the materialistic plane; we cannot return to the age of handicrafts, to the economy of the sturdy village blacksmith, who "owes not any man." There is no greater virtue in the oxcart than in the airplane. What we need is to save our freedom of thought by transcending practical efficiency, by denying Caesar the things that are not Caesar's; and Caesar at present is not the bureaucrat or the politician but the huckster, the advertiser, the gambler, the profiteer. "The souls of nations" are but totalitarian idols. The soul of man can be preserved alive only through eternal vigilance. ALBERT GUERARD

An Unread Classic

THE BETROTHED. By Alessandro Manzoni. A New Translation by Archibald Colquhoun. E. P. Dutton and Company. $5.

THE masterpieces of different literatures, those we consider a shared cultural heritage, have a universality that raises them above strictly national limits. Such a masterpiece, we have long been told in the comparative literature courses, is Manzoni's "The Betrothed." But in the century and a quarter since its appearance few English or American critics have undertaken to bring it to the attention of their countrymen or to justify the place it has always held in modern Italian culture as the basic design of narrative.

Instead, the book has been demoted by those who have read cut versions in translation—such as that used in the Harvard Classics—to the place of a lesser Waverley novel, and this coupling of Scott's name with Manzoni's was considered all the more apposite as Scott was among the first great men of letters to praise Manzoni abroad. So far has "The Betrothed" slipped from the common domain of noble literature that recently a captious critic, evidently unfamiliar with the work, likened it to "Gone with the Wind," an appraisal which, if it directly induces anyone to look into the novel, must cause some rude surprises. "The Betrothed" is not Scott, even at his best, nor can it be likened to an over-long historical tale with a verifiable incident on every page. It is the first completely successful blending of historical research, psychological insight, and literary talent, cast in narrative form, to come from the pen of a Continental writer. Its appearance and the enthusiasm with which it was received were milestones in the development of modern fiction. (Stendhal's best books were to appear a decade or more later; Stendhal was thoroughly familiar with Manzoni's masterpiece in the original.)

Those who cannot read Manzoni in the Italian have been discouraged until now by the available English versions, ranging from archaic and top-heavy to downright incompetent. But Mr. Colquhoun has remedied all this. An example chosen at random will illustrate what he has done. The best available translation so far goes:

The peasant who knows not how to write and finds himself reduced to the necessity of communicating his ideas to the absent, has recourse to one who understands the art, taking him, as far as he can, from among those of his own rank, for, with others, he is either shamefaced or afraid to trust them.

This becomes in Colquhoun's version:

The peasant who cannot write and needs something written has recourse to one with a knowledge of that art, choosing him, as far as he can, from his own walk in life; for he is either diffident or distrustful of others.

Obviously, the changes are not in sense but in clarity. The whole translation sings its freedom from complex verbiage, boasts its uncluttered communicative quality, and with its publication the excuse that Manzoni is unreadable in English has vanished.

The interesting thing is why it has taken so long to get the job done. We have continued to praise the book and not read it, unlike the fate meted out to

The Geography of Hunger

By JOSUÉ DE CASTRO

OF URGENT significance, this book by the Chairman of the Executive Council, United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization, considers mankind's most crucial problem: "the terrible erosion that hunger is causing the human race and its civilization, an erosion that threatens to blot from the earth all the gigantic works of man."

In a brilliant analysis of the political and social factors of hunger, Dr. de Castro takes issue with the "Malthusian scarecrow" that places overpopulation at the root of mass hunger and eventual catastrophe. He demonstrates that we hold in our own hands the means to combat the most basic of all destructive forces. "An outstanding contribution to the fight against hunger and the social problems which have their root in it," says The Nation.

Cervantes, whose great work was read in a variety of translations, some poor, some merely dated, until it too was treated to a first-rate contemporary translation by the late Sam Putnam—but it was always read. Not so with Manzoni.

After the publication of the Colquhoun translation, Umberto Calosso, Italian writer and critic with a special affinity for Anglo-Saxon culture, lectured in Rome on the previous lack of interest in the book in England. He came up with the hypothesis that the English reader seeks in a foreign classic something alien to himself, something exotic. Manzoni's novel, according to this critic, is too English for the English reader's taste. This amusing explanation has an element of truth even here—but how explain the popularity and permanence of certain themes, notably the tale of the rogue-hero, which seem indigenous to every nation and hence exotic to none? Perhaps Manzoni's work lacks the tight construction associated with successful fiction. Instead "The Betrothed" offers relevant detail and a breadth of design which, when one has a chance to savor the book without the handicap of a faulty presentation, may at last insure it a place in our gallery of giants.

Housing, Public and Private

TWO-THIRDS OF A NATION. A HOUSING PROGRAM. By Nathan Straus. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

PROGRESS is always spurred by people of singleness of purpose and devotion to a cause. For many years Nathan Straus has maintained singleness of purpose and devotion to the cause of better housing for families of low income. He continues to maintain it in "Two-Thirds of a Nation." He writes as a lover, with praise and devotion for his beloved, Public Housing—and with vilification for her rival, Private Housing. In the process he bares some important housing facts which are too often covered up by fiction; but he also, in this writer's opinion, does less than justice to his lady's rival.

He has not presented a startling new program for housing or urban redevelopment. He has reviewed and criticized present procedures, detailed the workings of pressure groups which oppose public assistance, and urged good planning and the extension of government aid to provide housing for middle-income families.

Mr. Straus has assembled an excellent dossier to show that the true costs of home ownership are frequently obscured by over-zealous private-housing promoters. Families of meager income are induced to buy homes that they cannot afford to maintain by advertisements which specify that a home will cost x dollars per month to "pay all"—just like rent. The ads list the "all" as interest and amortization of mortgage, insurance, and taxes; but they fail to mention the cost of heat, maintenance, and repair. Flagrant examples are presented of improper advertising and of the actual costs of a home in a project so advertised. Instead of "$83 monthly charges supposed to 'cover everything'"—in one example—"the true monthly cost is about $120—or about 50 per cent more than the advertised figure." This grossly misleading advertising practice is contrasted with the brochure of a non-profit cooperative housing project in New York City, Queensview, which reads: "Monthly carrying charges (in place of rent) will cover gas and electricity, heat and hot water, all repairs, reserves, insurance, interest and amortization of the mortgage, real-estate taxes, and an adequate contingency fund. Redecoration and replacement of ranges and refrigerators are not contemplated unless revenues permit."

Mr. Straus places the chief blame for misleading advertising and shoddy construction on the Federal Housing Administration. I believe that he is sound in so doing. The FHA should not permit the advertising of half-truths about homes on which it places insurance; nor should it encourage undersized houses that must become future slums of American-sized families, which will surely overcrowd them. Instead of supplying mechanical gadgets as advertising "come-ons," builders should be prodded by the FHA to supply adequate living space. Frills and extra mechanical comforts may be added as the individual pocket-book allows.

But Mr. Straus's zeal for public housing runs away with him when he states that "... any evaluation of FHA must consider the fact that the agency has not fulfilled its assigned task of enabling private builders to provide homes within the means of middle-income families." He qualifies this sentence in his next one by saying, "The single-family homes ... have been far too expensive for this income group." But the impression he leaves is still incorrect. Many FHA-insured rental units throughout the country do house families of moderate income. There are quantities of good single-family housing developments for families of moderate income. The term "middle income" needs exact definition. Mr. Straus speaks of families in the lower brackets of middle income who border but are slightly above those with incomes eligible for public housing.

And his zeal runs away with him again when he rebukes a deputy administrator of the FHA for telling a group of real-estate men that "the National Housing Act is a profit-producing sales tool for realtors." It was meant to be just that. It was meant to aid our economy by restoring activity in the building trades and at the same time to supply homes to families of moderate income. The FHA does perform a disservice when it becomes such an eager beaver that it knowingly countenances hidden profits that reach bonanza proportions—as frequently has happened in post-war programs. And Mr. Straus paints "these extras" with a broad but informed brush.

It is when Mr. Straus starts gazing lovingly overseas at housing sites and neighborhood developments that the writer parts company with him. The British have conceived very fine plans, but it is Americans who have actually built the very well-planned housing developments. True, not all of ours have been well planned; but hundreds of projects throughout the country—perhaps thousands—have been laid out with safety, charm, utility, and some attention to recreation needs. I would like to quote the report of the National Committee on Housing, which sent a mission to Great Britain at the invitation of the British Ministry of Health in the summer of 1945. The mission, of which I was a member, was struck by the absence of well-planned sites and neighborhoods wherever we went, and reported in "Britain Faces Its Housing Emergency":

Site-planning progress which had been expected to make tremendous strides as the result of the pioneering work done in Britain before 1914 was not evident in the public or private projects visited by the mission. There has been little provision of play space for small children in close proximity to the houses, and only occasionally play facilities for older children and adults. . . .

Neighborhood planning also had its origin in Britain but like forward-looking site planning was conspicuous by its absence in most of the cities visited. New neighborhood planning occupies a prominent place in all of the post-war programs. It is referred to as "American" because so much more had been done in this field here before the war than in the country where the concept originated.

I may say that the British authorities were pleased that we said this, for they recognized its truth and lamented it. We were there during the change from the Churchill to the Attlee government and were escorted about by members of both parties and by private builders, and they were in agreement on this.

British post-war plans were glorious. Unfortunately most of them are still on paper; some that have been executed do not follow the script. And this holds a lesson that must be taken to heart: to realize good housing and urban redevelopment we do have to make ambitious plans but we must not overstep the possibilities. Sir Raymond Unwin's objective of twelve families to the acre is not a practical one for urban America. I think that to aim for that objective now is unrealistic and defers consideration of objectives which are achievable as well as desirable. But, as I have said, progress in housing, as in everything else, is spurred by those of singleness of purpose and devotion to a cause. Mr. Straus has both—and shows it; his idealistic and extreme planning standards have therefore great value as a prod toward future improvement.

Understanding Blake

A PRIMER OF BLAKE. By Hal Saunders White. Iowa: Littlefield, Adams, Ames. $1.25.

IN THE welter of books on William Blake, often muddling and often pretentious, it is a pleasure to come across this unassuming and clear little book. Mr. White, who has taught Blake to college students for more than fifteen years, has here embodied the results of his experience. His comments are always astute and will help the reader to a sharper understanding of Blake's meaning.

Take for example, his comment on The Lamb: "It is obvious that Blake in this poem is not concerned with a naturalistic animal. His content or subject matter is the abstract, universal quality of tenderness, meekness, mildness, which exists now and did exist before lambs were created. The lamb—Christ—the child—Blake himself in this mood of innocence—equally reflect the essential quality of infinite tenderness. The lamb, Blake, the child, Christ are but images held to the light to catch the rays of this universal quality."

This is admirably concise and serves, for the student, to connect the poem with the man who was also a painter and who wrote:

I assert for My Self that I do not behold the outward Creation & that to me it is hindrance & not action; it is as the dirt upon my feet, No part of Me. "What," it will be Question'd, "When the Sun rises, do you not see a round disk of fire somewhat like a Guinea?" O no, no, I see an Innumerable company of the Heavenly host crying, "Holy, Holy, Holy, is the Lord God Almighty." I question not my Corporeal or Vegetative Eye any more than I would Question a Window concerning a Sight. I look thro' it & not with it.

While Mr. White does not venture farther into the Everglades of the Prophetic Books than The Marriage of Heaven and Hell, The Book of Thel, and Visions of the Daughters of Albion, or offer to act as guide in the regions where so many people, including W. B. Yeats, have been lost, his comments on the simpler and more direct works cannot but make the student appreciate Blake as a whole man, seen in the round, and consequently not only lead to keener appreciation of one of the greatest of Englishmen but also encourage a sortie into the vast, and not completely mapped, territories. It is to be hoped that "A Primer of Blake" receives a wider distribution than its modest appearance would seem to claim.

Prisoner of War

ONE GREAT PRISON. THE STORY BEHIND RUSSIA'S UNRELEASED POW'S. By Helmut M. Fehling. Forewords by Konrad Adenauer and Joseph Cardinal Frings. Translated by Charles R. Joy. The Beacon Press. $2.75.

THE fact that this book is on the side of justice, humanitarianism, and decency does not alter another fact—namely, that it is a highly skilled job of special pleading. The first part of the book is a brief, grim account of Herr Fehling's experiences as a prisoner of war in the U. S. S. R. The second part is Mr. Joy's compilation of documents and news items relating to the German and Japanese P. O. W.'s held by the Soviets. The two parts together make an effective addition to the steadily increasing body of evidence about Soviet ways and means.

It is to the credit of all concerned in the writing and publishing of this book that it is nowhere claimed to be anything but what it is—the presentation of a case. Mr. Joy says that the book's purpose is "to call attention once more to the tragedy of the war prisoners." Herr Fehling and Cardinal Frings are more specific.

Now we are forced to speak, in order to arouse every last living soul, to make the whole world cry out in indignation and nameless horror. [Fehling]

In the name of justice, of humanity, of love, we plead with the leading nations of the world to do everything possible to throw light into the darkness and to secure the release of those who are so unjustly detained. [Frings]

Certainly no reader can complain of lack of frankness, nor is anyone likely to challenge the need for this presentation of facts. "One Great Prison" sets forth with brutal directness one side of a story which is altogether horrendous. The weight of Fehling's indictment is not lessened by the fact that only a part of the story is told. Yet it ought to be remembered that there was another and equally brutal part. An official German report of February, 1942, recorded the death of all except "several hundred thousand" of the 3,600,000 Soviet citizens who had been taken prisoner by the Germans. The one wrong does not excuse the other, but it may help to explain the Soviet attitude. At any rate, the glare of publicity should be thrown on both evils, and this book does one part of that job very effectively.

Incidentally, historians may sometime be more interested in "One Great Prison" because of what it tells about the National Committee for a Free Germany than because of its account of horrors.

WARREN B. WALSH

Books in Brief

THE BEST OF THE BEST SHORT STORIES, 1915-1950. Edited by Martha Foley. Houghton Mifflin. $3.75. This anthology of anthologized stories is heavily weighted in favor of the thirties and the forties: only four of the twenty-five stories included are drawn from the earlier volumes of the Best Short Story annuals. Logically enough, three of these four are Anderson's I'm a Fool, Lardner's Haircut, and Hemingway's My Old Man. The rest of the collection is a handy compendium of familiar stories of recent years—some of them too familiar—with a nod to almost every taste. There are inferior examples of Kay Boyle and William Faulkner, but there are also Jean Stafford's agonizing ode to pain, The Interior Castle, and Walter Van Tilburg Clark's superb The Wind and the Snow of Winter.

THE FORESTS OF THE NIGHT. By Jean-Louis Curtis. Translated by Nora Wydenbruck. Putnam. $3.50. A Goncourt Prize novel of small-town life in France during the Nazi occupation, with some of the sardonic quality that has won Marcel Aymé international audiences. Curtis views Resistance workers, Vichyites, and neutralists with a gently mocking eye that is peculiarly French and admirably suited to his subject. Although his fangs are not as sharp as Aymé's, and his story deteriorates suddenly into melodrama, he is adept at both caricature and more profound revelations of character; and he is much more fun to read than those French novelists of his generation who seem to be translated because they take American mystery writers as models.

Art

THE illusion of tragedy in Frederick Franck's works (Lilienfeld Galleries) convinced French critics that these were great examples of obsessed art. The tragedy, however, seems to me to be only skin deep. His scenes take place in the hours of the elves and deal with human suffering as it turns up in the form of all sorts of subjects from goats to clocks, from fairly settled landscapes to hallucinatory shots of half-nude abstract men running around madly with butcher knives and bouquets of candles. His dreamy imagery evolves decisively and suddenly out of a black background that suggests but does not show searching and struggling in an abyss. Along with the yellowish white patches in darkness which have become a trademark of the Ryder school, Franck uses enough other gimmicks to date him almost as a "modern" painter (Braque's cubistic apple with a small color fog around the edges, Ben Shawn's strung-up figure leaning to portside, Beckmann's slashes, and Picasso's split image). But despite the mannerisms, he paints pictures that have a touch of Houdini about them. There is a good deal of éclat and mystery in the surfaces, which have the effervescent waxiness of an old master plus the spotless neatness of a Dutch kitchen—but it is not clear how he arrived at so many contrasts. He places his subject—vertical and stark—in a rather corny lump somewhere in the center of the picture, so that your eyes can move around the sides of the lump without hitting anything that looks interesting. And yet the spaces at the sides divide and vary endlessly as few current New York paintings do. Franck seems to coast through every stage of a painting up to the last post, but then he closes with a dramatic kick. His skyscrapers are flimsy notations, but the last things he puts on them—windows, an overhead tunnel between buildings—are solid and flashy. If Franck dropped the mannerisms and discarded "suggestions" of depth, he would be free of mediocre notes in his work.

Why James N. Rosenberg spent a year in the Holy Land sketching and making mental notes for the eighteen studio-made landscapes at the Central Synagogue escapes me. An ardent Zionist, lawyer, and postcard realist make a combination that is bound to build a sincere and sentimental case for Israel even in his own backyard. He reveals the Holy Land as a mixture of the Imperial Valley and the Adirondacks, replete with the greenest M-G-M grass, olive trees that writhe and shake with life, and, overhead, hope in the form of sunlight bursting through a dark mass of clouds. He paints with a frozen brush stroke that makes the surfaces of his groves, forests, pipe lines, and hovels appear to be crawling with angle worms, all going in the same direction toward the upper-right corner of the picture. There are fortunately some homely, lively elements in his work that hark back to, of all people, C. S. Price and a few other sage-brush poets of canvas.

The American Abstract Artists—from Albers to Von Wicht—have put fifty paintings into a stodgy show at the New Gallery, dedicated to noiselessness, super-human control, and the beauty of the square. The point of these pictures seems to be the glorification of anonymity, all but four or five of the artists succeeding only too well. The best pictures: McNeil's black anchor held captive in a lurid blue surface (the only loud painting in the show);

Von Wiegand's sparkling checkerboard with clusters of tiny checkerboards that suggest a meld of midget Mondrians; Bultman's frosting of white and black triangles that have all the constrained shock of Kootz Gallery painting; Blaine's busy welter of postcard images and color which looks like several dozen dirty saucers of milk slopping over.

Drama

NEARLY everyone who saw—or better yet read—the first plays of Christopher Fry had the same reaction. There was an astonished delight with his really dazzling gift for words, and there was the hope that he would be able before long to find for that gift some more substantial use.

The gift has not been withdrawn. Fry continues to demonstrate that he can exploit better than any other modern what may be called the more purely entertaining possibilities of the neo-metaphysical style. Part of the charm is a youthful exuberance and his own frank astonishment at his copiousness and fluency. Another and related part is a certain self-mockery which leads one character to end a long harangue with an apology for his own inarticulateness and permits another, one of Fry's few common-sense personages, to interrupt a metaphysical discourse with the remark that we don't really need to go into all that just now. When still another observes that the Great Bear looks so geometrical that it ought to prove something, or that, since everybody is lost, the best we can do is to make whatever we are lost in seem as homelike as possible, then the amusement we experience must be remotely like that of an Elizabethan who met for the first time John Lyly and his "Euphues." But though Fry has kept this gift he seems to have made no progress whatsoever in discovering any way to use it for any larger purpose. His ostensibly dramatic speeches remain almost purely decorative. They do not exist in order to tell a story. On the contrary, the story exists only as an excuse for the speeches.

One after another his plays have become more ambitious, more pretentious. But the unfortunate fact is that the result is only to demonstrate more clearly how little, as plays, they count for. "A Phoenix Too Frequent," being no more than the retelling of a familiar anecdote, was for that very reason sufficient apology for its own insubstantiality. "The Lady's Not for Burning," inventing its own fable, promised more and succeeded tolerably in fulfilling its promise, partly because it was simple, fanciful, and sufficiently fantastic in its premises not to insist upon being taken any more seriously than one felt inclined to take it. But "Venus Observed" (Century Theater) attempts something which the author, so far at least, is simply not capable of accomplishing because it demands of the spectator a kind of credence which he cannot possibly give it. The scene is contemporary; the motives of the characters, instead of being purely fantastic, are uncomfortably close to something which one must take literally or not at all; and the characters themselves are too much like real people to express themselves suitably in Mr. Fry's artificial idiom.

The Theater Guild was evidently determined to give the play every chance. It provided two elaborate sets and engaged two popular performers, Rex

Harrison and Lilli Palmer, to interpret the leading roles. One result is that in the beginning a certain confidence is inspired. But one's interest oozes slowly away as one begins to realize that, aside from amusing turns of speech, one is being given nothing but a commonplace story told less effectively than it could be told by the simple melodramatic methods which have been used to tell it on the stage again and again. No rococo decoration supplied by the language or the other incidental, often rather pretentious, elaborations can conceal the fact that this story is nothing except that old standby of sensational sentimental fiction which involves a beautiful young girl in love with a young man but feeling compelled to accept the attentions of an old one because he has what used to be called "a hold over her"—in this case, as so many times before, inhering in the fact that our heroine's father has been guilty of certain speculations which the unwelcome suitor can expose.

Mr. Fry employs a variety of devices in his attempt to make all this seem more meaningful and less banal than it is. The old suitor is a noble Don Juan about to retire from his amorous hobbies and to take up astronomy. The young lover is his own son, and the erring father of the heroine is a comic secretary to the Don Juan whose timid embezzlements the victim would never dream of using for the purposes which the distressed heroine believes herself about to become the victim of. The real substance of the play is, I imagine, supposed to be the elaborately developed and constantly changing sentimental perplexities of the heroine, treated in a manner which suggests that Mr. Fry has been reading too attentively recent French plays like "Legend for Lovers." But the more elaborate these sentimental perplexities become, the less real and the less interesting they are, until long before the last curtain descends, the spectator has come to the point where he is more eager to reach some conclusion than concerned over what the conclusion will be. Up to the very end the author continues to send up occasional skyrockets of words, but one has completely lost hope that even they will illuminate anything.

One deduction seems inevitable. Whatever the solution of Mr. Fry's problem may be, it is not to be found in the conventionally realistic play. For all its fantastic elements, "Venus Observed" has already gone too far in that direction.

Ballet

B. H.
HAGGIN

ONE had thought that in "The Four Temperaments" Balanchine's elaboration of the classical ballet idiom had gone as far as it could go; but it is carried even further in his new piece, "Caracole" (previously entitled "Divertissement Classique"), to Mozart's Divertimento K.287—and specifically in the second movement, where Mozart's own elaboration of his musical theme in the series of variations invites the succession of astoundingly complex, brilliant, and beautiful solos which exploit the individual capacities and styles of Wilde, Hayden, Adams, LeClercq, Eglevsky, and Tallchief, and which they execute in breathtaking fashion. There is superb invention also for the great Adagio movement of the Divertimento—invention which is exciting to look at, but which, for the first time in my experience, doesn't seem to me to go with, or work with, the music in the way the dance movement does with the music of the Andante of "Concerto Barocco" or "Sinfonie Concertante"—the way of an added counterpoint, with music and dance movement enlarging each other's effect and meaning. The Adagio of the Divertimento is a long solo aria with a continuous flow which, for me, is disturbed by the shift from one supported dancer to another for each new musical phrase; also, some of the activity seems to me excessive for the sustained melodic style of the music. But the opening Allegro for the soloists (who include Magallanes and Robbins in addition to those I have mentioned) and corps is charming, the Minuet for corps alone delightful, the finale a crescendo of spectacular and joyous brilliance, the piece as a whole one of the major Balanchine products. It uses the costumes, without the decor, of "Mozartiana," which I would like to see in that "sunny masterpiece" once more.

Balanchine is charmingly inventive again in the different style and smaller scale of "Bayou," which reflect the style and scale of the engaging "Acadian Songs and Dances" from Virgil Thomson's music for "Louisiana Story." And as always the piece is well contrived for the dancers involved—Moncion, Breckinridge, Hayden, Laing, Adams, and Bliss. For this one there are excellent scenery and costumes by Dorothea Tanning.

Robbins provides no explicit program for his new "Ballade" to music of Debussy; but as in his other ballets there are the moment at the beginning when the people on the stage turn and look meaningfully at someone who looks back at them and then leaves the stage, and the similar moment at the end; and these confirm one's impression from other details that in this piece again Robbins is saying something about human life as he has been thinking about it. The important thing again, however, is not what he says on this subject, but the dance terms in which he says it; and these I found unimpressive, except for a superbly contrived and superbly executed dance for Reed and Tobias.

The New Music Quartet's performance of Beethoven's Opus 131 at the Y. M. H. A. was highly agreeable to the ear and satisfying to the mind, and also free of the high-tension quality that had disturbed me in the recorded performance of Opus 59 No. 3. But having thought the question of the acoustic quality of the Y auditorium had been settled by the dry sound there of the violins of the Quartetto Italiano, I found it unsettled again by the clear radiance of the violins of the New Music Quartet. The only explanation that has occurred to me is that the hall was only half-filled this time.

As for recordings of chamber music, all six of the Mozart quartets dedicated to Haydn are played by the Roth Quartet on three Mercury LP's; and having hoped for performances as fine, in the literal sense of the word, as the one of K.464 which the Roth Quartet recorded for Columbia seventeen years ago, I was disappointed and shocked by the fussy inflection, the constant swelling and contracting of sonority, the crude accentuation that I heard most of the time. In addition the recorded sound is edged and otherwise not agreeable; and there is a little distortion in the finales of K.464 and 465.

The performance of Schubert's "Death and the Maiden" Quartet by the Koeckert Quartet on a Decca record is effective for the most part—my major reservation being about the very slow statement of the "Death and the Maiden" theme and the changes of tempo in the subsequent variations (the Andante con moto and alla breve directions indicate a faster initial tempo which could be maintained throughout the movement). The recorded sound, when it is bright enough, is unpleasantly coarse; and at times—the latter half of the first movement, the scherzo movement—it isn't bright enough.

Verdi's Quartet, in which he amused himself and charms us with an exercise of the mastery in instrumental writing and the subtle harmonic sense that we hear in the later operas, is the more engaging for the playing of the Quartetto Italiano on the London record—its lightness and grace, its delicacy and sensitiveness employing its fine gradations of extraordinarily blended tone. Schumann's Opus 41 No. 2 is on the reverse side. The playing is superbly reproduced except for a dryness which seems to be characteristic of London recording of strings—as the warmth and luster of the sound of the recent Paganini Quartet performance of Beethoven's Opus 132 are characteristic of RCA Victor.

CORRECTION: My opening sentence about Vivaldi's concertos last week included the statement: "a fourth, the Concerto in G major for strings and cembalo, I find interesting." This should have read: "I find less interesting."

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

An Unholy Alliance

Dear Sirs: Mr. Kim in The Nation of February 9 has advocated some concrete and helpful suggestions for a Korean settlement. However, both he and Mr. Lattimore have overlooked the principal obstacle to Korean unification. The way will not be clear for a peaceful settlement until the unholy alliance between Rhee and Washington is broken. In fact, any over-all settlement in Asia will be impossible as long as the United States persists in supporting the most reactionary and unpopular elements in the East.

Good Intentions Not Enough

Dear Sirs: In my article in the February 9 issue of The Nation I stated that "more energetic action might have been looked for from the liberal Governor Adlai Stevenson." Despite the letter in your March 1 issue from some distinguished citizens of Illinois, this statement still appears to me to be true.

1. As admitted in the letter "the tragic fact is that the Cairo school board has been breaking the state law for years in maintaining segregated public schools." Despite the fact that this has occurred for four years of Governor Stevenson's administration, the Cairo schools have continued to receive over $200,000 annually from state funds in violation of the Jenkins amendment, which provides that no common-school funds will be granted to any school district that fails to comply with the requirement that "no pupil shall be excluded from or segregated in any school on account of his color, race, or nationality." The State Superintendent of Public Instruction has the statutory responsibility for the enforcement of this law. Although he is an elective officer, he must report to the Governor, and the Governor has the responsibility to see that the law is enforced.

2. As admitted in the letter "there was violence and there still is high tension in the community. For this many are to blame and probably no governor and no official commission can do enough." To admit that not enough has been done would seem to agree with my assertion that "more energetic action might have been looked for." Certainly the Cicero riots have given the state warning that racial violence could erupt at a moment's notice unless forthright steps to deal with the whole problem were taken swiftly. The Governor, as chief law-enforcement agent of the state, has this responsibility.

3. On February 7 eight persons spearheading a movement to break down segregation in Cairo were arrested and charged with conspiracy to "endanger the life and health of certain children." These persons included the president of the Cairo branch of the N. A. A. C. P., two N. A. A. C. P. field secretaries, a doctor whose home was blasted, a white attorney who had been handling legal aspects of the case, and Negro community leaders. It is of course true that the Governor can neither indict nor quash indictments. But the writers of the letter upholding Governor Stevenson give the Governor and his commission credit for the arrest of four white persons in the community. If they could influence issuance of indictments against these persons, it would seem to follow that they should have been able to prevent the travesty of justice involving the N. A. A. C. P. officials.

4. On February 14 N. A. A. C. P. leaders met with an Illinois legislative committee which included a representative of the Governor and the general counsel for the Superintendent of Public Instruction. Our report of those proceedings indicates that Mr. Hudson, the general counsel, claimed that he had no power to do anything in the matter. As George Leighton, Chicago attorney, who spoke as representative of the national office of N. A. A. C. P., said, "We consider it an insult to attend a meeting dealing with a matter so important only to be confronted by evasive attempts on the part of the responsible official stating that in substance he can do nothing about a case that has attracted nation-wide attention." Once again it would appear that "more energetic action" might have been taken by Governor Stevenson.

5. The statement attributed to Russell Babcock, Director of the Illinois Commission on Human Relations was one that appeared in reports received from people on the scene.

6. No effort was made in my article to suggest that Governor Stevenson and the Illinois Commission were bigoted or personally sympathetic with racial violence in Cairo. I personally believe them to be well intentioned, but the facts would seem to demonstrate conclusively that although no sins of commission were committed, responsibilities for omissions must rest upon the Governor and his agencies. They might have secured the enforcement of the Jenkins amendment long before any violence took place. They might have had adequate state police on hand to prevent terror and intimidation. The Illinois Commission on Human Relations might have helped prepare the community for the transfers and held meetings and consulted with public officials at the time of the violence. Certainly they did not display the kind of eternal vigilance that is the price of freedom. LEONARD SCHROETER

Prisoners of Fear

Dear Sirs: Hannah Bloom's The Law of Diminishing Returns in The Nation of December 29 and Burnham P. Beckwith's letter which appeared in your letters column of January 19 are characteristic of what Justice Douglas describes as "the black silence of fear." They reflect his apprehension over our "drifting in the direction of repression" and succumbing to fear. Justice Douglas sees our minds put under a sort of undeclared martial law which sets off a chain reaction of fears. America seems to be gripped in an ever-tightening vise of fear bordering on the pathological. Unreasoning fear dominates our thinking and our opinions, giving rise to doubt and suspicion.

Psychologically, a mass or hysterical fear of a threat is as dangerous as the threat itself. In mass hysteria the rational sense for collective security is paralyzed and overpowered by the irrational impulse for self-protection, which leads to confusion and disunity.

The crucial test in a challenge to a free society is its ability to maintain the proper relationship between its free institutions and the threat it faces. Any emotional imbalance capable of shifting responsibility or exaggerating the danger at the expense of those institutions is bound to weaken their power and make the danger greater than it actually is.

Paradoxically, we seem to be lapsing into a vicious circle of trying to allay fear by restricting freedom, which in turn generates more fear, resulting in a kind of weakening self-flagellation—transforming symptoms into a disease. Instead of meeting the critical situation with positive, constructive remedies we use a negative approach to a solution by questioning the loyalty of our citizens and muzzling all unorthodox opinions. It has become increasingly clear that once we embark on a program of screening and licensing thoughts, the state of mind which leads to these conditions breeds the private Gestapo, the informer, and star-chamber procedure.

The prospect of economic or social ostracism as the wages of iconoclasm drives many into the comfortable shelter of protective orthodoxy, leaving them confined within the narrow cell of stereotyped attitudes, oblivious of the fact that heresies have contributed greatly to the growth of civilization.

Metamorphosis of a Newspaper

Denver, Colorado

WHEN Palmer Hoyt took over as editor and publisher of the Denver Post early in 1946, liberals in the Rocky Mountain region offered a fervent prayer that a deliverer had come. For years the lurid, blatant journalistic fare dished up by the famous Bonfils and Tammen regime had made the Post synonymous with yellow journalism at its worst. At first their prayers seemed to be answered. Hoyt soon transformed the Post into one of the most forward-looking dailies in the West. The new editorial page was a model of journalistic integrity. Contributed editorials and full-length columns by local citizens who had something to say were invited—in addition to the customary letters to the editor. The unpopularity or radicalism of the views expressed did not bar their publication.

The Post's own editorials were predominantly progressive. Most significant, perhaps, was the new editor's enlightened internationalism, in striking contrast to the old Post's chauvinistic isolationism. But Hoyt also championed such causes as public power development, civil rights, rent control, public housing, and adequate anti-trust regulation. Though the Post backed Dewey in 1948, it endorsed the liberal John A. Carroll (Democrat) against the conservative Eugene Millikin (Republican) in the 1950 Senate contest in Colorado and has supported other liberal candidates.

Despite this record, the Post today, six years after Hoyt's arrival, is rapidly losing friends in liberal circles. Thousands of loyal readers are in a quandary, torn between their former genuine admiration for most of the paper's policies and their mounting alarm at some of the causes it has recently supported. The most disconcerting of the Post's recent aberrations was its clamor for dropping the atomic bomb in Korea—it even boasted that it was the only major daily to urge this. Though the Post upheld President Truman's right to fire General MacArthur, it has seen eye to eye with the General on most of his ideas for winning the Korean war.

For some time, too, the Post has indulged in smear-by-association tactics, not in editorials but in news stories. Items like this are not uncommon: "Denver Communists and a handful of sympathizers picketed the F. W. Woolworth store . . . in what picketers charged was discrimination by the company against Negroes. . . . Although the picketers said they were members of the East Denver Young Progressives Club . . . several known Communists were observed in the group." The reporter went on to say that he had spotted several other individuals "near by" who were identified—in his mind at least—with left-wing causes, including "the Wallace party."

Perhaps the most shocking of recent Post smear jobs was an editorial attacking the Anti-Defamation League and "organized Jewry" for their "threats of boycott and discrimination against the radio commentator Upton Close." Such action, the editorial said, proves that "organized Jewry is a pressure group" and confirms Close's charge of persecution. After protests, a second editorial partially retracted the charge but still insisted that Jews were ill-advised in taking action against Close, that they should only "declare themselves opposed" to him. This, as the Anti-Defamation League pointed out, was all they were actually doing.

Still another Post editorial attacked certain "non-Communist left-wing" publications for not being able to agree on every issue and even getting into spats with one another. The Nation was characterized as a "cynically above-it-all magazine, with definite Zionist overtones."

Then there was the case of David Hawkins, a professor of philosophy at the University of Colorado, who admitted former membership in the Communist Party but insisted that his sympathies were no longer with the Communists and that his former affiliation in no way affected his teaching ability. The Post decided that Hawkins should be crucified—if not in editorials, in so-called "news" stories—but despite its agitation the Board of Regents voted four to one to retain Hawkins on the faculty. Only then did the paper bring up its editorial guns. The verdict, it protested, was not "proper," since Hawkins had declined to put the finger on "persons he knew to be Communists in his local organization"; in failing to discharge him on this ground, the regents had "served badly the cause of continued freedom."

The Post's labor policy is another illustration of its present ambiguous position. While Hoyt travels about the country singing the praises of the labor movement—all fully reported in Post news stories—he attacks unions in his own bailiwick. For several years he has carried on a ruthless campaign to smash the Post's Newspaper Guild unit. On at least four occasions the Guild has been forced to file charges of unfair labor practices to obtain redress.

What has happened to blur the fine promise of Hoyt's direction of the Post? It is said that his drop-the-bomb obsession may be the result of top-level briefing in Washington. Hoyt has important connections in the capital and is an influential member of the President's Air Policy Commission, which in January, 1948, issued a highly significant report on plans for American aviation in war and peace. Partly because of his work on this commission, he has even been suggested for high government office.

An explanation for the Post's views on domestic issues is to be discovered. One theoreticalism was never for basic undemocratism seems unlikely forthright suggestion offered Hoyt intimately is sharply divided and humane social liberalism. At insatiable thirst himself a man convinced that often believe same mission. In a recent debate, for example, Hoyt said that we must drop the A-bomb now to "fulfill our national destiny, to be true to history." With such a philosophy, Hoyt may well conceive of himself as one of history's errand boys.

THE NEW RIGHTIST PREMIER ANTOINE PINAY, has, surely unwillingly, rendered a double service to the progressive cause in France by splitting the Gaullists and by throwing the Socialists into the opposition. Even if General De Gaulle succeeds in reestablishing formal discipline when the new Cabinet goes to the National Assembly on Tuesday, the break in the Gaullist movement is an important and also an amusing event. From the position above the conflicts of daily politics on which De Gaulle has ensconced himself, he often expressed utter contempt for the divisions within the other parties. Now at the decisive hour, when his fortunes were mounting, his disciplined Rally of the French People has proved no more solid than any of the old party groups. The Socialists will benefit from being put in a situation that allows no further doubt in regard to their attitude. The Socialist Party was suffering from sharp internal dissensions because of its lack of a clear political line; in the opposition it can, under bolder leadership, recover lost prestige and authority among the workers. This is especially true since the government is more reactionary in every respect than any France has had since the Liberation. Not only will it show greater dependence on Washington, in terms of both finance and policy; it is also pledged to a domestic program sure to antagonize and thus consolidate the left. More ominous perhaps even than Pinay's threat to freeze wages was his reference to legislation regulating strikes. Pinay is the first man to crystallize the reactionary clerical majority in the 1951 Assembly which was potentially there all the time.

FOR SOME 42,000,000 OF US THE IDES OF March mean the drudgery of filling out income-tax returns and the pain of handing over to Uncle Sam what he claims as his due. This year the pain is sharper than ever, for we shall be feeling the delayed-action bite of the 1950 tax law as well as the 11 per cent average increase provided by last year's revenue measure. In 1952 a married person with two dependents and an income of $5,000 before deductions will pay $146, or 33.7 per cent more than he did in 1949. In addition, of course, he is having to pay considerably more in indirect taxes. The total tax bill of the country, however, cannot be reduced without risking taxation by inflation. Even the most vigorous advocates of government economy do not propose reductions in expenditure large enough to permit lower taxes. For instance, Senator Byrd's "alternative budget" details cuts, including some that would cripple vital social programs, totaling over $8,000,000,000 but still leaves a deficit of some $6,000,000,000—far too large a sum to warrant any decrease in the Treasury's "take." Such a decrease, in fact, is not in the cards unless the government revises its rearmament program. Thus the taxpayer who supports present methods of fighting the cold war cannot logically complain that the total tax burden is too high. On the other hand, he may reasonably ask whether that burden is being fairly distributed. ★

A PAMPHLET ENTITLED "TAX LOOPHOLES," written by Senator Hubert Humphrey of Minnesota and published by the Public Affairs Institute, answers this question with a resounding "No!" In providing revenue for the present emergency, it contends, Congress has not only refused to close large loopholes in our existing tax laws but has opened others. For example, last year's revenue act left untouched the "percentage-depletion" allowance, which permits owners of oil wells and some mining properties to charge off a large fraction of their earnings, and extended the same privilege to producers of many other minerals. Thanks to this allowance, oil companies in 1947, according to Treasury figures, were able to deduct 13 times more from gross profits than if they had been required to use ordinary depreciation methods. This is discrimination in favor of industries with a particularly powerful political pull. The five other loopholes cited by Senator Humphrey discriminate in favor of individuals in the higher income brackets, with the possible exception of the lack of a dividend-withholding system, which facilitates tax evasion by both large and small stockholders. Provisions for income and estate splitting by married persons, enacted in 1948, yield nothing to those with incomes of under $5,000 or fortunes of less than $60,000, but for those with more the benefits increase proportionately to the size of the income or estate. The same thing is true of the capital-gains tax, the ceiling on which was raised by 1 per cent only in the 1951 revenue act, and of the new "family-partnership" provision which permits a rich father to save many thousands a year by giving his children an interest in his business. These are some

COMMENTING ON THE PRESIDENT'S SPEECH urging $7,900,000,000 in foreign-aid, Republican columnist David Lawrence admits he does not know whether the amount asked is too much or too little, but he is sure "the American people are bewildered by the Administration's foreign policy." He goes on: "They are being told that billions are needed for defense of the free world, and yet they see the French Parliament refusing to tax even moderately for European defense. . . . They read of the statements of both Prime Minister Churchill and the Socialist Party opposition as denouncing the government of Chiang Kai-shek, and they read that support of Chiang is a cardinal part of the American government's policy. . . . They see the United States bearing the brunt of the [Korean] struggle with the blood of its youth . . . and remember it hasn't been waged with maximum force at all." Mr. Lawrence concludes with a plea for a better Anglo-French-American understanding. These comments, we think, suggest the broad outlines of an extremely interesting foreign-policy program for the Republican Presidential candidate: (1) peace in Korea; (2) final abandonment of Chiang Kai-shek; (3) evolution of a world policy through agreement with the peoples of Britain, France, and the rest of the Western world and not through American imposition. We think such a program would attract millions of votes to the Republican candidate who espoused it. But would it attract Mr. Lawrence's?

ANOTHER POLITICAL MURDER, A FANTASTIC horse-meat racket, and sensational disclosures of corruption in government (see Machine-Gun Politics by Carey McWilliams on page 245) recently brought into being a "Committee of 19," made up of prominent Chicago citizens, to cope with the scandalous situation. Now an "anti-subversive" committee of the American Legion has tried to undercut the work of the Committee of 19 by "fingering" two of its members, Earl B. Dickerson and Dr. John A. Lapp. The Legion accuses these men of having been affiliated with groups of which it disapproves and charges further that other members of the committee have opposed its efforts "to bring about legislation to safeguard our liberties." Apparently opposition to any measure the Legion has ever sponsored automatically disqualifies a person for civic duty. With insufferable cant the Legion announces that it "can take no part in any of the activities of the Big 19 until those undesirable elements" have been ousted. Only Chicago's little children and feeble-minded will take this nonsense seriously. Dr. John A. Lapp and Earl Dickerson son are outstanding citizens. Can it be that the Legion wants to sabotage the work of the Committee of 19 and is looking for an excuse for its failure to cooperate? We trust that the response of the committee will be a decision to investigate the interests of local Legion posts in liquor licenses and slot machines.

STATE OFFICIALS HAVE BEEN ASKED BY THE Protestant Bill of Rights Committee in Wisconsin, originally formed by Milwaukee Lutherans, to halt payments to some fourteen public schools that now employ nuns as teachers. The committee charges that these schools are under the "domination" of priests or religious orders of the Roman Catholic church, in defiance of the state constitution. Holding that religion can be taught by indirect as well as direct methods, the committee specifies the day-to-day "indoctrination of children in an atmosphere which leads them to decide" that the faith of the teachers is the faith they should embrace. It also contends that the wearing of religious garb by teachers helps to create such an atmosphere. The issue first attracted general attention in Wisconsin about two years ago when a parent in the community of Duran refused to permit his son to attend a public school in which nuns, in the garb of their order, were the only teachers. Subsequent investigation revealed a similar situation in thirteen other public schools, most of them in rural areas. To combat it, the committee has announced a three-point program: it will first seek redress by administrative action; failing this it will take court action, and then, if necessary, direct political action. Much the same issue is shaping up in certain Minnesota communities, notably in Worthington and Pierz.

ARCHITECTS OF AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY will certainly seize upon the Soviet Union's military budget—the highest peace-time budget in the country's history—as justification for our armaments policy all along the line. In this sense the Kremlin did President Truman excellent service by releasing its budget figures on the very day the President made his plea for foreign aid. Yet any thoughtful observer must see that the Russians' planned military expenditures bear some relationship to our own. We too are operating under the biggest peace-time military budget in our history. We are going even farther. We are helping Britain and France to operate under the biggest peace-time military budgets in their history. We are planning a West German army, a European army, and a Middle East army, not to speak of a whopping big one of our own. If Truman, using the Soviet budget as a lever, succeeds in upping our own still farther, the ultimate result can only be that the Kremlin's 1953 budget also will be boosted again. The simple truth is that we are in an armaments race—a fact too often overlooked in the great debate over who started it. There is a way of stopping this race before it ends in war. The U. N.'s Disarmament Commission, under orders from the General Assembly, is scheduled to meet in a few weeks. The Russians have indicated willingness to participate. That is the place to debate not only the Russian military budget but also our own—and to come to some agreement on both.

Communism in the Schools

BY FRED A. KIRCHWEY

AMERICANS should realize that the Supreme Court decision upholding the constitutionality of New York's Feinberg law all but insures a rash of similar legislation spreading across the country. So certain is this result, given the present-day temper, that liberals in other states should acquaint themselves with the provisions of the law and prepare for efforts by zealous legislators to duplicate it. Meanwhile, in New York, all opponents of the measure must get ready to fight a long hard battle for its repeal. If the issue is left to those most directly involved, the teachers themselves, the anti-democratic assumptions of the Feinberg law, having won majority approval in the Supreme Court, will become the established norm—one more long step toward the garrison state we are supposedly preparing to resist to the death.

In New York City the situation has been complicated by a series of acts of the local educational authorities so repressive and arbitrary that the application of the Feinberg law may actually provide protection to the persons affected. This ironic state of affairs came about as the result of the legal attack on the law instituted soon after its adoption in 1949. Enforcement of the law was halted when suit was brought by a group of teachers, parents, and taxpayers to enjoin the Board of Education from carrying out its provisions. But the Superintendent of Schools was unwilling to wait upon the slow processes of the law. He went ahead, on the basis of existing sections of the Civil Service law and the Education law, to institute a purge of employees suspected of Communist or other "subversive" leanings or associations. The famous case of the eight teachers dismissed last year, now under appeal in the state Supreme Court, was the first result of Dr. Jansen's administrative housecleaning. A second batch of eight was suspended at the beginning of this February for refusing to tell whether or not they were or had been Communist Party members; the charge against them is "insubordination and conduct unbecoming a teacher." According to Dr. Jansen a third list of suspects is being assembled for questioning in the near future.

In all these cases juridical safeguards have been brushed aside. A teacher to be investigated receives a letter instructing him to report to the Corporation Counsel's office. There he is questioned by Assistant Corporation Counsel Saul Moskoff, in the presence of a stenographer and a recording machine. He is allowed no lawyer but can take with him a "teacher adviser," provided he can find a fellow-teacher willing to serve. The role is hardly popular, for a "teacher adviser" himself becomes a suspect by association. If the person under investigation refuses to answer all questions put to him—and many of the questions are both offensive and totally irrelevant—he is charged with insubordination, and suspension promptly follows. In no case so far has a teacher been accused of professional misconduct in act or word: no subversive teaching, no subversive influence on the pupils outside the classroom. Hearings which determine whether or not an "insubordinate" teacher shall be dropped are also conducted without proper safeguards, although the defendants are permitted counsel and in the event of dismissal may petition the courts for reinstatement. Altogether it is obvious that the patriotic zeal of New York's Superintendent of Schools has not been frustrated by the temporary suspension of the Feinberg law. None the less he welcomes the Supreme Court decision as a green light, since it confers high judicial sanction and respectability on a campaign whose legality has been widely challenged. In exchange for such endorsement he can well afford to sacrifice a few high-handed procedures.

The Feinberg law provides for the dismissal of any school employee who, by reason of membership in an organization considered subversive by the state Board of Regents, might try to spread propaganda advocating the overthrow of the government by force and violence. Teachers suspected of belonging to proscribed organizations have a right to a hearing and a court review, but under the law no overt act need be proved; membership alone is prima facie ground for dismissal. What organizations, apart from the Communist Party itself, will be put on the proscribed list no one yet knows. To carry out the task of detection the law sets up an elaborate system of spying and informing. The Regents may decide to adopt the federal Attorney General's list or may invent one of their own; their original list was never promulgated because of the court action now ended. Under the law listed organizations have the right to appeal to the courts.

What will be the effect of this act? The majority opinion that it does not deprive teachers of the right to free speech or assembly or deny due process is based primarily on the view that since "a teacher works in a sensitive area," shaping "the attitude of young minds toward the society in which they live," the state has a proper concern in the "integrity" of the process. But this argument can as well be used to support a contrary conclusion. For "thought control" exercised by the state over teaching, and thus over the minds of children, is exactly the method used by Communist governments—and presumably approved by Communist organizations and individuals—to insure conformity rather than integrity. It is freedom, not control, that leads to integrity in teaching. Even a person who believes no Communist or near-Communist can be trusted to keep his classrooms free from bias might well agree that a certain amount of partisan teaching would be less paralyzing to the educational process than the methods of spying, intimidation, denunciation, and inquisition prescribed in the new law.

The best answer to the majority view was the remarkable dissent of Justice Douglas, together with the concurring opinion by Justice Black—two statements that should be adopted by opponents of the law as their campaign platform. Justice Douglas made short work of the argument that freedom of thought and expression as guaranteed by the Constitution are not undermined by the provisions of the Feinberg law. After attacking the principle of establishing guilt through association and pointing out the almost insurmountable obstacles faced by an accused teacher in proving his innocence, the dissent describes in eloquent, plain language the certain effect of such a measure on the schools themselves.

The law inevitably turns the school system into a spying project. Regular loyalty reports on the teachers must be made out. The principals become detectives; the students, the parents, the community become informers. Ears are cocked for telltale signs of disloyalty.

The prejudices of the community come into play in searching out the disloyal. This is not the usual type of supervision which checks a teacher's competency; it is a system which searches for hidden meanings in a teacher's utterances.

What was the significance of the reference of the art teacher to socialism? Why was the history teacher so openly hostile to Franco Spain? Who heard overtones of revolution in the English teacher's discussion of "The Grapes of Wrath"?...

What happens under this law is typical of what happens in a police state. Teachers are under constant surveillance; their pasts are combed for signs of disloyalty; their utterances are watched for clues to dangerous thoughts. A pall is cast over the classrooms. . . . Of course the school systems of the country need not become cells for Communist activity; and the classrooms need not become forums for propagandizing the Marxist creed. But the guilt of the teacher should turn on overt acts. So long as she is a law-abiding citizen, so long as her performance within the public school system meets professional standards, her private life, her political philosophy, her social creed should not be the cause of reprisals against her.

This, we believe, is the true verdict on the Feinberg law and all it represents, even though it is not the verdict which prevails.

Chicago's Machine-Gun Politics

BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

Chicago

THE murder of Charles Gross, Republican committeeman for Chicago's Thirty-first (West Side) Ward, has touched off a great blaze of moral indignation. "Declare Civic War on Mob," thunders the Chicago Tribune, and offers a $10,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of the killers. "Sweep Hoodlums out of Politics!" runs another headline. "Stand up, you office-holders, you politicians, law-enforcers, policemen," demands the Daily News in a front-page editorial, "stand up and start moving. Put on your fighting clothes and fight." When Chicago is having one of these spasms of moral indignation its civic wrath is truly terrifying. But somehow a visitor cannot escape the conclusion that little will come of the furor except, perhaps, confirmation of the fairly obvious proposition that "corruption" is bipartisan. Before the Republicans become too thoroughly committed to the corruption issue, they might take a look at this Cook County extravaganza.

A West Side Republican bloc which has been growing in political power since the early 1920's now controls a dozen or so of Chicago's fifty wards. Most of its representatives in the state legislature come from rotten boroughs which, despite heavy population shifts, have not been reapportioned in more than fifty years. The mobsters who really elect these legislators are seldom interested in more than a dozen bills out of perhaps two thousand that may be introduced. The result is that the lawmakers can vote on the 1,988 other bills with bland indifference to the welfare of their constituents. Functioning as a unit, they have tremendous bargaining power.

The candidates of the West Side bloc seldom face opposition in either the primary or the election. Most of them are "home free"—as good as elected—long before the primary. Occasionally some naive person has the temerity to oppose a bloc representative, but such upstarts usually withdraw at the last moment, citing "ill health" as the reason for their abrupt decision to abandon politics as a career. Sometimes they admit that they have been chased from the field by threats or actual violence. In the last two years there have been six political murders in Chicago, all of them still unsolved. "How much longer will this slaughter continue?" asks Alderman Robert Merriam. "Who will be next? Are we to sit back quietly and wait? Somewhere a halt must be called." But it will not be easy to call a halt to political gangsterism in Chicago.

The current phase of Chicago's gunshot politics is so much like earlier outbreaks of gang violence as to suggest that the condition is somehow organic. "The mob has been extending its political influence for many years," the Chicago Sun-Times points out; "gangland is openly campaigning for political power with bullets instead of ballots." In the old days gangster violence was largely intramural, and the gangs were then content to rely upon informal alliances with various machine politicians. Political power was a means to an end; it is now a business. This movement of the mobs into direct political action reflects a shift in their economic interests. Here is the way one G. O. P. leader explains it: "The gambling racket is dead. The mob is now infiltrating into big business—all business—and all the political power it can muster will be used to put official 'muscle' into operation against legitimate merchants and manufacturers."

THE scandal over the sale of mule and horse meat for human consumption shows how gangsters are pushing to the top in business and politics. In the last two years the Chicago area has been inundated with millions of pounds of such meat, which has been sold to make not only hamburger but sausage and stew meat. One packer has confessed that he sold about 100,000 pounds of horse meat a week to the ringleader of the racket. Some mule and horse meat has for years found its way into the "hamburger" market, but the mobsters first moved into the field in a big way in 1949, when enormous profits could be made. Horse meat could be bought for 7 to 14 cents a pound and sold to wholesalers for 30 to 45 cents a pound; the wholesaler could then sell it to restaurants for 65 to 80 cents a pound. One small wholesaler banked $250,000 in four months; another sold 55,000 pounds of horse meat in thirteen days. Some twenty-five fairly large wholesalers were at one time engaged in the racket. At the outset business was so good that the mobsters began to hijack trucks carrying meat which they had sold to their customers. One dealer was robbed of $18,000 by the same hoodlums who had just paid it to him for a consignment of horse meat. The volume of mule and horse meat reaching the market became so great that honest retailers and wholesalers were finally forced to enter the racket in order to meet the prices of their more unscrupulous competitors.

The organizers of this multi-million-dollar racket were Chicago gangsters with important bipartisan political connections. But many other elements of society were involved—politicians, civil servants, truckers, restaurant and cafe owners, meat packers, and wholesale and retail meat dealers. To view this racket, then, as the evil inspiration of the Mafia is silly. Thirteen state food inspectors have been removed from their jobs for having not only accepted but in many cases solicited bribes from the ringleaders of the racket. One has confessed that he received as much as $450 a month in bribes. One was an ex-convict who had top Democratic sponsorship for his job. The registered agent of one of the horse-meat packing plants involved turns out to be a Democratic precinct captain whose name also appears on the city pay roll as an "assistant street inspector." The son of Dr. Herman N. Bundesen, city health commissioner, has been asked by the grand jury about his representation, as a lawyer, of individuals haled for questioning about the horse-meat scandal before the board over which his father presides. A racket as extensive as this could not have gone on for two years without interference by either state or local officials unless bipartisan political arrangements had been made at a fairly high level. Indeed, the scandal was only brought to light by the more or less accidental intervention of Office of Price Stabilization officials.

Now, of course, Republicans and Democrats are blaming each other. The Tribune, not noted for the fairness of its judgments, makes a practice of referring to Governor Adlai Stevenson as "the Dark Horse-Burger Candidate" or, more succinctly, as "Horse Meat Adlai." On the other hand, the Democrats point to the fact that the notorious West Side bloc is Republican. Actually the threads of influence and control reach across party lines. Chicago's "reform" mayor, Martin Kennelly, has found it extremely difficult to explain, for example, the city patronage made available to Aldermen D'Arco and Petrone, both regarded as representatives of the bloc.

SINCE the murder of Gross, all sorts of curious facts have come to light. City and county pay rolls have "ghost" employees who have drawn salaries but have never worked. Even the slain Gross had been placed on the pay roll of the county highway department in January as "a right-of-way investigator" at $450 a month. Another ghost employee was one "James Addison," who received $6,400 in thirty-two monthly checks of $200 each. The checks were sent to the home address of state Representative James J. Adduci, a West Side Republican. When first questioned about these checks, Adduci said: "See Bill Erickson." At the time this happened William N. Erickson, president of the County Board, was a candidate for the Republican nomination for governor. Referring to the incident, the Daily News said on February 14: "The fraud was committed very close to Erickson's own office. It is conceivable that he might not have known about it. But if he is fit to be County Board president, much less governor, he will lose no time in finding out all about it." Two weeks later Erickson withdrew from the gubernatorial race to devote all his time to "cleaning up the county's pay-roll mess." The Daily News said of his withdrawal: "Erickson apparently yielded to the wishes of his supporters. As the principal dispenser of Republican patronage in Cook County, he was a natural target for public resentment over mushrooming revelations of abuses of the patronage system."

Later another phantom employee was discovered who had been recommended for his job by Erickson himself. This individual drew $3,780 in salary as "sergeant-at-arms with the forest preserve" while basking in the sunshine at his Arizona ranch. The former Twenty-fifth Ward Republican committeeman, fired from his sanitary-district job in the current purge, admits that he had two in-laws on the pay rolls whose checks were regularly indorsed by his son, who was also on the pay roll for $385 a month! On the other hand, a man was found on the Chicago city pay roll as an "inspector for the committee on local transportation" who was also holding down a job in the Democratic state administration as a revenue inspector. But it is, after all, the Republicans who control the County Board in Cook County. Richard Yates Rowe, one of Erickson's Republican opponents, has charged that "Erickson harbors more hoodlum-sponsored employees on his pay rolls than all the rest of the county officers put together."

As Chicagoans were reading about the meat scandal and the Gross murder, Oliver Clubb announced that he was resigning as a senior State Department official because he felt that the charges made against him had seriously damaged his career, despite the fact that he was exonerated. At least one Middle Western editor put into juxtaposition the hysteria of the witch hunt and the scandals in Chicago and drew therefrom a moral. Writing in the Madison Capital-Times of February 15, William T. Evjue pointed out:

It is a measure of the madness that is upon us in this country that men of this stature are hounded from public life, while the nation goes indifferently on its way as hoodlums and gangsters continue to muscle in on politics in many of our larger cities, taking over the political system with the same methods they used to take over rackets. . . . Have we reached the point in our national hysteria where we pillory men of the caliber of Clubb, Service, Acheson, Marshall, and others while we exalt the killers and hoodlums of the underworld?

Wise old politicians who know that organized crime, by its very nature, must have its connections in the so-called upper world of respectable business men and politics to continue, are not getting excited [about the trouble in Chicago]. They remember that it was one of the city's most prominent bankers who made it possible for Ralph Capone to conceal hidden bank deposits for a long time from income-tax authorities. They know that the present outraged mood will pass away and that the hoodlums will continue to reach out for more power in the political system while the partnership of crime, business, and politics continues to work as long as it will produce profits.

But it would be misleading to conclude this report on such a sour note. Chicago is already recovering from its sense of outrage. Republican Sheriff John Babb feels that the purges have gone too far; in fact, he thinks that local officials have been guilty of a form of "political genocide" in purging pay rolls of phantom employees. Restaurant owner Chris Carson, in an effort to restore public confidence in hamburgers, gave away an estimated 100,000 sandwiches "with all the trimmings" in one day, just to show that "there's really nothing as good as the all-American hamburger." Already people are beginning to forget about those un-American muleburgers. "After all," Mr. Carson told the press, "Chicago is the meat-packing capital of the world. If the people can't trust their hamburgers here, where can they?"

Bevan's Bid for Power

BY ANDREW ROTH

London

ANEURIN BEVAN, British Labor's most powerful heavyweight, now faces his toughest bout in his patient progress toward the top title. He must not only deliver effective punches against the sturdy Conservative champion, while elbowing aside right-wing Labor contenders, but make sure that his strength is not undermined by a series of Communist-encouraged political strikes. Since militant non-Communist unionists support these strikes, Bevan and his group have been put on the spot. If they sanction essentially political strikes they risk isolating themselves from the bulk of the Labor movement, particularly its orthodox leaders. If they oppose them, the very Labor militants upon whom Bevan is depending to propel him into power may turn to Communist leaders.

"Bet on Bevan to come out on top!" say those who follow British political form most knowingly. Even the conservative Times recently wrote of his "displaying a mastery . . . which would be surprising if one had not grown to expect it of him." The pugnacious Welshman is already slugging it out toe to toe with the equally contentious Churchill. The unparalleled style of the Prime Minister's lunge has obscured the fact that it is he who has given ground. He has already lopped £300,000,000 off the rearmament budget. He felt it necessary to deny in the strongest terms that Britain is committed to all-out war against China. And he has disowned John Foster Dulles's plans to sponsor counter-revolution on the Asian mainland.

Leaders of Labor's right wing still show the effects of having been caught between the two giants in the historic foreign-affairs debate of February 26. Mr. Morrison appears diminished in size, and even the widely respected Mr. Attlee was bruised. In the debate the style of the ex-Foreign Secretary's attack on Mr. Churchill, coupled with his previous silence on his Korean commitments, revealed the inroads of "Bevanism" in the Parliamentary Labor Party. Morrison called Churchill's Washington trip "a doubtful mission undertaken by the wrong man at the wrong time," which produced "very small results for our country" and involved "vaguely expressed and possibly grave commitments." "We must resist aggression," he mildly bellowed, "but our business is not to build up a Chinese wall against us. . . . I do not want to see us drift into an attitude of subservience to America which is bound to do harm to our good relationship in due course."

Churchill brushed off these charges as "weak, vague, wandering." Labor, he jeered, was sufficiently "Machiavellian" to build atom bombs while "accusing their opponents of being warmongers." Then he shook Morrison badly by baring that the latter had agreed, the previous May, to the bombing of airfields in China if heavy raids were launched from these airfields against the U. N. forces in Korea. At this point Bevan charged to the rescue, yelling "Foul!" Churchill, he maintained, was violating the rules of the game in revealing the previous government's action without "laying the document" before Parliament. To onlookers it was difficult to tell whether Morrison felt worse over being hit where it hurt by Churchill or being rescued by Nye Bevan. But it was Bevan's masterful and varied oratory that absorbed all attention. Bevan pressed Churchill into saying whether he accepted Mr. Dulles's proposal to overthrow the Peking government. Even when Churchill answered, "No, sir, certainly not," Bevan added: "We must warn our American friends that not one British soldier will risk his life" to wage "an ideological war with weapons against the Soviet Union."

The impact of this parliamentary battle on Labor M. P.'s was staggering, particularly after they sampled opinions in their constituencies on the week-end of March 1-2. The more alert Laborites must have known that last summer the Labor government went almost all the way with President Truman's Administration on Korea, for this was made quite clear by the Foreign Office-inspired diplomatic correspondents and the editorial writers of the leading papers. But it came as a shock to the party stalwarts who took foreign policy on faith as long as it was handled by "Herbert" and "Good old Clem." Many felt betrayed that their leaders had entered such a battle with Churchill when they were so vulnerable. Even right-wing Laborites have to admit that without Bevan, instead of securing a draw, Labor would have suffered a knockout.

The Manchester Guardian expressed the position of the Foreign Office when it warned recently that Bevan's views and even Attlee's milder echo of them would "make Senator Taft whoop with joy" and that Washington would be "less . . . willing to listen to our views" if it doubted Britain's loyalty to the alliance. Answering a similar charge in Commons, Bevan asked Selwyn Lloyd sarcastically whether "the House of Commons should be in recess during the American election year."

However unpopular Bevan may be in Washington—

he himself says, "I have more friends in America than I have on the other [Conservative] side of the House"—he is becoming more and more the voice of Labor Britain in a period of deepening crisis. Thus on March 2 the Bishop of Birmingham, who is no Communist, attacked the napalm bombs used by the United States as "an even greater disgrace to mankind" than the atom bomb. He also voiced the belief, fairly widespread among Labor intellectuals, that the Chinese Communists might be regarded "as the beginning of a new social development, a transformation which in the end will give to China, with its great and ancient civilization, the leadership of human progress."

Bevan said during the debate that "every miner, railwayman, and agricultural worker in Britain knows very well that if he were in China he would be a Communist peasant. He would not be for Chiang Kai-shek, he would be a Communist." He had intended, his intimates disclosed, to devote quite a bit of time to the need for capturing the leadership, or at least the friendship, of the Asian revolution but had to change his plans to resist Churchill's onslaught. In particular he had intended to attack Anglo-American policy toward Indo-China. He did find time to ridicule the Conservative, and American, idea that all Communist-led Asian revolts are "the result of a Kremlin plot."

The increasing attraction of what Bevanites call a "really Socialist foreign policy" is illustrated by the recent decision of the Labor Party's National Executive to readmit to party membership ex-M. P. Konni Zilliacus. This former League of Nations official was a leading foreign-affairs spokesman for Labor's left wing until his expulsion three years ago, together with three crypto-Communists. The others have continued to echo Soviet policy, but Zilliacus has shown a deep sympathy for Titoism—he speaks Serbo-Croat and has just finished a semi-official biography of Tito.

The increase in the Bevanites' strength so dramatically shown in the Commons debate of March 3 has precipitated a crisis in the Labor Party. As this is written, the Executive Council has been called into special session by Attlee. Despite Attlee's urgent request that they limit their disagreement to abstention, fifty-seven Labor members voted against the defense program. Bevan, staunchly defending this defiance of party discipline, has since warned the leadership that he is prepared to bolt the party to effectuate his ideas.

Whether Bevan's leadership of the Labor Party will mature quickly or take three or four years is now being decided in the mines, factories, and union halls. Although Bevan came up through the trade-union movement and expresses the feelings of the workers, he has very little support among the union bosses, some of whom, like Arthur Deakin, hold his criticism of rearmament responsible for the present political strikes.

The Heart of the French Problem

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

Paris

THE Faure government, which lasted thirty-nine days, will be remembered as the government of Lisbon, of Hoa-Binh, and of the franc panic of February, 1952. When, on the night of its fall, somebody mentioned these three disasters, M. Faure, who has a sense of humor and perhaps also a touching faith in the eternity of French parliamentary institutions and of his own career, remarked: "Well, Daladier has lived down many worse things." It was Daladier, indeed, who was chiefly responsible for the defeat of M. Faure, having induced twenty-eight Radicals—members of the party to which the Premier himself belongs—to join the Gaullists, Communists, and some forty members of the "classic" right in voting against the 15 per cent tax increase demanded by the government to avert an immediate financial crisis and to meet, at least in part, the expenditures on rearmament and the war in Indo-China.

The absurdity of the parliamentary situation is found in the fact that many of the same deputies who refused to provide more revenue had voted a few hours earlier for a heavily increased military outlay. This, for one reason or another, they had considered "inevitable," but higher taxes would annoy constituents, vested interests, and the village pump. The Pleven government had fallen in January for much the same reason, though this time, disturbed by M. Faure's "leftist" bias, the right wing of his majority also wanted "a change."

It is easy to jeer at French governmental instability and at the continuing lack of a firm majority in the Assembly; one could not be brought into being even by the trick of "Third Force" apparetements in the last general election. The British press, especially, has been insufferably self-righteous and has compared France with "efficient" Germany. All the jeering, needless to say, has been lapped up with relish by the Gaullist papers here. Paris-Presse joyfully reproduced, in facsimile, the advice given to France by the London Daily Mirror, of all papers—which was to get itself a "strong man" quickly.

Only a few timid voices abroad have remarked that financial troubles are not, after all, peculiar to France but part and parcel of the whole European set-up, not to be explained away by pretentious dissertations about "the French character." These voices have ventured to suggest that something very similar might happen in London too, before very long. The French habit of hoarding gold and dollar bills, many have rightly observed, was only a symptom of the trouble, not its cause. The real cause of the financial crisis was obvious: France was living far beyond its means and could not afford, simultaneously, a program of capital investment and reconstruction even if sharply curtailed, heavy rearmament, and, last but not least, the war in Indo-China, in which in the past few years something like two billion pounds had been sunk.

A few minutes before the Assembly vote which overthrew his government, M. Faure had stated emphatically that Indo-China was the real heart of the French problem, in both a financial and a military sense. As long as France had to fight this war alone and pay for it almost alone, as long as the cadres of at least six divisions were out there, there could be no adequate French army in Europe and no stable franc. At Lisbon, he said, he had asked "whether or not Indo-China was included in the common defense strategy" and had received no answer. He implied that Germany, as a result of Lisbon, would soon gain a dominant position in Europe, both militarily and economically, and he stressed that his successor—whoever he might be—must receive an answer to the question about Indo-China.

The next day it was found that there was no money left in the kitty, and a hasty advance of twenty-five billion francs, repayable in three weeks, had to be obtained from the Bank of France for current expenses. M. Baumgartner, governor of the bank, having refused to raise the legal limit of the note circulation, frigidly agreed to advance the money against Treasury bonds, accompanying his concession with a sermon on the disastrous state of the French budget. How the money will be repaid by March 20, if at all, is a mystery for the present. The pessimists, of course, are crowing that France has "started on the road of inflation." Taking account of Indo-China and the need to pay for imports out of the meager gold reserves, the charge is perhaps not altogether unjustified.

AS FAURE rightly said, Indo-China is the heart of the problem, and much depends on what is done about it. For three years I have stressed in this journal the folly of the Indo-China war, quoting such farsighted Frenchmen as M. Mendès-France who insisted that the war was incompatible with France's authority in Europe and in consequence were treated as cranks or secret Communists by the successive governments and by moth-eaten oracles like André Siegfried. First the war was waged in the name of French prestige and la présence française. Then, even after French moneyed interests like the Banque d'Indochine had given it up as a bad investment and had been replaced by piastre racketeers, it was waged as a missionary war "against world communism," a pendant as it were to the sacred war waged by the U. N. in Korea. An attempt was made to get financial and military aid from the Americans, but they were interested only if it was understood that France should go on carrying the baby.

Today nearly everybody agrees with Mendès-France. The withdrawal last week from Hoa-Binh in the mountains west of the Tonkin delta—described at the time of its capture by the French last November as "the key to Vietminh's whole system of communications"—was not only an important political move but also a serious military setback for the French, who lost at least three battalions in their retreat. The capture of Hoa-Binh was undertaken, it is now learned, against the better judgment of General de Lattre and at the insistence of M. Letourneau, Minister for Indo-China, who wanted to "impress Washington" at a time when it was feeding the French vague promises of aid. This aid amounted to so little that after three agonizing months the French found they could no longer hold Hoa-Binh. Vietminh troops, better armed than before, were penetrating more and more frequently into the delta land around Hanoi, now no longer adequately defended; the road to Hoa-Binh was a constant death trap; and the "prestige operation" had to be abandoned. M. Letourneau, the "Duke of Hoa-Binh" as Claude Bourdet ironically calls him, has been saying strange and shocking things: "Of course the evacuation of the expeditionary force is our ultimate aim. Of course we are willing to negotiate with Vietminh, but we're damned if we'll take the first step."

The experts' view is that Vietminh, despite its recent successes—Hoa-Binh was acclaimed throughout the Communist world as a major victory—is willing to negotiate, provided the French government sends official and fully accredited negotiators. Vietminh is genuinely anxious to industrialize and to raise the living standard of its people, which cannot be done to any extent as long as the war lasts. As things now stand, according to reliable reports, the end of the war need not be a shameful French surrender; M. Daladier believes that Vietminh may agree to much more reasonable terms from the French point of view than the Crusaders like to admit.

Two principal features of the Cabinet crisis were Reynaud's failure to form a National Government by bringing the Gaullists in through the back door and the revolt within Gaullist ranks enabling a government to be formed around the rightist Antoine Pinay. The wayward Gaullists undoubtedly were motivated by their realization that France was not prepared for grave commotion and a fascist upheaval and also by their desire to avoid the nomination to the premiership of Mendès-France, whom President Auriol would have called had Pinay failed. Mendès-France would have meant drastic austerity and a clear-cut decision to terminate the Indo-China war. Pinay means inroads on social services, purely theoretical price control, and real depression wages.

In Defense of Current Sex Studies

BY ALBERT ELLIS and DONALD WEBSTER CORY

IN A review of Donald Webster Cory's book, "The Homosexual in America," in The Nation for December 22, 1951, Dr. Milton R. Sapirstein included some aspersions on other recent books on sex, in particular on "Patterns of Sexual Behavior" by Clellan S. Ford and Frank A. Beach and "Sexual Behavior in the Human Male" by Alfred C. Kinsey and associates. His remarks would be unimportant if they did not seem to represent the views of several other recent writers and to raise some vital moral questions.

ALBERT ELLIS, formerly Chief Psychologist of the State of New Jersey, is now practicing psychoanalytically oriented psychotherapy in New York City. He is the author of "The Folklore of Sex."

DONALD WEBSTER CORY is a pseudonym.

Dr. Sapirstein begins his attack:

Much of the recent literature on homosexuality and sex in general—such as Kinsey, Ford, and Beach—tends to impress the gullible reader with the wide variation of sexual practices in different cultures as well as in different biological species. Beginning with an attitude of tolerant liberalism, they all end up with an attack on the accepted sexual mores of our Western Hebrew-Christian society.

This is simply not so. The distinguished American anthropologist Margaret Mead, who has been foremost in stressing the wide variations of sexual and other practices in different cultures, has tempered her tolerance with considerable conservatism. She vigorously attacked Dr. Kinsey and his associates when "Sexual Behavior in the Human Male" first appeared, contending that it should never have been permitted to become a best-seller because "the sudden removal of a previously guaranteed reticence has left many young people singularly defenseless in just those areas where their desire to conform was protected by a lack of knowledge of the extent of non-conformity." Drs. Ford and Beach are also restrained in their conclusions and make a plea only for more research into the biological and anthropological aspects of human sexuality. They do not attack any of our contemporary sexual customs or taboos. Nor, aside from pointing out that if certain of our sex laws were properly enforced most of our male population would be in jail, do Kinsey and his associates specifically attack our accepted sexual mores.

Dr. Sapirstein continues:

As a plea for less prejudice they are undoubtedly justified. But what these authors seem to forget, or do not know, is that the sexual practices of the individual and his community can never be studied out of context of personality structure, religious-moral system, prestige values, economic system, and so forth.

Actually, of course, Dr. Kinsey and his associates made a special point of studying the individual within the context of his religious-moral views, economic status, education, and so on and continually present their sexual findings in various personal-social contexts. More of their book is devoted to the relationships between an individual's sex outlets and the non-sexual aspects of his life than to any other phase of their study. As for Ford and Beach, they conclude that "it is our hope that the present volume will serve as a useful step toward the development of a sound understanding of the sexual behavior of human beings as it is affected by their evolutionary heritage and by the conditions imposed upon them by their environment" (our italics).

Dr. Sapirstein wittily goes on:

If the authors who recommend unlimited variations of sexual practice were prepared to argue for the family structure of the guinea pig or the economic system of the Marquesans it would make more sense. But, instead, they all belittle the rather narrow limits of sexual "normality" in our culture, challenging the goals which are traditional for our culture—offering only unlimited variation as an alternative.

JUST who are these authors who recommend unlimited variation in sexual practice? Certainly Drs. Kinsey, Ford, and Beach do not recommend any such thing, for the members of our present society. About the only well-known contemporary writer who comes close to fitting Dr. Sapirstein's description is René Guyon, who published his main works over a decade ago and is a jurist rather than an anthropologist or biologist. Even if he is thinking of a writer like Dr. Guyon, however, Dr. Sapirstein's logic is faulty, for actually one can advocate the sex habits of, say, the Marquesans without advocating their particular economic system or even their family system. Similar forms of sex activity have existed for centuries in regions with most diverse economic systems and in those where the family system has been either matrilinear or patrilinear, exogamous or endogamous, based on the small or the large family. There is certainly no fixed relationship between a given set of sex mores and a given family, economic, religious, or political system, although there are, of course, some important interrelations.

As for Dr. Sapirstein's fears about the espousal of "unlimited variation," not even the ultra-liberal Dr. Guyon and surely not Drs. Kinsey, Ford, and Beach argue that all human beings should adopt all the variations of sexual behavior which exist among all the known human and animal communities. What Guyon advocates is merely the freedom of individuals to practice, in an orderly, private, and mutually consenting manner, sex acts which are satisfying to themselves and which do not harm others.

Dr. Sapirstein says in his next paragraph:

This undoubtedly, in the long run, will have a rather anxiety-producing effect. For no one individual can be all things, and each individual can and must work out a way of life which is in tune with his own background, his own family structure, and his own society.

Who has demanded that any individual be all sexual things to himself or to others? Economic systems and religions differ widely in different parts of the world, but no one reasons that every American should therefore simultaneously follow all economic systems and all religions.

More important is Dr. Sapirstein's implication—in agreement with Dr. Mead's quoted statement—that the publication of sex truths may produce anxiety in individuals in our culture who have not been accustomed to accept such truths. This is a dangerous, anti-scientific, freedom-destroying assumption. It is essentially the doctrine that has motivated all anti-democratic regimes, from the Inquisition to modern totalitarian states. If it were ever consistently applied, any fact which failed to support the existing mores of any culture—whatever they might be—would automatically be branded "anxiety-producing," or "non-Aryan," or "unpatriotic," or what you will. And any falsehood, presumably, that supported existing mores would be considered "good" and "true."

It is especially surprising to hear this doctrine expounded by psychoanalytically oriented writers like Drs. Sapirstein and Mead, since the very essence of analytic philosophy is the idea that the individual becomes disturbed just because he refuses to face the facts of life and insists on setting up neurotic defenses against supposedly harsh reality. Psychoanalytic therapy basically seeks to enable the disturbed patient to reconstruct his views and attitudes so that he can accept a fact as a fact and also accept himself, with his hostile, sexual, and "bad" impulses as well as his friendly, non-sexual, and "good" ones. Proponents of psychoanalysis, therefore, should welcome research which tries to get to the bottom of sexual reality, harsh as this reality may seem to our culturally biased eyes. If our sex mores must be upheld at the cost of suppressing biological and anthropological knowledge, or interpreting it in an emasculated manner, neurosis—as Freud would have been the first to insist—will continue to be widespread, and sexual progress will be minimal.

Dr. Sapirstein concludes:

The fact that isolated individuals cannot attain the "normal" for their own society is in many ways pathetic and we certainly should be tolerant of them, but this still does not justify a massive attack against the established practices of the larger elements of the community. We shall always need guideposts for each individual society, whether all the travelers along the road desire to follow the road map or not.

This is true to some extent. But also true are these facts: (1) In our society, as the Kinsey Report and other studies have shown, "the established practices of the larger elements of the community" are often actually opposed to our sex mores. Writers like Drs. Sapirstein and Mead are objecting, in effect, to people discovering that several of the so-called "majority" sex practices—such as premarital virginity and marital fidelity—are fast becoming minority ones, and that the "established" sex mores are often largely the abolished ones. (2) While each individual society will always need some social guideposts, it is most unlikely that the particular sexual guideposts which at present exist in our own society will always be needed. (3) Whether we like it or not, our sexual guideposts are continually changing. (4) That we now make use of a set of sexual guideposts hardly proves that it is a perfect or even a good set. (5) Our contemporary guideposts are not, as Dr. Sapirstein implies, consistent, steady, and invariant. On the contrary, as Albert Ellis showed in his recent study, "The Folklore of Sex," our sexual mores are so contradictory and confusing that the individual in our society does not have one sex code which he can easily follow but a number of conflicting codes which are almost certain to get him into continual difficulty with himself and others. (6) Probably the best and quickest way to establish consistent, workable, and anxiety-reducing sexual guideposts in our culture would be to have many more research projects like those being planned and executed by Kinsey and his associates and by Ford and Beach.

In other words, the more fully we accept the fact—as conclusively revealed by modern biological, psychological, sociological, and anthropological findings—that sex practices and beliefs vary widely in different cultures and species, the more likely we are to evolve eventually a set of sex mores that will serve as better guideposts than the system we have passively inherited from our non-research-minded forbears.

Hindering the Search for Morality

BY MILTON R. SAPIRSTEIN

I FIND the foregoing defense of the scientific works of Kinsey, Ford and Beach, and others quite appropriate. I wish Messrs. Ellis and Cory could defend "The Homosexual in America" with equal vigor. For, after all, my review in an earlier issue of The Nation was primarily concerned with that book.

I am now being challenged on the extension of my comments, in which I questioned the limited point of view of other sexual studies published in recent years. Although I have many reservations about those volumes,

MILTON R. SAPIRSTEIN is a practicing psychoanalyst and the author of "Emotional Security."

I would agree that they are honest studies by reputable workers. They need no defense from Cory and Ellis, and I am quite prepared to accept them in terms of factual, statistical, or biological data. Independent of their sociological and psychiatric implications, their intrinsic merit is not relevant to our discussion.

For the basic problem still remains. Whether we agree or disagree with Kinsey, Ford, Beach, Ellis, and Mead, whether we like their method of presentation or not, Donald Webster Cory still uses them for his own special purpose. In contrast to the more serious workers, Cory has a special ax to grind. He uses them to surround his own slanted view with an air of authenticity.

Our society is in a state of flux, and no honest worker can fail to observe the constantly changing sexual patterns. At the same time every clinical observer is struck by the sincere attempts of most people to distil some healthy values out of the present chaotic situation. Young people are desperately searching for a new kind of morality—a monogamy which “works,” built around a healthy relation to children and to the world. I think most of them are succeeding better than their parents.

Within this fragile framework Mr. Cory comes along to promote the advantages of homosexuality. He quotes the best authorities—many of them leave themselves wide open to this type of confusion—and defends their points of view in the hope that he can thus prop up his own dramatization of an unhealthy form of sexual adaptation. Frankly I am intolerant of any such maneuver, and of the authorities who lend themselves to it. We still have relatively wide zones of healthy sexuality, even in our fluctuating society, and no useful purpose is served by emphasizing the fact that distortions, or what is viewed as distortions in our society, are accepted in other cultures, other species of animals, or other eras.

How Free Is Canada's Air?

BY HENRY MONTCALM

Montreal

RECENT attacks on the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for so-called anti-religious broadcasts have raised the question whether freedom of speech is possible on the air. The row began last June, over six lectures by the British physicist Fred Hoyle, rebroadcast from the BBC, which have been published in Harper's Magazine and in book form. In the final lecture Hoyle said that in his opinion “what the Christians offer is an eternity of ‘frustration.’” R. W. Keyserlingk, a Baltic German converted to Catholicism in Canada, editor of the Ensign, a Catholic weekly, led off with protests to Prime Minister St. Laurent. The Prime Minister replied that he thought the series undesirable but would not interfere, as indeed he had no right to do, since the CBC is responsible only to Parliament.

In September came a series of talks by four notable psychiatrists, including Dr. Brock Chisholm, head of the World Health Organization, and Dr. Ewen Cameron, president-elect of the American Psychiatric Society. Taking as their subject “Man's Last Enemy, Himself,” they discussed the possibility of bringing up children free of hatred. This series was followed by six talks by Bertrand Russell on “Living in an Atomic Age.”

Then the free-for-all started. The Jesuit monthly, Relations, thundered against Dr. Cameron's “soulless and godless utterances.” Bertrand Russell was called a proponent of “animal unrestraint.” An Ontario prelate said Russell “oozed the deadly pus of hell.” On the other side, B. K. Sandwell, retired editor of the influential weekly Saturday Night, declared that religious people must not be distressed by speakers who asked them to believe some other faith than their own, or none at all: obviously, a rule against such exhortations would bar practically all church broadcasting. The United Church of Canada tentatively backed the Ensign; the Anglicans merely asked for time to answer the broadcast. The Benedictine Fathers' weekly remarked that no Christian need fear attacks on spurious religion.

Letters to the CBC were overwhelmingly favorable. Maclean's Magazine and most newspapers upheld CBC policy. A Tory M. P. told Parliament that if the CBC set itself up as a censor, freedom of speech would suffer a serious setback. The chairman of the CBC board tossed the question to Parliament, saying that the CBC did not try to decide what programs were good or bad for people to hear but only to make sure that all responsible points of view got expression.

The question is made more insistent by the imminence of television, over which the CBC is keeping a firm hold. Private stations will not be permitted to enter the field until the CBC itself is ready, since it believes television should be “essentially a Canadian operation carried on in the national interest.” While the appropriation which the CBC requires over and above its revenue from radio licenses and commercial programs was pending in Commons, all the people with grudges wielded their shillelaghs—the private stations frantically seeking television permits, the big advertisers moaning over their amputated commercials, the true believers who want to hear only their own doctrine.

Some of the private stations are linked with companies that make radio and television sets and with big American concerns; many make a lot of money; all think they could make more if not hampered by CBC regulations. In a deeply religious country like Canada, branding a publicly owned service anti-Christian is a potent weapon.

The CBC has served Canadians for fifteen years. Reaching many places too remote to be in contact with a private station, it puts on farm forums, plays and music by Canadians, political talks on free time, and many concerts. A wide audience profits from the factual broadcasts of its International Service.

The Minister through whom the CBC reports to Parliament has said that “some things got on the air that shouldn't have.” Hoyle, Chisholm, and the others thought they were talking about science. If nothing is permitted that could conceivably offend any Christian or non-Christian sect, can any scientific hypothesis be discussed? All freedom of speech will suffer if the CBC becomes “a toothless lion thrown to the Christians.”

Diet and the Birth Rate

THE GEOGRAPHY OF HUNGER.

By Josué de Castro. Little, Brown and Company. $4.50.

AMONG the privileges enjoyed by technically advanced nations and denied to the underdeveloped, contraception is perhaps not the first that comes to mind. But any magazine with an international circulation which publishes articles on birth control immediately receives letters from behind the papal curtain. A Nicaraguan describes efforts to feed a family of seven on a carpenter's wage; a father in Bonn can find only one basement room for his three-child family; a Quebec woman asks for her reply in a plain envelope. The conscripted parents of Asia and Africa do not know that they want contraceptives. They know that they do not want so many children, and resort to abortion and infanticide. Money and brains—not enough—are searching for the simple contraceptive.

Josué de Castro has the answer. It is meat. The sad letters can be answered. Infants need not be conceived, only to be exposed on river banks to die. Parents must eat steak, liver, eggs; drink milk. They must give up diets of rice and beans. It is not the number of children that makes the wages seem small and the meal meager; it is the meager meal that brings so many children. Hunger causes overpopulation, not vice versa. Protein is the magic contraceptive, for if people will eat properly "there will quickly come about a reduction in the exaggerated indexes of fertility," whereas the same reduction through the use of contraceptives would be disastrous. "Simply to retard the birth rate, as the neo-Malthusians advocate, would, within our contemporary economic framework, only diminish food production and thus increase starvation."

From experiments with rats Mr. de Castro has found that those fed on a high protein diet have fewer young than those deprived of proteins. He concludes, but does not prove, that this would apply to human beings. But he ignores the difference between fecundity and fertility. The rats were allowed to breed to the limit of their fecundity, so that the difference made by proteins could be measured. Fecundity is the physical possibility of reproduction; fertility what is achieved. In no known culture do women go to the limit of their fecundity, which is about thirty-seven live births. Without a control group of human breeders it cannot be told how much a meat diet, or any other single factor, reduces a normal woman's childbearing from thirty-seven to a number more in keeping with her maternal ambition.

The book contains a table showing for certain areas the birth rate and the daily consumption of animal proteins in grams. Without exception the birth rate goes down as the proteins go up, with Formosa and Sweden changing places at the end of the lists. We feel we should warn the Swedes—top for proteins, bottom for births—not to pass their plates for more meat lest they have no children at all. Fortunately we remember, though Mr. de Castro does not, that they are the most birth-control conscious of all peoples. Argentina, which has the world's highest meat consumption, has been left off the list. It does not have the world's lowest birth rate. Similarly, statements are made that monoculture of cash crops for export always leads to impoverished and dense populations, but the wheat belt of Canada, where the population is eight to the square mile, is not taken into account. Cuba is cited as proof that people who produce raw materials for export go hungry, whereas a glance at New Zealand might prove that freedom to plan parenthood has some mitigating influence.

Tables can be made correlating many factors with variations in birth rates. They are useful only if all major differences are considered and used to correct one another. A depressed status for women and poor education correspond roughly with each other and with a high birth rate. In Burma the women have equality with men, and the country, though an eighth the size of India, has only a twentieth of India's population.

The fact is that all the evils of which both the family planners and De Castro complain go together and cannot be cured unless advance is made on all fronts. Feudalism, colonialism, indifference to science he deplures. These occur in the very countries which forbid birth control. He asks freedom for nutritionists and biologists to put human happiness before money interests. The same spirit of enlightenment would not withhold from parents the right to plan their families. He writes that birth-control advocates offer "as our only salvation a forced reduction in the world's birth rate." But birth control is the opposite of force; it offers a choice. It is those who illegalize birth control who use force.

On nutrition the book is excellent, and the author's humanity is obvious, but though the fact of overpopulation is of the essence of his book he always becomes emotional on the subject of birth control. He shies away from it. He cannot see it as a weapon, along with so many others he readily accepts, for the individual's control of his destiny. And here William Vogt, author of "Road to Survival" and advocate of birth control, has some chickens coming home to roost.

Throughout "The Geography of Hunger" runs a growl of rage against the derogatory treatment of un-American peoples in Vogt's book. There are eleven references to Vogt and his book in the index, and the last pages are shrill against him. De Castro picks out with proper scorn Vogt's references to the Indians making sex play their national sport—not of itself an insult but since it was coupled with a remark about their breeding like codfish it must have been meant as one. In a passage of impressive wrath that reminds us that he is a poet and a creative writer as well as a scientist, De Castro defends the Indians and their culture from the "egregious" Mr. Vogt. But he should remember that the Indians have requested the World Health Organization for help with a program of birth control. It is part of their plan of advancement for their country. They take the vaccines, jeeps, and engineers of the country of their detractor. Why should they cut off their noses to spite their faces by refusing America's sterile-period charts and spermicidal jellies? They are too grown up for that.

BARBARA CADBURY

The Factual Melville

HERMAN MELVILLE: A BIOGRAPHY. By Leon Howard. University of California Press. $5.

THIS biography of Melville is a companion piece to Jay Leyda's recently published "Melville Log." The "Log" presents the whole body of documentary knowledge now available about the author of "Moby Dick," and Mr. Howard's biography, written, we are told, almost in collaboration with Leyda, presents in sober narrative form the copious part of this knowledge which Mr. Howard thinks proper to the subject. Like the "Log," Howard's biography is an important contribution to the current attempt in Melville scholarship to put the man and his work in the solidest possible context of fact. As a factual reference work, written on the whole with a minimum but genuine literary competence, this biography will long be of value to the reader of Melville. No previous biography comes anywhere near it, of course, for accuracy and completeness.

I have some complaints about the author's attempts at intellectual history and "criticism," and they are quickly stated. In a by now time-honored scholarly tradition Melville is here presented as if he were a kind of puzzled sophomore worrying throughout his life about such matters as "the problem of knowledge" and feeling sad when this or that epistemological or metaphysical question seemed unanswerable. The reader gets little sense that Melville, as an artist-thinker, also wrestled with problems having to do with art and myth.

Nor does one get a really firm sense that Melville was an American writer. One is sometimes led to feel that a bookish Afghan might just as easily have written "Moby Dick" as anyone else, provided he had read Carlyle and certain books on whaling. It would be pleasant to report that where Mr. Howard departs at all from his sober, factual biographical account, he has leaned a little toward a cultural and psychological approach, formidable as the pitfalls of this approach admittedly are. But in sticking so resolutely to an abstract and schematized method, he comes up, in the realm of ideas and artistic values, with a remarkably abstract Melville. And this despite the fact that his preface announces, in language I find uncomfortably close to that of the human-relations expert, an intention to restore "the human element" to Melville studies.

It is a pity that Mr. Howard did not throw the last pages of his book, wherein he essays an act of criticism, into the wastebasket while they were still in manuscript. The virtues of his kind of scholarly writing are patient attention to the fact, common sense, judiciousness, modesty, and urbanity. Why, then, in speaking of Melville critics of whom he disapproves does the author suddenly emulate the violent tones of darkest philistia? Is it quite proper for a serious writer, presumably committed to the high Montaignesque virtues, to imply that everyone with whom he disagrees is neurotic or to use the word "intellectual" in a uniformly pejorative sense? A spirited, even a vituperative, polemic is one thing, but the awkward assault of the outraged conventionalist is another. Thus one can only deplore the contemptuous references to D. H. Lawrence as an "English novelist who longed to lose himself in the Freudian Id" and to another critic of Melville as "the college professor who fancied himself an intellectual radical."

Mr. Howard has no scruples about comparing himself with God; for, after all, who but God has a right to claim so much omniscience as does this writer in summing up the work of other writers: "The pool seems to be inexhaustible. As the reflections of one critical group drain off, the waters, without a disturbing ripple, give forth those of another." Mr. Howard remains; the many change and pass. This is all a bit ironical in view of the fact that if it had not been for the critics, Mr. Howard would never have heard of Herman Melville or, if he had, would regard him as an obscure writer who turned

Introduction by LOUIS UNTERMAYER

In more than three hundred and fifty literary gems, poets from the chief periods and countries in the history of human culture, provide a manifold variety of answers to the crisis of death. This anthology is unique since it reflects the Humanist philosophy, emphasizing the best of all answers to death: The wholehearted affirmation of life in terms of freedom, joy, and beauty.

- "The best collection of its kind, a book of poetry which offers relief from the increasing pressures of the day and the oppressing memories of the night."

—Louis Untermeyer, Poet and Critic, in Introduction to Second Edition

- "The poems... have been chosen with sensitive taste... The unfortunate who hides a corroding fear of death in his heart will be stimulated to adopt a more gallant and serene attitude."

—Edward Laroque Tinker,
New York Times

- "An anthology like none ever compiled before. This collection, admirably chosen, breathes courage, freedom and beauty on every page." —Dr. Charles Francis Potter out some third-rate sea stories with titles difficult to recall.

Perhaps we may assume that the biographer has merely gone beyond his competence in these last pages, that he has no real ill-will but genuinely understands "criticism" to be that which goes on when, for example, one accuses others of indulging in "intellectual gyrations of ecstasy." As for "intellectual gyrations of ecstasy," these are interesting but inconceivable. Presumably Mr. Howard should have written "ecstatic gyrations of intellect," if he was to insist on the image at all. Yet I fear he has the stubborn conviction that in "criticism" it doesn't matter what you say. If so, it is all the more regrettable that he should have tried it.

The Lore of Islam

THE PORTABLE ARABIAN NIGHTS. Edited, and with an Introduction, by Joseph Campbell. The Viking Press. $2.50.

THE robust youth of the civilization we call Islam flourished during and after the eighth century, and about the Bagdad court of Harun-al-Rashid and his successors. But by the fourteenth century the Tartars had come and the caliphate was overthrown. Nostalgia for a glorious past had set in; legends came into flower; and gradually, by the anonymous art of the public tale-teller, they found their way into the framework of the witty girl who distracted a surly emperor by retelling them for 1,001 nights. They were translated into French as early as 1717, but the first unexpurgated English version, by John Payne, had to wait until 1881, and even then only 500 copies were printed. Richard Burton's popular adaptation followed, and has remained the standard English text until now, when thanks to Joseph Campbell's portable edition, the palm has been rightfully handed back to Payne.

Excepting possibly "Finnegans Wake"—to whose intentions, at least, almost anything can be ascribed—we have nothing in English, nor as far as I know in any Western literature, which can quite compare with these 264 stories. The Arthurian romances and the Nibelungenlied preserve in something of the same manner a people's wishful-thinking myths, but they lack the abounding variety of the "Arabian Nights." Actually, as Gide once suggested, the one comparable book is the Old Testament. Only there can we find the same range of subject and detail, the same pandemic focus on an entire culture, from its kings to its slaves, its economics to its housekeeping. On the other hand, we miss in the Old Testament the unique Oriental laughter, that sage capacity for taking oneself at once gravely and lightly which is the fundamental point of view in the "Arabian Nights," and which enables its stories to behold the human creature so comprehensively—juxtaposing his grandeur and his triviality, his honor and his deceit, his fears and his sex, with such truth and ease. Our European novelists have called for such a greater reality; yet how many of them have shown the mature, unlaborious grasp of man's goings-on to describe, for instance, a crucial robbery being forestalled because someone got up in the middle of the night to visit the bathroom? Life, in these stories, is seen more wholly than it has been in any of the greatest novels to come after them.

That so multifarious a book has become, as it has here in the West, chiefly synonymous with hoochy-coochy and flying carpets, is one more measure of our provinciality. For the truth is, though we make much of reading Toynbee and taking epochs for granted, we are as narrow-minded a culture as has ever existed. Our thinking presumes we are the be-all heirs of mankind's first five thousand years, but we have not begun to claim, or respect, our world heritage. India, for most of us, is still a place where a technicolor movie may be filmed to advantage and new mountain-climbing records attempted. Against this "Western megalomania" Mr. Campbell's introduction brings an intemperate indictment which, I'm afraid, it would be awkward to confute. Yet, as he also reminds us, it was by listening to these stories of the "Arabian Nights" that Scheherazade's equally arrogant king realized his self-absorption; perhaps, reading them today, we will begin to wonder at how much exists around us that is not merely peripheral to our own.

SEARCH FOR THE SPINY BABBLER. A Naturalist's Adventure in Nepal. By S. Dillon Ripley. Houghton Mifflin. $4. An entertaining travel book by a well-known ornithologist and the Associate Curator of the Peabody Museum. Mr. Ripley, who has specialized in Asiatic birds, lists among the achievements of the expedition the rediscovery of the Babbler mentioned in his title, which was previously known from a single specimen collected more than a hundred years ago. Like most scientists, he would no doubt refuse to admit that such things are the excuses rather than the real reasons for such picturesque jaunts as his, but in this book intended for the general reader birds are only incidental to a description of the excitements and adventures of travel in one of the most remote corners of the world. Mr. Ripley does a very good job of trying to make the reader understand what it is like to travel in a region where incongruous modernities coexist with almost unimaginable conditions. Members of the ruling class cannot eat in the presence of even the American Ambassador to India when he makes his annual official visit as Minister to Nepal. Nevertheless, for twenty years an Englishman has maintained an electric plant in the capital, an official automobile

THE BIDOU INHERITANCE. By Edith de Born. Norton. $3. The life and loves of a provincial French girl, daughter of a brilliantly drawn shopkeeper who is surely one of the most memorable characters in recent fiction. Strongly reminiscent not only of Gide—Mme de Born's obvious master—but also of the Flaubert of "Madame Bovary," this mature first novel has a directness and simplicity that are refreshing in themselves and should lead us to expect further good things from the author, who is trilingual and writes excellent English.

THE WAGES OF FEAR. By Georges Arnaud. Translated by Norman Dale. Farrar, Straus and Young. $3. A hair-raising story about two outcasts, one a coward and the other a hero, who volunteer for a sizable bonus to drive a truck loaded with nitroglycerine across Guatemala. The tension, deriving from the young French author's remarkably crisp and vivid narration, is dissipated by a trick ending; but this is still one of the most exciting stories of the year, and a natural for a good adventure movie.

THE DUKE OF GALLODORO. By Aubrey Menen. Scribner's. $2.75. By his earlier novels—notably by "The Prevalence of Witches"—Mr. Menen gained a considerable reputation as a witty and impudent writer. But in this leisurely story about a group of odd characters in a lazy Italian village the wit sparkles all too intermittently, and not enough happens to the people—who are out of Norman Douglas by way of Evelyn Waugh—to make things worth while.

THE BROTHERHOOD OF FEAR. By Robert Ardrey. Random House. $3. A story of hunter and hunted on an isolated primitive island controlled by a mythical police state, by the author of the memorable play and movie, "Thunder Rock." Mr. Ardrey's over-ripe and romantic prose considerably weakens the effectiveness of his otherwise classic

WHERE TO MAKE MORE MONEY AND BUILD A FUTURE

Your income depends not only upon your ability but also upon working where your special skill is most needed.

Everyone knows what happened to those lucky people who moved to Houston or Los Angeles 15-20 years ago, when these cities were just starting to boom. Jobs were easier to get, they paid better, and the first ones to arrive got ahead faster.

Anyone who opened a small business found it expanding as these cities jumped up in population. People who bought real estate saw it swelling in value. Lots of people made their fortunes, not because they were smarter than others, but because they were among the first in a city just starting to grow fast.

Norman Ford, founder of the world-famous Globe Trotters Club, journeyed up and down America to learn which towns in America are opportunity-ripe today as were Houston and Los Angeles fifteen-twenty years ago.

In his new book, Where to Find Opportunity Today, he tells you the actual names of hundreds of towns and cities where big business and the Government are investing billions of dollars in new plants, new dams and irrigation systems; where once sleepy towns are awakening as new purchasing pours in and there's a big demand for anyone with some skill or the determination to make good.

These are the towns where jobs are plentiful—and pay more—to office workers, mechanics, professional people, etc. Where you can get the kind of job you like, at the highest pay in the country for that line of work. Where you get ahead faster today as you could years ago in Houston and Los Angeles.

These are also the towns where new one-man businesses are needed as the population increases and everyone makes better wages. Norman Ford not only tells you which stores and service businesses are needed, but also where to open a dude ranch, tourist cabins, a swimming pool, even where to grow flowers for sale or which businesses State Governments will guide you in starting.

His book will help you if

- you are about to leave the armed forces, school, or college;
- you don't think you're getting ahead as fast as you should;
- you'd like to live in a better climate, with finer surroundings; near mountains, shore, forests, or river; in such wonderful places to live and work as Florida, California, the Colorado Rockies, Hawaii, etc.;
- you want to make more money today and build a future for yourself.

Five years from now don't say, "I wonder how much better off I'd be today if I had learned in 1952 where opportunity was on the march." Today, send for Norman Ford's Where to Find Opportunity Today.

Price only $1.00—only a fraction of what you'd spend if you tried to get as much information by traveling around the country yourself.

Money back, if not satisfied.

chase, softening the outlines of a parable of political morality that would have been better served with harsh matter-of-factness. Despite some keen insights into the totalitarian mind and a tolerably tense situation, this novel reads like an early draft of what might have been a genuinely unusual and original book.

Drama

MRS. McTHING" (Martin Beck Theater) is a "fantasie for children of all ages" by Mary Chase, the author of "Harvey." Presented by ANTA for a limited engagement, it has already settled down for an extended run, and simple decency demands that the present reviewer should confess first of all that he enjoyed every minute of it—partly because Helen Hayes gives a stunning performance in the leading role, partly also because the various contrivances which keep it going are the product of an extraordinarily ingenious talent. Unfortunately, however, this is not the whole story. Frankness requires one to add that the whole is also completely synthetic and less a "fantasie" in the dignified sense of that term than what is now commonly called "a gimmick."

The fearfully elaborate story has to do with an over-protected only child who is transported by witchcraft into the world of his dreams, where he is adopted into a mob of comic-book gangsters with whom his mother, set out in search of him, also becomes hopelessly involved. There is something doing every minute, and that something is nearly always unexpected and also nearly always amusing. Grant not only Helen Hayes's superb restrained comic performance but also two wholly delightful child actors, Brandon De Wilde and Lydia Reed, and it is difficult not to seem churlish if one refuses simply to say "Great fun" and to let it go at that. But since the piece is certain to be widely discussed and variously estimated, some reservations ought to be made.

Second thoughts are certain to suggest that a great many of the devices and methods of "Mrs. McThing" are unblushingly derivative. That the general scheme is taken directly from "Peter Pan" is almost too obvious to be mentioned, and Miss Chase's indebtedness remains embarrassingly heavy even though her whole tone is different enough from Barrie's. But the borrowings by no means stop there. The gangster-chef who prefers an imaginary piano to the frying pan and refuses to serve customers unless the sound of their names pleases his ear is a Saroyan character if I ever met one. Moreover, the three aging spinsters who call on Mrs. McThing in real life are straight out of "The Mad Woman of Chaillot." And if one asks how on earth a mixture of Barrie, Saroyan, and Giraudoux can be made to jell, the answer is simply that it can't but that what the imagination cannot unify mechanical ingenuity can assemble into a workable gadget—which is exactly what the author has succeeded in doing. Reports have it that endless tinkering has been done with the script, and the efforts of the tinkers have been unusually successful. But the triumph is a triumph of mechanical ingenuity, not of creative imagination. The best moments are like that at the end of the second act when the mother, who has so far remained outside the bewitched circle, is suddenly sucked into it by a surprising and ingenious device; the poorest are those—and there are many—when something is said or something is made to happen for no reason at all except that it promises to be momentarily diverting.

Wherever the action is controlled by the fundamental premise that the bewitched world is simply the world of a naive imagination fed on comic books, the piece maintains a consistency of tone. But a good part of the time it seems to be uncertain what its premises are or what style of unreality it is attempting to maintain. Before the mother is bewitched she seems to be conceived in terms of slightly farcical realism just inside the limits of believability. Yet when the three Mad Women enter they bring with them an entirely incongruous sort of extravagance which requires a complete readjustment of mood; and things like that happen so frequently that the spectator, giving up all hope of ever knowing for long what sort of world he is in, is compelled simply to settle down to the rather elementary pleasures of continuous novelty and surprise. It is one thing to be asked to suspend one's disbelief, but it is another never to know from one moment to the next what premises one is going to be called upon to accept.

All the actors seem to be having a wonderful time, and several besides those already mentioned make their roles amusing in themselves, even though the script fails to establish for the group much connection with any pervading style. Enid Markey's Mad Woman is hilarious though you can't image her in Miss Hayes's house, and the mobsters, headed by Jules Munshin as Poison Joe, are almost equally diverting if perhaps a little over exuberant. And as usual Helen Hayes dominates the stage without ever seeming to be aware of the fact that she is the star.

Music

B. H.

ATTACKING the widely accepted idea of the silliness of the libretto of "Cosi Fan Tutte," the great English critic W. J. Turner asks, in his book on Mozart:

How has Mozart treated this plot? That is the vital question. Has he written for it charming and superficial music such as would justify the interpretation of those who declare it frivolous and artificial—in the sense of being unreal . . . ? Far from it! He has written for this opera the most tender, poignant, intensely dramatic and powerful music of which he was capable. He has made every character real, pulsing with life, and has given to each one all the emotions proper to such experiences as young love, the anguish of separation, the horror of infidelity, the ruthlessness of nature, the unexpectedness of one's own natural behavior, the tortures of jealousy, and the differences in human characters even when fundamentally they are subject to the same iron laws of nature. In short, "Cosi Fan Tutte" is a tragi-comedy and the most profound and terrifying work of its kind that has ever been written.

From this I think it possible to guess what Turner would have thought of the performance of "Cosi" that I attended at the Metropolitan. A man for whom the music was the key to the nature of the work would, I think, have regarded what happened to the music as the touchstone of the quality of the performance. That means, for one thing, how the music was sung and played; and while I cannot know for certain what Turner would have thought, it is possible that he too would have been disturbed by the lack of sensuous warmth and ease in Tucker's singing, but would have found Guarrera, Thebom, Munsel, and Alvary and the orchestra under Erede acceptable, and would have felt that the musical performance reached greatness in the lustrous beauty and grandeur of style of Steber's singing. But what happened to the music would, I think, have been for Turner more than just how it was sung and played: his conviction of the central importance of the music would have led him to object to anything which drew the listener's attention away from it; and his conviction about its meaning would have led him to object to anything which falsified it. I am sure, therefore, that he would have objected to a performance which had the listener straining to hear the English words and as a result not hearing the music they were being sung to (a writer I know who had heard one of the performances remarked: "There was this wonderful music; and you found yourself missing it because you were trying to hear the words—those silly words of the translation."). And I am sure Turner would have objected to a performance which had the singers clowning for laughs during some of the passages of tender, poignant music—a performance, that is, which changed profound tragi-comedy to trivial farce.

This falsification was the predictable result of the initial decision to use English. The English words were to make the comedy intelligible; this, as always, led to the use of English words—e. g., present-day colloquialisms—to make the comedy funnier; then the words weren't funny enough and clowning was added.

Which is to say that the lapse of taste was the predictable result of the lapse of intelligence. I remarked last year on the fact that Mr. Bing, who in so many instances had thought his own way to new decisions with his own keen intelligence and judgment for the purpose, seemed to have accepted the contentions of the opera-in-English cult without any thought of how they were contradicted by the realities of the situation. The contentions are that the audience must get its knowledge of what an opera is about directly from the performance without preliminary reading of a libretto, that in the particular case of a Mozart comedy the audience must be able to follow the words in which the humorous points are made, that for these purposes English must be used in a performance for an American audience as German is used for the audience in Vienna, and that if it isn't used the public won't come to hear the opera. But actually in a theater the size of the Metropolitan the audience can't hear enough of the English words to get the knowledge its needs directly and solely from the performance, but has to read a libretto before the performance in English just as the Viennese reads one before the performance in German; and since advance reading has to be done it should be done for a performance in Italian which has these advantages: that the words fit Mozart's music perfectly and add their delightful sound to it; and that the following of the play is then not a straining to discover what one doesn't know but an easy recognition of what one already knows, which doesn't distract one's attention from the music. Actually, too, for many years the performances of "Don Giovanni" and "Figaro" in Italian have filled the Metropolitan with people who have known enough about what was happening on the stage to smile, laugh, and applaud enthusiastically, providing no justification for Mr. Bing to fear that "Così" in Italian would keep the public away or cause it to sit stony-faced and silent. And actually the Metropolitan has begun to give Mozart's operas in English after the Vienna Opera has begun to give them in Italian.

One notable feature of the performance remains to be mentioned—the fact that Alfred Lunt's direction prescribed the singers' every movement, gesture, and position. What he prescribed in this particular opera could be objected to; but the method is the correct one for opera, and his use of it in "Così" is an innovation of the highest value that should be made permanent at the Metropolitan.

Less Light in Darkest Africa

Dear Sirs: I was sorry to see no report in the press of the unexpected and almost simultaneous disappearance of the last two liberal and progressive journals in South Africa, the weekly Forum and the monthly Common Sense. Both journals, one thirteen years old and the other twelve, pleaded financial hardship. But in the light of its past attitude toward the press it would be interesting to know what part, if any, the Nationalist government played in the suspension of the two periodicals.

The Nationalist government is hardly a disinterested party where the freedom of the press is concerned. It was the considered opinion of the Rand Daily Mail that "from the day they took office it has been obvious that the Nationalists would sooner or later have to try to control the press," because "a free press is a perpetual menace to them."

Not long ago an attempt was made to suborn civil liberty by striking at the Guardian. The Cape Times foresaw a state of affairs in South Africa without precedent in the West, "the closing down of a newspaper by governmental edict, with the say of the courts of law categorically excluded." The Guardian's editor, B. P. Bunting, reported in London recently that his magazine's circulation had suffered from the government's hostility because people were afraid to be seen reading or selling it. It is hard to avoid the conclusion that the same circumstances helped to force the Forum and Common Sense off the stands.

The British Pull Out

Dear Sirs: On visiting the port of Massawa in Ethiopia recently I was horrified to discover that the British authorities were systematically destroying all the buildings in the city. The buildings already wholly or largely destroyed or totally dismantled include the arsenal and the cement works, many of the offices of the Port Authority, and the buildings used to house the Port Authority personnel. Slated for immediate destruction are other offices and dwellings and the oil containers used for refueling ships, cars, etc. The large cranes used in loading and unloading the ships have been removed.

It is evident that if the destruction continues, the Ethiopian government, when the port is turned over to it, will find nothing but sand, a few trees, and some poor huts. It would cost millions to replace what has been wantonly destroyed.

I wish to place on record the fact that many months ago the International Ethiopian Council for Study and Report was informed that the British authorities in Eritrea were dismantling industrial plants and buildings there. A parliamentary question was asked on the point by Mr. Peter Freeman, M. P., chairman of the council. In reply, His Majesty's government stated that the only buildings demolished were unsafe or useless, and that no further destruction would take place.

The destruction at Massawa has gone far, and I fear it will go still farther if no protest is made. Do the British authorities intend to destroy the railway which brings fuel from the containers to the wharf and serves other purposes essential to the functioning of the port? Do they intend to demolish the causeway leading from the mainland to the port, and also the wharves? Is similar destruction in progress at Assab?

The dismantling and destruction of a port which the United Nations General Assembly decided should be restored to Ethiopia is an affront to the United Nations and a gross injury to a gallant ally who came to England's aid in 1940.

A Message to Readers of The Nation

Six months ago, without fanfare, a new publication was born.

It was an unusual publication for these times.

It promised to print the many stories and articles that most newspapers and magazines dare not publish because they might bring forth pressure group reprisals or advertising cancellations.

In short, it promised to dig out and publish "inside stories" which would have no other possible way to reach the American people.

The name of the publication is

EXPOSÉ

Said our statement of policy:

"... Exposé will do battle with frauds, whether they be people or products. Exposé will fight bigotry. It will spotlight all who would destroy our freedoms—whether they be Communists or the '1000% Americans' who would adopt Communist methods in their pretended fight against Communism.

"And yet, Exposé will have no axe to grind. We will print only the honest factual material which is exclusive because no one else dares to print it."

Exposé is independent and liberal, as the great majority of the American people are independent and liberal.

Six issues have appeared.

They have met with tremendous enthusiasm.

Exposé is daring... during these times which call for daring.

It is in the tradition of a free and fearless press which dares to probe everywhere.

Exposé accomplishes things.

Here are a few of the hundreds of exciting stories and articles that have already appeared in Exposé:

• THE PRESCRIPTION RACKET

by Edmund Dickson

• RELIGION AND THE PRESS

• THE TRUTH ABOUT WINCHELL

—the original exposé that inspired the New York Post series

• JOE McCARTHY'S SELF-PROMOTION COSTS U. S. TAXPAYERS

• LIFE INSURANCE: THE MOST FOR YOUR MONEY

by Sidney Margolius

• GENERAL ELECTRIC DEALS IN BLACK MARKET

• ANATOMY OF THE MURDER-MYSTERY

by G. Legman

• ... extracts from THOMAS PAINE and ROBERT G. INGERSOLL

• ... and articles by noted attorney ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS; by former PM Shopping Editor SIDNEY MARGOLIUS (a regular contributor); by BILLY ROSE; by Associate Editor of The Catholic Worker, ROBERT LUDLOW; by REP. ADAM CLAYTON POWELL. ...

IF YOU ARE NOT ALREADY A SUBSCRIBER—

Why not be sure of receiving every issue of Exposé?

Exposé will appear monthly until our subscribers number 10,000... at which time Exposé will be published twice each month.

If you act now, you may have the next 21 issues for $3.00. This will bring you almost two years of Exposé on a monthly schedule.

Dean told Dr. Conger that he was not going to recommend Wiggins for reappointment. A little later he recommended that Wiggins be dismissed on the ground of "incompetence."

THE University of Minnesota's release of Dr. Forrest O. Wiggins, instructor in philosophy, last December 12 might have gone unnoticed had Dr. Wiggins not been a radical and a Negro—the first Negro, in fact, to receive an appointment to a state school in Minnesota. For these reasons his "non-reappointment," the term used by the university, touched off a statewide reaction and has since attracted national attention.

St. Paul and Minneapolis papers featured Dean McDiarmid's statement that in his opinion Dr. Wiggins's continuance was "not justified either on the basis of his scholarship or potential contributions to the Philosophy Department." Several legislators hailed the decision with enthusiasm. One said: "Academic freedom, of which we hear and read so much, is not to be preserved at all costs—for it has its limitations." Significantly this legislator claimed that Dr. Wiggins had been "a source of embarrassment to the university, humiliation to the citizens of the state, and confusion to the student body." No mention was made of incompetence.

The students were overwhelmingly for Wiggins. Dr. Conger issued an impressively documented statement demanding his retention. His scholarship and teaching ability were indorsed in flattering testimonials from colleagues and students. The charge that he had failed to give evidence of creative scholarship—that is, published articles in the learned journals—was challenged by reference to the fact that he had initiated six new courses in philosophy in as many years. Men like Luther Youngdahl, former Governor of Minnesota, now a federal judge, had often appeared as guest lecturer in Dr. Wiggins's courses. "On the eve of my retirement," Dr. Conger wrote, "I can sincerely say that if I can feel I have left behind me a group of students who feel a fraction of the admiration and respect for me that these students have expressed for Dr. Wiggins, I shall retire a happy man." a member of the legislature spoke in favor of Wiggins's reappointment. A spokesman for the A. F. of L. related the dismissal of Wiggins to the cuts made in the budget. The secretary of one of the state's largest C. I. O. unions also publicly supported Wiggins.

While it is true that the legislature passed other "economy" measures, one Minnesota resident has pointed out that the $200,000 cut in university funds was hardly a significant saving in a total state budget of $30,000,000. The same observer insists that the Wiggins case cannot be isolated from the legislative threat to enact a stringent loyalty-oath bill for teachers if some schools are not "cleaned up."

There seems little hope of reversing the decision against Dr. Wiggins, but the efforts in his behalf have accomplished one thing. Those who control education have been made aware that the people are becoming concerned over the inroads on academic freedom. It is no longer enough to brand a teacher a red to justify his dismissal. In fact, it is now ten or twelve days to try to determine whether how far would destroy freedom knowledge of freedom strictly the instructors discrimination against the Negro in the medical profession as reported by Robert M. Cunningham, Jr., editor of Modern Hospital magazine. "It is important to remember that the doctor and hospital engaging in discriminatory selection are often victims as well as culprits," writes the author. "It is by no means true, however, that they are helpless to do anything about eliminating discrimination. . . . There is heartening evidence that this is not the case."

THE MIDDLE GROUP OF LABOR MEMBERS OF Parliament did good service to their party last week when they hastily improvised a ladder which enabled both Mr. Attlee and Mr. Bevan to descend from their high horses. There had been a real risk of a party split when Bevan and some forty of his followers ostentatiously abstained from supporting an official Labor amendment which approved the defense program in principle but expressed no confidence in the government's ability to implement it. This was a breach of party discipline which no leader could overlook. However, Mr. Attlee's reported intention to present the rebels with an ultimatum requiring them to pledge support of majority decisions on pain of expulsion was unnecessarily provocative. So too was Bevan's public threat to take a walk if the party refused to accept his views on rearmament. It was under these circumstances that the moderates, led by such men as James Griffiths, John Strachey, and George Strauss, drafted a resolution which after censuring the Bevanites indirectly proposed the adoption of "such standing orders as will make it obligatory on all members to carry out decisions of the Parliamentary Party, taking into account the traditional conscience clause." This resolution, passed by a large majority of the Labor M. P.'s and later indorsed by the party's National Executive Committee, let the Bevanites off with a warning.

NOW THAT BEVAN, A HOT-TEMPERED MAN, has had time to cool off, he should be grateful to the moderates. Had he been forced to back up his threats, he would probably have found himself deserted by most of his followers, who are well aware that there is no future in splinter tactics. Besides, if he can curb his impatience, he will find time on his side. Already the rearmament controversy is becoming academic, for the trade crisis has given solvency priority over military security. The new budget, which Keith Hutchison analyzes on page 272, provides for a very modest increase in arms expenditure during the coming year, and it is almost certain that the original three-year program, which led to Bevan's resignation from the Labor government, will have to be stretched over four or five years. This relaxation of tempo is due to competition between defense and exports, with the imperative demands of solvency giving precedence to the latter. Britain must expand its foreign sales, and it can do so only by concentrating on products which require the same resources as armament manufacture. World markets for consumer goods have been shrinking, and now Britain's chief customers in the sterling area—Australia, New Zealand, South Africa—are imposing curbs on imports that will drastically curtail British shipments of automobiles, textiles, china, and so forth. This means a still heavier export load for the capital-goods industries, whose products remain universally in demand, reducing their ability to meet defense requirements. So Bevan has proved a sound prophet in his own country. Now, enlarging his horizon, he has called for a "third force" of Western Socialists which would hold the power balance between the United States and the Soviet Union. "Nye," it would appear, has just begun to fight.

THE SECOND ROUND IN THE "FAIR TRADE" battle is now being fought out before a subcommittee of the House Judicial Committee. The subcommittee has before it a measure to repeal the Miller-Tydings amendment to the Sherman Anti-Trust Act under which fair-trade agreements could formerly be enforced against even non-signers in the forty-five states that had approved the principle of resale price maintenance. At the same time the Interstate Commerce Commission is considering a measure which, by amending the Federal Trade Commission Act, would get around the impasse created by the Supreme Court's decision last year that fair-trade contracts—the Miller-Tydings amendment to the contrary notwithstanding—could not be enforced against non-signers. "Fair trade" is a thorny political issue, causing division between groups that normally have much in common, as, for example, small business men and small farmers. One can be sympathetic with small retailers, convinced that they need the protection of fair-trade agreements against the cutthroat competition of the "chains," without being certain that fair-trade agreements are fair to the public or will, in the long run, insure the survival of independent retailers. Nor can there be much doubt that in some areas, such as drugs, the high retail prices fostered by the agreements bear heavily on low-income consumers. "The father who

THE EXECUTION BY FIRING SQUAD OF THE five Catalonian labor leaders, carried out in spite of the protest of the International Federation of Free Trade Unions and other non-Communist organizations, has aroused a great outcry, especially in Europe and Latin America. We are not among those who cherish the hope that American or any other influence will "liberalize" the Franco regime. Franco's fascism is the real thing, and the executions in Barcelona are only a continuation of twelve years of repression and terror. Nevertheless, we are profoundly shocked that Secretary Acheson in last week's press conference used all his persuasive eloquence to explain the benefits expected to flow from the dispatch to Spain of a new military mission and did not once mention the coming executions, already announced. If he was deceived by the lies of Franco propaganda into believing that the condemned leaders were Communists or "vulgar criminals," he should inform himself about the coming trials of additional groups of union men in Barcelona and in the Basque town of Vitoria. Particularly in the latter case it would have been utterly impossible to accuse Catholics and nationalist Basques. The charge against them is that they helped organize and lead the strikes last spring—this and nothing else. We are glad to note that a meeting of protest will be held on March 25 at Freedom House in New York, with Norman Thomas, Roger Baldwin, and others speaking.

BY A VOTE OF FIVE TO FOUR THE SUPREME Court last week upheld the right of the Attorney General to deny bail to alien residents who face deportation under the McCarran act. What this means is that in the war against Communists we have speeded up "justice" to the point where we are jailing people even before we try to find out whether or not they are guilty of anything. In passing, we might contrast this treatment with the leisurely justice meted out to another kind of resident alien—first-class aliens, so to speak—such as appeared as witnesses last year before the Kefauver committee. These included assorted thugs, goons, gangsters, and racketeers, all with police records as long as your arm, who never seem to be deported and who continue to enjoy all constitutional rights, including that of bail. Justice Black, one of the four who dissented from last week's decision, declared: "The denial of a right to bail under the circumstances . . . strikes me as a shocking disregard of the following provision of the Bill of Rights: Eighth Amendment's ban against excessive bail; First Amendment's ban against abridgment of thought, speech, and press; Fifth Amendment's ban against depriving a person of liberty without due process of law." The Senator from Nevada has certainly thrown a rotten apple into our barrel of civil rights.

IT IS SAFE TO PREDICT EVEN AT THIS EARLY stage that Washington will find reason to accept General Batista's coup d'état and recognize his regime. Our ideas of what constitutes a free nation and a legally established government have become mighty flexible these days, and, besides, Cuba's new Premier and "Chief of the Revolution" took the precaution, immediately after seizing power, of promising to honor all international agreements and back up the United States in case of war with Russia. As coups go, the Batista affair was, in truth, almost a model—accomplished with exemplary speed, deftness, and a minimum of turbulence. The two persons killed, the General carefully pointed out, were members of President Prio Socanes's palace guard. "The only blood that will be spilled," he said, "will be that of those who oppose us." What could be more reasonable? Even the carnival processions, the famous comparsas that run through Lent in Havana, were interrupted for barely three days. Opposition leaders and members of the deposed government were given guaranties of personal safety or safe conduct out of the country if they chose to leave; President Prio departed for Mexico City without even formally relinquishing his office. From this place of refuge he has promised to come back and restore a constitutional regime—when or how not specified.

A GOOD MANY CONGRESSMEN WHO LOVE TO roll juicy government scandals on the tongue seem to take strangely little interest in measures to promote cleaner government. Thus the President's plan for reorganizing the Bureau of Internal Revenue and putting virtually all its top officers under civil service quickly ran into trouble on the Hill, with many of the Administration's sharpest critics in both parties showing themselves indifferent or hostile. However, thanks to three young liberal Senators—Humphrey of Minnesota, Monroney of Oklahoma, and Moody of Michigan—the plan has won the approval of the Senate and will go into effect immediately. The opposition was made up in nearly equal parts of Southern Democrats and right-wing Republicans, whose spokesmen claimed that the reorganization plan was camouflage and that the President already had all the power he needed to eliminate corruption. Against these arguments the liberal champions urged the necessity for ending "a discreditable political patronage system" and challenged those "who talk corruption to vote against it." When the showdown came they won handsomely. Among the minority we note such names as George and Russell of Georgia, Eastland of Mississippi, Capehart of Indiana, Nixon of California, and, of course, McCarthy of Wisconsin.

Russia's Latest Offer

NO DOUBT there is an element of propaganda in the Kremlin's new draft of a German treaty. Nevertheless, it is worth noting that the Soviet proposal delivered to the United States, Britain, and France on March 10 was not only unrhettorical and business-like in tone, but more realistic in content than previous missives from Moscow on this subject. At long last we have what may prove to be a serious offer, and we agree with the London Times that "the Western powers can hardly afford to dismiss it out of hand."

In a way this Soviet note can be regarded as a tribute to the progress that NATO has been making. It arrived soon after negotiations started at Bonn for the implementation of agreements reached at Lisbon for German participation in a European army and for restoration of West German sovereignty. It followed immediately on elections in southwest Germany in which the Socialists, campaigning on an anti-rearmament platform, made important gains but failed to defeat Chancellor Adenauer's Christian Democratic Party. Thus Moscow finds itself facing the disagreeable fact of the integration of West Germany into the Atlantic partnership.

"Some Western observers," writes Joseph Newman in a London dispatch to the New York Herald Tribune of March 16, "have been convinced that the Russians would come forward with a serious proposal when Western unity and strength had reached the point which made it necessary for them to do so if only in their own interests. . . . The point at which the Russians might seriously propose a settlement on Germany was expected to arrive when they consider it to their advantage to surrender the eastern part of Germany, which they occupy, in exchange for renunciation of western Germany by the Big Three Western powers."

What is no doubt from the Russians' point of view the key clause of their draft treaty is a German pledge not to enter into an alliance against any power which took part in the war. Other provisions include reunion of the two Germanys, guaranties of a democratic regime with full political and civil rights for all, no limitations on the national economy, armed forces for self-defense with a limited war industry, and frontiers as determined by the Potsdam conference, where, in fact, no definitive decision on frontiers was reached.

Negotiation of the treaty, the note declares, must be concluded with the participation of Germany, represented by an all-German government. But how is such a government to be organized except as the result of free elections? This is the crucial question and the one that the Western powers obviously intend to press as a test of Soviet sincerity. If the Russians are now prepared to allow genuinely free all-German elections under United Nations supervision—a plan at which they have balked hitherto—then a new situation has arisen. For since no one doubts that such an election would result in an overwhelming anti-Communist vote, it would mean that Russia is prepared to abandon its puppet government in East Germany and to make its first European retreat. That would be a great moral victory for the West even though the price paid for it was exclusion of Germany from the Western defense organization.

With so much at stake every effort ought to be made to probe Russian intentions in an effort to discover whether this démarche does offer hope of a mutually profitable deal. Perhaps a clue will be provided by the Soviet response to Allied proposals for an Austrian treaty, which embody agreements previously reached except in one particular—the disposal of the so-called German assets in Austria. Up to now, using Nazi seizures of Austrian resources as an excuse, the Russians have insisted on controlling Austria's oil fields, river shipping, and other valuable properties. Their abandonment of this claim, which is untenable legally and morally, would be a sign that they really wished to reach the kind of understanding with the West that would make possible the neutralization of Germany.

The Strange Case of General Grow

PERHAPS the most embarrassing thing about the publication of excerpts from General Robert W. Grow's diary was that they appeared just when the State Department was busy marking out bounds to curb the travels of Soviet diplomats in this country. The restrictions are an answer to the much tighter ones imposed on Americans in Russia; so technically they may have nothing to do with the behavior of a former military attaché in Moscow. But logically they have a lot to do with it. We are ready to admit that spying is a common avocation among foreign service employees. That it can also be a serious business, both the famous Russian espionage trial in Canada and the more recent case of Gubichev in the United States offers sufficient proof. Naturally it has to be guarded against, here as in Russia, and punished when detected.

But these truisms only point up the awkward implications of the case of General Grow. For the General, according to the scattered excerpts cabled over from Germany, noted down railroad bridges he considered good targets, license numbers of military vehicles, anti-aircraft artillery and other military installations suitable for bombing. In February and March, 1951, he was clamoring for immediate war. ("War! As soon as possible! Now." "We need a voice to lead us without equivocation: Communism must be destroyed!") He also had his ideas about tactics. ("We must start by hitting below the belt. This war cannot be conducted according to Marquis of Queensbury rules." "Anything, truth or falsehood, to poison the thoughts of the population.") Eventually we hope, the whole diary will trickle out through the East German or Soviet press. Meanwhile we know enough to say that the spying and warmongering of General Grow were not only a rich gift to Soviet propaganda; they provided a legitimate reason for restricting the movements of American diplomats, persuasive evidence that they are there to ferret out military secrets. It will take more than the recall of the General to undo the effect of his candid record of thoughts and acts.

What is needed is proof that the words of General Grow do not in the smallest degree represent the policy of the American government. So far the comments of the press and official Washington have been little more than expressions of annoyance over the naivete and carelessness of an official. In our view the Administration is far more to blame for the harm the incident has done than is the bellicose Grow himself. Either out of conceit and a sense of superiority or out of a mistaken wish to "save face" Washington has time and again failed to take measures which would wipe out the evil results of major official blunders. A much more serious incident was the Matthews speech in 1950 advocating a preventive war. For this monstrous provocation the Secretary of the Navy was gently rebuked, but he was not dismissed. As a consequence the whole incident was left in mid-air, and foreign observers were totally mystified. Could a member of the government actually make such a statement and still keep his post if the Administration's policy was a contrary one?

By way of contrast with the treatment of General Grow, consider the case of Oliver Edmund Clubb, recently cleared as a security risk by Secretary Acheson. The main count against Mr. Clubb was a diary which he, like Grow, had carelessly left about. It contained no such explosive matter as Grow's book, and it showed beyond honest doubt that Clubb was a loyal and devoted foreign-service officer. His fault was at worst a minor indiscretion. But Clubb's career was wrecked by the China Lobby and its henchmen in Congress. He resigned from the department the other day as soon as he was cleared. When the Grow diary was discovered its author was transferred to Washington and reassigned to the Pentagon. No doubt somebody there will pick up after him, so no more papers will stray into hostile hands. But what business has General Grow in the Pentagon? Government workers are being fired for talking to the wrong people or reading the wrong magazines. Grow should be fired as the most extreme security risk one can imagine—for thinking and saying and acting on the belief that we should start a war against Russia. He should be fired as a warning to fellow warmongers and a declaration to the world that when Mr. Truman and Mr. Acheson say we are working for peace they really mean it.

United Nations or NATO?

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

United Nations, March 14

A CLEVER diplomat like Lester Pearson, Canadian Secretary for External Affairs, realized at once how deplorable could be the consequences of the report that he had called the Atlantic Pact "the principal instrument for the defense of the free world," supplanting the United Nations as the main hope for peace. A few days afterward in New York he seized the first opportunity to deny that he had ever said such a thing. Other persons in high places have been less cautious. In the fourth of a series of articles currently appearing in the New York Herald Tribune under the title Eisenhower's Creed, Kevin McCann reports that the victor in the nation's first Presidential primary, writing to a long-time associate, had "made it very clear that in the absence of an effective United Nations as a vehicle for our foreign policy, he was pinning his hopes on the success of NATO." At the time he wrote this, General Eisenhower was not only the military head of the Atlantic coalition but in the view of many of his countrymen the next President of the United States. His position on the question of NATO versus the U. N. was therefore of the greatest importance.

Since the General is not a man who draws arbitrary or superficial conclusions, he gave the reasons for his views. "Our efforts in the United Nations," he said—Mr. McCann now quotes him directly—"have been defeated by vetoes of hostile groups, but in the Atlantic Pact we are not pledged by the hostile groups and are simply trying to work out a way that free countries may band together to protect themselves." This at least has the virtue of frankness. It is echoed by dozens of persons influential in international affairs and even by some who play leading roles in the United Nations—while speaking of it with a strange mixture of cynicism and resignation. Though lip-service is still paid to the "supreme international organization," we are in the presence of an attempt to replace the U. N., for all practical purposes, with NATO. The attempt should be exposed for the sake of the millions of people here and abroad who still take seriously the democratic slogans enunciated during the war and have therefore steadfastly supported the U. N. since San Francisco.

I have frequently criticized the work of the U. N. in these columns. But with all its faults and failures it is an organization for peace and should be protected against the encroachments of NATO, which may have purely "defensive" aims but is nevertheless a political-military alliance created for and geared to war. Perhaps I feel so strongly about the U. N. because I witnessed the collapse of the first attempt to establish a world organization. Reading recently the fine two-volume "History of the League of Nations" by F. P. Walters, one of the most distinguished members of the Geneva secretariat, I relived that tragic period. As a member of the Council I had struggled desperately to have international law applied in Spain; I had fought to keep the League from being destroyed by the Fifth Column which lurked within it even after the departure of Italy and Germany. Fifteen years later I find another Fifth Column in the U. N., the elements who prefer NATO, although they insist that they are working only for harmony and that both organizations serve the same ideal.

Paralleling the statements of high officials, a series of extremely illuminating comments have appeared in the American press. The financial weekly, Barron's, remarked on March 3 with startling frankness: "The Atlantic alliance, originally promoted as a mere 'regional agreement' under the U. N. Charter, is building into another strictly non-Communist League of Nations, which with the current addition of Greece and Turkey is not too strictly confined to the North Atlantic area." On March 9 Michael L. Hoffman said in a dispatch from Geneva to the New York Times: "Established in Paris near General Eisenhower's headquarters, NATO's permanent international secretariat will automatically eclipse in prestige and in attractiveness to ambitious civil servants the older and more tired international organizations that are relics of earlier efforts to group nations together for work in the common cause." Other commentators point out that it will be wonderful to have an organization like NATO, free of the incessant and fruitless discussions that go on in the U. N. They rejoice that through NATO the United States can carry out its mission of awakening the free world without embarrassment, even though the free world is not too pleased to be awakened to new economic crises, higher taxes, and the terrors of "bankruptcy"—to use the Tories' own word.

Barron's is equally outspoken about the principal reason why NATO should be preferred to the U. N.: "As the leading exponent of free enterprise and as the source of the major physical strength of NATO, the United States has both a moral and a material case for assuming the lion's share in the direction of its policies." The United States delegation has seen its authority threatened in the last two sessions of the Assembly, especially in last winter's session in the Palais de Chaillot, by the revolt of the small powers, but American leadership of NATO will not be challenged. At Lisbon, Secretary of State Acheson was able to gain acceptance of German rearmament and settle other thorny issues thanks partly to his own exceptional ability and partly to the absence of any real opposition to Washington policy.

In NATO, its enthusiasts say, we shall not be plagued by the veto. In the current effort to discredit the U. N. and promote NATO all the old objections to that device are being brought up. The famous Nyet of the Russians is cited by people prone to oversimplification as the chief cause of U. N. failure. But if anybody wants to know what is really the matter with the U. N., he should read "The United Nations and Power Politics," by John MacLaurin. The reader must decide for himself, Mr. MacLaurin says, "how to distribute the blame for the Council failures between the Big Five and above all between the Big Two"; and then he gives a quantity of factual data to help the reader to decide. "We should, however," he continues, "all be able to agree that the heavily popularized notion that it is the veto that has rendered the Security Council ineffective is not in accord with the facts. The trouble lies deeper."

Without denying the damage done by Russia's excessive use of the veto and its withdrawal from various agencies, including, in critical moments, the Security Council itself, I agree that the trouble lies deeper. It lies in the refusal to seek a rapprochement, in the theory that you cannot talk with the Russians, not today or tomorrow, and that any new Russian move—like the recent request for Big Four discussions on a German treaty—is only propaganda. Russian proposals are not thought worth a moment's consideration by those who are ready now to abandon the U. N.'s fundamental purpose—peace through diplomacy.

From the moment it was born NATO was a dangerous rival to the U. N. It should not have been, for though there are clever people in all the delegations who can read the Charter in a dozen different ways, Article 103 says very clearly: "In the event of a conflict between the obligations of the members of the United Nations under the present Charter and their obligations under any other international agreement, their obligations under the present Charter shall prevail." The spirit of the Atlantic Pact from the beginning was irreconcilable with the spirit of the United Nations. Moreover, as the international situation worsened and as NATO appeared fatally destined to depend on a rearmed Germany as one of its principal props, the two organizations became inevitably the symbols of two opposing policies. The U. N.'s goal was still to resolve the issues dividing the two blocs: NATO's was to forge a weapon that could be used when the U. N. broke down.

Taking a broad view, Secretary Acheson did not feel his sincerity challenged by giving loyalty to both the U. N. and NATO. The duality could be resolved simply by introducing into the U. N. the policy of containment which was NATO's raison d'être. But there is no doubt, to judge by what happened in the last Assembly, that unless we see a diminution of present East-West tension, the U. N. will have less and less important functions to perform, while NATO will deal with all the issues generated by the cold war.

In the words of Barron's, NATO "is developing into something bigger than its original conception." It has just selected a secretary general. The importance of the new post is indicated by the appointment of Lord Ismay, a British soldier of great ability and experience and a close associate of Churchill. In the measure that the U. N. permits such important questions as Korea, German rearmament, Arab nationalism, and the "conclusion of outstanding peace settlements"—to quote a 1948 resolution—to be taken out of its hands, NATO will develop still further. If in 1952 the U. N. was unable to retain its prerogatives, two years from now NATO will certainly have the last word.

By that time its secretariat will be more influential than the U. N.'s. It will have big funds at its disposal. It will be backed by a coherent policy. Although there will be differences such as arose at Lisbon, they will not take the sharp form in which they have emerged in the U. N. as the result of the relatively free play of diplomatic debate. NATO is planning an economic section for defense which will compete with the U. N. Economic and Social Council; dreams about Point Four aid for backward countries will be transformed into strict security programs. It will have a press and information section. In fact, it is branching out into so many fields that in a few years the work of the U. N. may well be reduced largely to that of its specialized agencies.

But overlapping and competition with the U. N. are not the most serious aspects of NATO's expansion. If men of the stature of General Eisenhower prefer NATO, they may cease to make any use of the U. N. to deal with the issues causing the present international tension. In that event not only Trygve Lie and his staff of three thousand but the whole idea of negotiation will go by the board. In the absence of machinery for conversations the two blocs will go on arming, in 1952, in 1953, and in 1954—the last, in the opinion of most American planners, being the crucial year. Under these circumstances the Western coalition will be able to further its policies only by military means, while Russia can always combine military with political methods—its continuing peace crusade, its repeated requests for a conference of the Big Four, its economic conference, its demand for the unification of Germany, other proposals. Thus it is to the interest of the West as well as of peace to prevent a shift of power which will destroy the U. N. as the League of Nations was destroyed—by preventing its effective intervention in decisive questions and undermining its authority.

New Hampshire Reviewed

BY JOHN P. MALLAN

Manchester, New Hampshire

TENS of thousands of words have been expended since the New Hampshire primaries in attempts to show (1) that voting in this tiny state foreshadows national trends, (2) that it does not. Whether New Hampshire is actually a trustworthy barometer will not be certain for some months, but in any case the same factors were at work here that we may expect to operate elsewhere in the nation. The people are much the same—business men, farmers, organization politicians, industrial workers—and they were subjected to much the same combination of issues and personal appeals as is used in all political campaigning.

Interest among New Hampshire's voters was at a high, and they were very conscious that the nation's attention was on them; the turnout was the largest in history in spite of blinding rain and snowstorms throughout the state. The widely publicized visits of so many national leaders and the peculiar nature of the state's journalism also helped to focus attention, as did the town meetings in practically all small communities.

In New Hampshire as elsewhere the startling defeat of President Truman has received the most attention. While the lack of real Truman organization was a factor, it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that his defeat—the loss of all the large cities as well as most towns and the victory of the obscure Kefauver delegates over the party's entire state leadership—was the result of spontaneous dissatisfaction with the President's leadership. This dissatisfaction, which was really not well exploited by Kefauver, reflects not so much disagreement on domestic or foreign issues as a simple feeling that the Administration is tired and should be replaced with new blood. Corruption played some part as an issue but not very much, and it is safe to say that most of those Democrats will vote for Truman in the fall if he is the Democratic nominee. But plainly, they would prefer not to.

Despite journalistic reports to the contrary, the New Hampshire Democratic leadership is scarcely a "machine." There is no one in the party who can place a few calls and turn out the wards, as was shown so well on March 11. The party itself exhibits a rather interesting contrast of idealism and party regularity; it is perhaps the only state organization in the country which has been headed successively by two college professors. Both are from Dartmouth—Herbert Hill, the gubernatorial candidate in 1948, and Dayton McKean, an able political-science teacher who has also been active in New Jersey politics, where he wrote the classic treatise on Boss Hague.

Party leadership on the state level is generally of high quality; perhaps it can afford to be, since the party has held no important office for twenty years. In the mill cities, both leadership and interest in larger issues are usually lacking. A solid clan of French-Canadian politicians hold many city positions, playing a role somewhat like that of the Irish in Massachusetts. But anti-French sentiment among Protestant Yankees and Irish Catholics alike, in a state now one-fourth French, is so great as to be almost the equivalent of anti-Semitism. No French leader has yet been able to break through it and attain state power, not even Paris-educated Mayor Benoit of Manchester.

Ironically, both the state "idealists" and the city "regular" leaders were pledged to Truman; they were reasonably well satisfied with him and almost unaware of

Not So Fast, Mr. Taft

THE hail-fellow-well-met-I'd-like-to-have-you-vote-for-me campaign fitted Kefauver. He loved it, and so did the voters. But it was not Taft's meat. He was uncomfortable, and showed it. . . .

One bit of presumption on the part of Taft's managers paid off in ill-will.

"Hear your next President!" the loudspeakers blared in announcing his street meetings.

More than once the irritation of the voters found expression: "Says who?" or "That's for us to say" or "Since when?"—Journal-Transcript, Franklin, New York.

other candidates. Only at the last minute, as they began organizing in response to Kefauver's highly successful stump tour, did they realize the great undercurrent of Democratic dislike for the President. Kefauver was supported by no one group of Democrats; he did almost equally well in rural areas and in the cities, among union and non-union members, in every ethnic group. Even the supposedly solid French shifted to him in as large numbers as any other group, and he carried most of the French wards in Manchester and Nashua. His very limited organization had only one formal headquarters and little money, most of his delegates were completely unknown, and only one or two prominent Democrats came out for him in the whole state. Yet his delegate slate, though scattered over a long and complicated ballot, defeated every party leader, including Kelley, Hill, McKean, and the mayors and ex-mayors of most of New Hampshire's leading cities.

It is rather unfortunate, in one sense at least, that the able and New Deal-minded state leadership has been defeated by men who cannot really be called "new blood"; in a crowd the Kefauver men would be indistinguishable from other Democrats. However, the regulars are not unfriendly to Kefauver and would join him if released by Truman; they are particularly happy that Kefauver has not attacked Truman in his speeches. The mysterious undercover campaign for Adlai Stevenson has made little headway in New England, where he is not known to one Democrat in fifty; there is a general feeling that Truman will have to produce him quickly, if at all, if he is to win support among either rank and file or leaders.

THE Republican primary results are a little less decisive than the Democratic; a sense of frustration is found in both Eisenhower and Taft ranks. Originally, the Eisenhower people had expected an easy victory, and they were genuinely alarmed at Taft's apparent gains in the last weeks of campaigning. His personal appeals in rural areas won many converts, as did his savage attacks on Acheson and Administration foreign policy. A Cheshire Cat photograph of Taft showing him grinning from ear to ear was used widely, and like a plain but determined woman he seemed to become more personally attractive each time one saw him. By primary day his supporters and many independent observers were quite certain he would get four to six of the fourteen Republican delegates and possibly a majority of them. Few of the seventy visiting reporters in Manchester were much surprised when he took an early lead, and his victory in all but two wards of Manchester, supposedly an Ike stronghold, was thought the clincher.

But Taft lost the other major cities and, to everyone's astonishment, many of the small towns. He was defeated by more than 10,000 votes, the New Hampshire electorate, contrary to universal expectations, carefully voting in every Ike delegate on a ballot more complicated than that used by the Democrats. The small-town defeat hit the Taft forces hard, and there is still no intelligible explanation for it.

The Republican Party has been left sadly divided; the campaigns became bitter in the last few days as Governor Sherman Adams, Eisenhower leader, charged that Stalin was hoping for a Taft victory and that this would in effect bring the Russian armies to the Canadian border. The Taftites attacked Eisenhower's alleged New Deal connections so vigorously that Representative Walter Judd of Minnesota, one of the Eisenhower traveling circus imported into the state, resurrected the old Bricker cry of "Taft socialism," maintaining that Taft's support of federal aid to education made him far more a New Dealer than Ike, who was the real conservatives' candidate—a statement that may well be true.

It is significant that both sides found it necessary to appeal to Republican Old Guardism. The primary in many ways was a continuation of the bitter feud begun in 1950 in the Senatorial fight between Charles Tobey and Wesley Powell. Powell, who spearheaded the Taft drive, was formerly Senator Styles Bridges's secretary and is still in close touch with Bridges, who cosily took no part in the Ike-Taft fight. Powell is perhaps best described as a reactionary mediocrity; alone among Taft leaders he really favored the tactics of the powerful but almost childishly right-wing William Loeb, publisher of the Manchester Union-Leader, the only newspaper with state-wide circulation and indeed the only paper read in most rural areas.

Loeb's newspapers are a striking study in personal journalism. He came to Manchester a few years ago from Vermont, where he owns a similar paper, bought the stodgily conservative Union-Leader from the family of former Secretary of the Navy Frank Knox, and at once converted it into a vehicle for a kind of front-page editorial journalism reminiscent of Hearst's youth. He is hated not only by all the "respectable" and liberal-minded Republicans in the state but by most of the Taft forces as well, who feel that the violence of his attacks on Eisenhower helped to defeat Taft, just as similar attacks on Senator Tobey defeated Loeb's candidate, Powell, by a thousand votes two years ago.

Loeb is national chairman of Alfred Kohlberg's American China Policy Association, and has had a hand in many China Lobby activities. McCarthy and MacArthur are among his heroes; McCarthy was the guest of honor at a recent Loeb banquet, and Loeb, like many a New Hampshire conservative, would almost certainly prefer MacArthur to Taft if the General became available. Truman, Acheson, Tobey, and "the dirty, stinking Yalta crowd" in the State Department are frequent targets for his invective; but lately his best barbs have been reserved for Eisenhower. "International Bankers Up to Old Tricks; the Eisenhower Plot Unfolds," began a recent story, spread across the entire front page, on the theme that the same "Wall Street international bankers" and utility magnates who chose Willkie and Dewey are behind Eisenhower. A more personal attack on the General followed the next day: Eisenhower "doesn't understand" the Communist conspiracy; "he pulled back American troops in Germany to let the Russians advance."

Through most of the campaign Loeb's front-page

signed editorials attacking Governor Adams and Eisenhower alternated with front-page ads attacking Loeb inserted by Adams. The resulting confusing and strident mélange alienated many voters but lent credence to the betrayal-in-government thesis which is the chief stock in trade of the Taft-McCarthy forces. The frightening thing is not so much that Taft lost as that a large number of voters in city and town alike consciously chose him as the more conservative candidate, as they had chosen Powell over Tobey in 1950. It is a campaign myth that only "professional politicians" preferred Taft; almost half the state's Republicans honestly voted to end the New Deal foreign and domestic policies they have refused to accept for twenty years.

The New Hampshire primary was conclusively a victory for Kefauver over Truman; it was less conclusively a defeat for Taft, and the Eisenhower forces are well aware of this. Undoubtedly all the groups in both parties, including the now thoroughly repudiated but still hyper-ambitious Harold Stassen, will take the primary seriously. One fact may be profitably noted: neither the nation's press nor many of the state's politicians had any really good idea what would happen in New Hampshire. Almost all the prophets were wrong, and this should be kept in mind in analyzing their future predictions.

Wisconsin Previewed

Ashland, Wisconsin

IN A junket through Wisconsin, with stops in Madison, Eau Claire, Menominee, Beloit, Superior, River Falls, Appleton (Joe McCarthy's home town), and Ashland, I have found most people pretty thoroughly convinced that the Republican nomination will be decided in the Wisconsin primary on April 1. Wisconsin voters have not forgotten that Wendell Willkie made the big gamble here in 1944 and lost—after his loyal floor leader in the 1940 convention, Harold Stassen, entered the fight against him at the last moment.

In the battle shaping up many feints have been made, promising a real April Fool's primary. The situation is complicated by a tricky primary law which provides that candidates cannot be entered unless they "affirmatively assent." This provision made it impossible to enter Eisenhower, since the General could not give his affirmative assent without violating army regulations. In consequence, the Eisenhower people tried to unite on a favorite son, such as Governor Walter Kohler, former Governor Oscar Rennebohm, or the veteran Republican leader Fred Zimmerman, but their efforts failed. Indeed, it looked as though Taft would be a shoo-in in Wisconsin until Governor Earl Warren entered the race.

Now that the deadline for filing has passed, the Republican contest appears to be a three-cornered Taft-Stassen-Warren affair in which there will be little debating but a lot of nasty in-fighting. Taft is the type that swings wild and usually misses but occasionally lands a haymaker; Stassen is the skilful boxer who keeps out of range; Warren is the slow mover who likes to wear down his opponents. With a big grin on his face Earl appears to be smothering his opponents with kindness when he is really cracking their ribs in a clinch.

Stassen's chances are least impressive. With the backing of Thomas E. Coleman, the state's most powerful Republican leader, Stassen managed to win twenty-seven of the thirty Republican delegates in 1948. But Coleman is now one of Taft's delegates and his manager here. Stassen's new slate is largely made up of nobodies; it contains only two of the delegates he lined up in 1948. Governor Walter Kohler was for Stassen in 1948; he prefers Eisenhower today. Stassen had the Republican state organization in 1948; today nearly 80 per cent of the Republican county chairmen are for Taft. Not only does Taft have the organization, but the organization is much stronger than it was in 1948, for the Republicans have been repairing their machine. Stassen's campaign has been cleverly angled to pick up anti-Taft votes rather than to win support for a Stassen program, but with Warren in the race, Stassen is no longer the sole beneficiary of the anti-Taft sentiment. In retaliation Stassen has filed against Warren in California, where some fairly strong anti-Warren sentiment is to be found among diehard Republicans.

is a coalition of frustrated pro-Eisenhower people, members of the former Progressive Party, independent Republicans, Dewey Republicans, and a few Warrenites. Philip La Follette has been its prime mover. The day I interviewed him in Madison he was completing last-minute arrangements for the meeting at which the Warren delegation was projected. The delegation includes such pro-Eisenhower leaders as State Senator Bernhard Gettelman; General Ralph M. Immell, Adjutant General under La Follette and candidate for the Republican nomination for governor in 1948; and Fred Zimmerman, Secretary of State since 1938, a former governor, and one of the state's most popular political figures. It also includes Republicans who supported Governor Dewey in the last three campaigns. Carl Rix, former president of the American Bar Association, selected the Dewey Republicans and serves as chairman of the delegation. The bait used to get all these elements together was Phil La Follette's assurance that "should Warren fail to get the convention nomination, the elected Wisconsin delegates pledged to him would shift to General Eisenhower." Unable to agree on a favorite son, these elements could agree on Warren. None were for Stassen. Warren, therefore, seems the most likely compromise candidate among anti-Taft elements at the convention if Eisenhower fails to win the nomination. The Warren delegation is supported by the Madison Capital-Times.

Phil La Follette's pro-Warren activity has aroused much conflicting comment in Wisconsin. Many Democrats believe that he is out to split the anti-Taft vote. He served, of course, on General MacArthur's staff in World War II and led a slate of MacArthur delegates in 1948. He has said that his personal affection and esteem for MacArthur are unchanged. Before organizing the Warren delegation he had expressed a preference for a Taft-MacArthur slate. The key to the La Follette riddle may be that there is little sentiment for MacArthur in Wisconsin, at least as a Presidential candidate.

The main question is whether the Warren candidacy will in fact split the opposition to Taft, thereby enabling Taft to register an impressive victory. My guess would be that Warren will split the anti-Taft vote with Stassen and will succeed in winning many independent, progressive, and Democratic votes. In Wisconsin's Presidential primary people do not need to declare their party affiliation and large numbers of Democrats traditionally vote for or against Republican candidates. For example, in 1948 the Republican candidates polled almost four times as many votes as the Democratic candidate; yet Truman carried the state in November by about 50,000. Whatever Phil La Follette's motives may be, most of the Warren delegates are genuinely anti-Taft. Warren denies that he is merely a stand-in for Eisenhower, but "Ike-Warren" and "Eisenhower Backers for Warren" clubs are being organized in many communities, with the emphasis more on Eisenhower than on Warren.

ACROSS every aspect of the Wisconsin primary falls the shadow of Joe McCarthy. To understand why, one needs some background facts.

After Senator Taft half-heartedly repudiated McCarthy in response to an editorial ultimatum in Life, McCarthy threatened to support Stassen in Wisconsin unless the repudiation were withdrawn. Taft promptly repudiated the repudiation, but McCarthy has not yet indorsed Taft. Returning from a recent speaking trip, McCarthy said that he found "unlimited" popularity for General MacArthur, "a lot of good solid support" for Senator Taft, and "a considerable amount of sentiment for Eisenhower and Stassen." It will be noted that Joe draws a wise political distinction between popularity, solid support, and sentiment. The order of the listing probably indicates his personal preferences.

Whatever the facts, the impression that a Taft-McCarthy alliance exists has strengthened Taft in Wisconsin. McCarthy is genuinely popular with the Republican organization. He gets far more invitations to speak than he can accept. When two young delegates to a Republican conference last summer tried to interpose objections to a resolution praising him, angry men rushed at them, women screamed, and according to Robert H. Fleming of the Milwaukee Journal, the meeting turned into an "emotional hippodrome" which Governor Kohler later characterized as "disgraceful." Joe is also a hero to the "little people." To the man in the street who admires his violent denunciations, he is a tough scrapper, a two-fisted fighter. I was amazed to find even anti-McCarthy people insisting, with a curious emotional involvement, that McCarthy is sincere.

The best evidence of McCarthy's strength is the fact that he was able to force Governor Kohler out of the Senatorial race. The few polls that had been taken indicated that Kohler could defeat McCarthy, but Kohler—well-bred and well-to-do—was apparently afraid to take on such a ruthless opponent. He was also discouraged by the failure of the Senate subcommittee to press the investigation of Senator Benton's charges against McCarthy and by the Loyalty Review Board's final disposition of the John Service case. Tom Coleman maintained all along that Kohler would not run against McCarthy. "When the chips are down," he was quoted as saying, "all the little blocks will fall into place." They seem to have fallen into place very nicely for Coleman, who is looking forward to winning in Wisconsin in November with a trio of Taft, Kohler, and McCarthy. Kohler apparently has reelection in the bag, and his name will head the Republican ticket.

Of the many strange details of McCarthy's career that need to be investigated none is more interesting than his remarkable friendship with Harold Stassen. Coleman handpicked McCarthy to oppose Senator Robert La Follette in 1946; up to this time McCarthy had been on his own politically. To help McCarthy, Coleman brought Stassen into the state to campaign for him. In 1948 McCarthy repaid part of the debt by serving as the number two delegate on Stassen's slate. The friendship seems to have continued. One of McCarthy's chief supporters in Wisconsin told me, for example, that Harold had given Joe a real assist by his testimony before the McCarran committee attacking Philip Jessup. In the current campaign Stassen has consistently refused to take issue with McCarthyism.

McCarthyism has another connection with the Wisconsin primary. Of the state's 3,500,000 residents about half are church members and half are not. The Roman Catholics are the largest single denomination, followed by the Lutherans, and then by the reform Protestant groups. McCarthy is not exactly a devout Catholic—as a judge he was known as a granter of "easy" divorces—but he enjoys powerful Catholic backing in Wisconsin, despite the hierarchy's recent statement condemning smear tactics. Catholic strength was one reason why Kohler hesitated to enter the Senatorial race. Everyone denies publicly that there is such a thing as a Catholic vote, but off the record the vote is discussed with great candor. Not all Catholics are for McCarthy by any means, but the politicians will tell you that enough of them are to make their support a major factor in his strength. McCarthy's tacit alliance with Taft is doubly important since it gives Taft strength where he is weakest—among voters of lower-middle-class or working-class origin. Incidentally, Tom Coleman is a Catholic.

It is by no means clear, however, that McCarthy will end up in the Taft camp. Lately he has said many kind things about MacArthur, but Joe is fickle. Back in 1948, when he was all-out for Stassen, McCarthy sent a personal letter to most of the registered voters of the state in which he pointed out that although MacArthur was a great general he was "ready for retirement," and besides, he was not really a "native son" of Wisconsin since "neither his first nor his second marriage, nor his divorce, took place in Wisconsin"—a statement clearly addressed to the Catholic and Lutheran objection to divorce. Many Wisconsin politicians think that McCarthy intends to play a hands-off game before the convention in the hope that he may be able to get the Republican vice-presidential nomination.

WISCONSIN Democrats have their own troubles. A Truman delegation was barred for the same reason as an Eisenhower delegation—that its candidate would have been forced to indicate his acceptance. Governor Adlai Stevenson could not be entered since he is running for reelection as Governor of Illinois. Fearing that some maverick delegation might be chosen—say, a Kefauver delegation—which would thus obtain control of the party's state apparatus, the Democratic Organizing Committee formed a pool, or panel, of delegates from all districts, listed in the order of the total vote they had received at regional party meetings. It then induced Kefauver to accept a slate chosen from this pool of reliable party members. Another delegation chosen from the same pool is pledged to Jerome Fox of Chilton, as a favorite son, but it is really a Truman delegation. The state's conservative Democrats are annoyed by this effort to retain control of the party apparatus and have entered a delegation of their own. I was impressed by the quality of the Democratic Organizing Committee, which seems to have completed the task of organizing a Democratic Party in Wisconsin begun in 1942. Most of the leaders I met were young, energetic, intelligent liberals. The state chairman of the committee, James E. Doyle, who happens to be Phil La Follette's law partner, can point to a steady increase in the state-wide Democratic vote since 1946.

Whomever the Democrats select in the state primary in September to oppose McCarthy—it now looks as if Henry Reuss of Milwaukee would be the man—Joe should have a real fight on his hands. In any case McCarthy is the key to the Wisconsin situation, both in the primary and in the general election. If a successful coalition cannot be formed in Wisconsin against

Taft, it may be impossible to prevent his nomination. If Taft is nominated, the Republicans will have embraced McCarthyism, and they may even be saddled with Joe as the vice-presidential candidate. On the other hand, either Eisenhower or Warren, if nominated, would be under enormous pressure to repudiate McCarthy, and this could be an important factor in the Senate fight.

Taft, Stassen, and Warren are spending the last two weeks of this month campaigning in Wisconsin. The primary here should provide the first real test of sentiment in both parties.

The Tory Budget and British Labor

BY KEITH HUTCHISON

FIRST impressions of the British budget, based on the rather scrappy stories in the New York press, were fairly favorable. Chancellor of the Exchequer Butler's proposals, it appeared, would not present an easy target for criticism by a Labor opposition that was committed to support of the government's rearmament program and could not deny the urgency of further measures to restore Britain's balance-of-payments position. True, Labor could be expected to protest strongly against the cut in food subsidies from $1,148,000,000 to $700,000,000—a move calculated to raise prices of almost all basic foods and to add some 21 cents per head per week to the cost of housekeeping.

However, while taking away with one hand, Mr. Butler appeared to be giving generously with the other. Changes in income-tax rates and exemptions were to remove two million wage-earners from the tax rolls and to reduce substantially payments for all in the lower brackets. To prevent hardships children's allowances—paid for each child after the first—were to be raised from 70 cents a week to $1.12, and old-age and veterans' pensions were to be increased. Social services, apart from the recently announced minor modifications in the national-health system, were not to be axed. And the chief new burden imposed was a new excess-profits tax absorbing, together with other corporation levies, up to 73 per cent of profits. Altogether it seemed a moderately tough but reasonably equitable budget.

Second impressions, after reading the text of the Chancellor's speech and the broadcast commentary on it of his predecessor, Hugh Gaitskell, were definitely less favorable. Careful analysis of his proposals suggests, indeed, that they are both inadequate and unjust. They are inadequate because they do not provide for a reduction in total purchasing power commensurate with the anticipated shrinkage in Britain's supply of consumer goods; they are unjust because they redistribute burdens in a way that will put heavier loads on weaker shoulders.

With regard to the second point it appears that those hurt most by increased food prices will gain least by the supposed offsets. For instance, as Mr. Gaitskell pointed out, while all subject to tax before the budget will save something, the gain is smallest at the lowest level and then steadily increases up to the $5,600 bracket—a considerable income in Britain. At the other end of the scale are those whose income is already too small to pay tax. A married man with three children now pays no tax if his earnings are below $33.60 a week—above the average wage. His wife will in future get 84 cents more in children's allowances, but her food bill will be almost $1 higher. Moreover, according to Mr. Gaitskell, most of the two million who will no longer pay an income tax will in fact save less in tax than they have to pay in increased prices. In addition, they must expect an increase in national-insurance contributions, and higher prices for clothes and other articles owing to a revision of the purchase tax which will apparently advance the rate on low-priced goods and decrease it on the higher-priced.

Mr. Butler's chief claim for his income-tax changes is that they will increase incentives. The man who earns overtime pay or gets a production bonus will now find less of his additional income withheld for taxes and may be encouraged to increase his productivity. This is true, but probably only a minority of British workers are in a position to augment their pay by these means, and to many now working part time this talk of incentives will be a bitter joke. Moreover, the increase in output which may be achieved—and Mr. Butler does not seem to be counting on much of a total increase—may be offset by labor troubles arising from demands for higher wages.

Now let us consider the budget in relation to Britain's number one problem, its foreign-trade deficit. Last year, despite a modest increase in exports, this deficit reached $1,444,000,000, which compared with a surplus of $666,000,000 in 1950. The chief cause of this striking deterioration in Britain's balance of payments was the expansion of imports by $3,080,000,000, largely owing to higher prices; the result, aggravated by a decline in export earnings of other sterling countries, was the rapid depletion of gold and dollar reserves, which by the end of last month were only $1,770,000,000, representing a loss of $2,000,000,000 since June 30 last.

Unless this hemorrhage is checked quickly, the sterling bloc, which depends on the central reserves held by Britain, is likely to disintegrate, and Britain itself, forced to trade on a cash basis, will be unable to buy enough food to sustain its population or enough raw materials to keep its workers employed. Quite properly, therefore, the government is seeking to restore the balance by both inhibiting imports and stimulating exports. The effect on the British consumer of this shrinkage in foreign supplies is to be softened to some extent by running down stocks. On the other hand, the volume of domestically produced goods available for the home market is also being reduced by measures taken to swell exports.

If further inflation is to be avoided, this decline in home supplies ought to be matched by a commensurate fall in purchasing power, but Mr. Butler does not seem to have faced this necessity. What he takes away by reducing subsidies and increasing gasoline and other taxes is in fact rather more than outweighed by the increases in pensions and children's allowances and the tax reliefs. However, his final balance sheet shows an estimated surplus of $1,506,000,000, which he thinks will leave the public "only just about enough to pay for the goods that are likely to be available."

This is such a dubious assumption that I wonder if the Chancellor is not making a number of other assumptions that he prefers to keep to himself. Does he expect, perhaps, that some millions of low-income families will no longer be able to afford the whole of their meager rations, so that the total demand for food will decline? Or is he anticipating that the increase in the rediscount rate from 2½ to 4 per cent, which was the biggest surprise of the budget, will have a strongly deflationary effect on the economy? Dearer money, he told the Commons, will reinforce the direct controls imposed on home investment and so free more of the output of the capital-goods industries for export.

But increased credit restrictions and higher interest may also cause real distress in textile, furniture, and other consumer-goods industries that are already in trouble, causing bankruptcies and unemployment. That too may be intended, for the ending of what comfortable, conservative economists like to speak of as "overfull employment" would not only aid recruiting for the undermanned defense industries but serve to check demands for higher wages. Of course such a policy hardly conforms to Tory election pledges to maintain full employment, but with the Laborites squabbling among themselves the government may feel it can count on a fairly long respite before it must account to the electorate.

The Crisis in French Movies

BY MADELON BERNIS

Paris
LAST Christmas the big Paris department store, the Louvre, made an arrangement with R. K. O. to show scenes from the Disney movie, "Alice in Wonderland," as part of its holiday display. R. K. O.'s advance publicity told the astonished French public: "Votre Père Noël, c'est Walt Disney."

That same Christmas week the once great French movie industry was winding up the worst year in its history. Its deficit was nearly six million dollars. The studios of Joinville, St. Maurice, and Francœur, where many of the finest French pictures had been made, had been closed down since fall. Six of the largest companies—Discina, Filmsonor, Gaumont, Pathé, Sirius, and U. G. C.—had announced they were "temporarily" ceasing production. Such well-known directors as Bresson, Carné, Cayette, Cocteau, and Grémillon had not made a single movie in 1951. At least half the workers in the industry were unemployed.

Producers who did manage to scrape together enough money to make a film often had to wait several months before they could get into the first-run houses, most of which were filled with American pictures. While "Alice," for instance, was drawing crowds in three of the largest Paris movie theaters, "Jeannot l'intrépide," the first full-length French animated cartoon, was shown in houses with only one-fortieth as much seating capacity. Nearly half the total movie receipts went to American films.

A complex train of events led up to this sorry state of affairs. It began in June, 1946, when Léon Blum, Foreign Minister of the new French Republic, signed the famous Blum-Byrnes accords in Washington. At that time the French film industry was facing the end of the false prosperity it had enjoyed during the Occupation when it had its home market all to itself and that market was an excellent one, with people flocking to the movies to get a little relaxation free from German surveillance. In order to reestablish itself, the industry required financial aid, including foreign loans, and equitable export-import agreements with other countries, especially the United States.

The accords Blum brought back with him did not provide any of these things. He had agreed that the United States could export films without limit to France but had obtained no return guaranty that American distributors would lift their all but total embargo on French films. France wanted dollar credits for reconstruction. American movie interests wanted a bigger share of the French market. A good part of the industry saw the handwriting on the wall. Louis Jouvet warned: "The profound alteration which these accords will effect . . . strikes a death blow to our national integrity, our dramatic art, and our intellectual and cultural life."

It was soon apparent that Jouvet was right. From 1946 to 1948 France imported 1,500 American films and turned over to them a good 65 per cent of the total movie receipts. The situation was so bad that in September, 1948, after an all-industry committee had protested to the government, the Blum-Byrnes accords were revised. Only 121 American films a year would now be taken by France, which in return agreed to import no more than 65 films from all other countries. As additional help to producers, French exhibitors were required to show French films at least five weeks out of every thirteen, and a government Aid Fund was set up. The receipts from two new taxes, one on admissions and one on production, were to be returned to the industry in the form of a loan, the largest part of which was to be used to finance new films.

NONE of these measures struck at the root of the trouble, and their temporary beneficial effect was soon dissipated. The ten million dollars paid from the Aid Fund to producers has just about equaled the increase in their costs. Total receipts, however, have gone down, with the result that studios are today in a worse position than they were in 1946. American competition still makes it impossible for the French even to approach profitable production for the home market.

The more precarious the outlook becomes, the more bitter is the feeling against the American quota. While the law requires exhibitors to show French pictures about two-fifths of the time, French producers must fight the Americans against overwhelming odds for the remaining three-fifths. American companies have well-organized distributing agencies in France with much more money at their disposal than the French can dream of spending. Paramount, for example, spent more than $200,000 advertising the French dubbed-in version of "Samson and Delilah"; "L'Auberge rouge," one of the best French pictures of 1951, had some $8,000 budgeted for its publicity. The American companies, in actuality, pay for the exhibitor's advertising. In return, he not only shows the full number of American pictures allowed but usually extends himself, presenting them at preferred times, as on week ends and holidays.

The French cannot possibly recoup their losses at home by selling abroad. The United States, using the same dubbed-in pictures it distributes in France proper, is a formidable competitor in French colonial and French-speaking countries. Central Europe, which was one of the biggest pre-war markets, is permanently cut off. Although France has been able to increase its film exports to Italy, Western Europe is in general cool toward the idea of importing French pictures. How can it be otherwise when, under the French-American agreement, France is allowed to import only sixty-five non-American films? The United States also continues effectively to bar French films. In order to combat this embargo, the French movie industry would have to organize an elaborate distribution set-up in the United States, for which it has no money.

Even the home market, such as it is, is diminishing. In the past two years the number of moviegoers in France has dropped markedly. Since 1946 the price of admission has quadrupled. The average Frenchman, bedeviled by the rising cost of necessities, can no longer afford his traditional weekly evening at the movies. Moreover, even French movies are becoming too "Americanized" for his taste. The same taboos that are deplored in American films are beginning to creep into the French product. There is the same fear of presenting anything controversial, the same desire to please everybody and offend nobody. Producers, hoping to retain the small nugget of American sales that still remains to them, hesitate to make films that might be considered "sordid," "licentious," or "un-American." Claude Autant-Lara, brilliant director of "Devil and the Flesh," says: "We are making pallid, unreal films, pictures for children. Can you blame the French public if it stays at home and reads the Sunday scandal sheet?"

The French movie industry has of course other troubles besides these imposed restrictions. In the first place it is badly disorganized. There are only a few large companies. Most of the two hundred producers are small entrepreneurs who do not own their own studios. Usually they are in debt. Only a few have distributing organizations of their own. There is also a great deal of cheating on the part of the exhibitors, who have been accused of pocketing 30 per cent of the returns. But these are among the perennial troubles of the industry. They may have aggravated the present crisis; they did not cause it.

Last winter's shutdowns revealed clearly the precarious state of the industry today. The government's announcement that only 15 instead of 35 per cent of the tax on foreign receipts would be paid into the Aid Fund started a panic. Even the large companies stopped production, though some studios have now partially reopened. In consequence the government will delay its action until June and has meanwhile set up an investigating commission. In all probability some alleviating measures will be taken, but there is no hope that anything drastic will be done. The quota will not be cut any farther—the Americans now depend on the foreign market to pay for many of their films and would put up too big a protest. The Aid Fund will be enlarged a little, and with this crumb of assistance the French cinema may be able to go on for a while longer.

The fact is that a "non-essential" industry like the movies cannot survive in the inflationary economy which prevails in France today. It cannot, on its own, fight against both dollar-buttressed competition and the high cost of living. The government, pressed as it is for funds, is completely unable to provide the necessary help. Instead, it sells out the French film industry for dollar credits—as Blum did in 1946—and taxes it as a luxury industry to get revenue to spend on war production.

The Problem: Guns and Butter Too

BY MARVER BERNSTEIN

IN THE past two years Americans have tried to become accustomed to a new set of alphabetical symbols designating the agencies carrying out the federal defense-mobilization program. Headed by the Office of Defense Mobilization and the Department of Defense, these agencies function in a hostile political and administrative environment which seriously hampers their effectiveness. Experienced Washington observers tend to view their difficulties with something approaching alarm. It may be useful, therefore, to recount the major factors determining the conditions in which economic mobilization must be worked out.

The federal government now has broad powers over the production of goods needed for the armed services, the allocation of scarce materials, prices and wages, the availability of credit for consumer purchases and industrial development, and labor-management relations. The basic statutory authority for the economic-mobilization program is the Defense Production Act, which was passed by Congress early in September, 1950, and amended in August, 1951. Although the Korean war had broken out in June, 1950, the administrative agencies created by the act did not in the main get their economic programs under way until 1951. The principal public controversies since then have been over price controls rather than over the control of materials and production, though price controls have imposed no substantial restrictions while production controls have caused marked deviations from industry's normal pattern.

Life today among the bureaucrats (I use the term in a friendly way) is dominated by uncertainties and delays. Most of these frustrations are the result of the failure of the Administration and the Department of Defense to make clear-cut decisions concerning the requirements for armaments, military "hardware," uniforms, food supplies for the services, and the like. The Joint Chiefs of Staff have struggled constantly to determine how many men and what weapons would be necessary to fight the Korean war and to prepare the country for possible attack, but they have not been able to state confidently, even for a brief period in the future, the magnitude and content of military requirements. In consequence the civilian defense agencies, generally speaking, have had no clear policies to guide them in defining the scope of production controls and no adequate data for measuring the probable inflationary impact of the defense program.

The program adopted, within the framework of the Defense Production Act, depends largely on the degree to which industrial production must be converted from civilian to military goods. In estimating requirements the armed services traditionally give little heed to economy. Most military planners assume that the proper objective is to fill all military supply lines with all the goods that could conceivably be needed. This might be called the insurance theory. Obviously it tends normally to overstate military needs and, more significantly, to assume that civilian needs are purely residual—to be met so far as the production situation permits after all military requirements are fulfilled. There is, of course, a fair measure of logic in this approach. However, in a period in which Presidential policy is to provide both guns and butter it is calculated to wreak havoc with what we wistfully call the normal peace-time economy. Recently Secretary of the Army Pace, who was formerly Director of the Budget and chief economizer of the federal government, has taken steps to make the army more economy-minded; the navy too reports that it is rating officers on cost-mindedness. Nevertheless, Congressional investigating committees continue to report incident after incident of extravagant waste and inept business practices in the armed forces, especially in procurement.

Another handicap of the mobilization agencies is the widespread feeling in Washington that the country's political leadership, both in the White House and on Capitol Hill, is inadequate as measured against the defense emergency. One hears frequently that Truman has much greater administrative ability than Roosevelt had, but he lacks Roosevelt's inspirational qualities. Moreover the economic-mobilization program began to operate precisely in the period in which any President's prestige and influence normally are lowest, that is, in the last half of his second term. This is the period in which Congress becomes less and less willing to follow the President's lead. It is the period which usually finds Congress without capacity to focus attention on major issues of policy.

FROM an administrative point of view, the chief corollary of weak political leadership has been the lack of strong central direction for the economic-mobilization agencies and the reluctance of the planning agencies—the National Security Resources Board, the Office of Defense Mobilization, and the Munitions Board—to discharge their planning responsibilities. Before 1950 the National Security Resources Board had on paper a lot of plans which were to be put into operation at the outbreak of war. But these were plans for total war and total mobilization. As blueprints for partial economic mobilization they were less than satisfactory. Moreover, nobody seemed to know with what techniques the government could best control economic affairs in a period of limited mobilization. World War II experience was only partly relevant.

The absence of strong central coordination and direction of the entire program is immediately responsible for important operating defects. Economic mobilization is brought about through a number of complex and enormously difficult processes which depend upon their careful meshing for best results. The task of translating a set of figures on required military end items into raw materials flowing to designated defense plants producing according to a predetermined schedule involves a great many agencies. Even more agencies are needed to restrain inflationary forces, encourage the discovery of new sources of raw materials, improve the productive capacity of our European allies, control rents in areas where they have been skyrocketed by defense activities, and find jobs for workers unemployed as a result of the industrial dislocations occasioned by the defense program.

Given good-will on both sides, civilians and military personnel can work together well in specific situations, but too often the relationship is tense and acrimonious. One of the standard problems of defense mobilization is to keep civilian-military tension from becoming dangerous. The factors already discussed heighten this tension. In the absence of strong political leadership, effective administrative coordination, and firm military requirements, civil-military friction can wreck a program. Civilian and military officials, in this atmosphere, frequently become closely identified with a particular point of view, which at best is agency-wide rather than government-wide. We all know the fanatical devotion of marines and ex-marines to the Marine Corps. We are less familiar with the single-minded devotion of the bureaucrat to his agency's program, which may be wholly unrelated to other important needs of the government.

Economic mobilization, finally, functions in an ideological climate which exalts the productive process. The largest corporations naturally get the lion's share of procurement contracts. Companies are encouraged to expand their production facilities and supplies of materials by a bewildering variety of measures, such as rapid tax write-offs, guaranteed purchase contracts, long-term development contracts, and premium pricing. The bonanza of defense work is marred for the major producers only by the fear of building up "excess" productive capacity. The old bugaboo of surpluses is already being mentioned in business journals.

This is by no means an exhaustive catalogue of the factors which substantially affect the administration of the economic-mobilization program. Yet even this short list suggests that the political and administrative climate in Washington during an election year will become more rather than less unfavorable. In the meantime some 16,000 people in the Economic Stabilization Agency, about 400 in the Defense Production Administration, and scores of employees in other mobilization agencies formulate and administer price, production, and related controls with a chance, at best, of meeting only partially the objectives of the Defense Production Act.

On the assumption that controls will be required until American-Soviet relations are substantially eased,

Which Paper Do You Read?

IN ORDER to deceive the people of the world, U. S. imperialism deputized U. N. organizations to execute the Point Four plan with which U. S. monopoly capital attempts to enslave the people of the Orient, and used [Owen] Lattimore, who had some "liberal" tinge in the past, to head the mission. Such was the malicious intention of U. S. imperialism. Lattimore had in 1926 traveled from Sinkiang to India via Kashmir and had made detailed investigations of the border regions of China, India, and Afghanistan. His second visit has certainly just produced valuable results for the aggressive plans of U. S. imperialism. He rushed back to the U. S. at the end of March to answer charges made by a Senator that he was a Communist. As a matter of fact, Lattimore has all along been planning to establish a dominating position for U. S. influence in all Asia.—Quoted in the January 11, 1951, issue of the Chinese Press Survey, Shanghai, from an article in a Chinese periodical by Chiang Tzo-yi of the Chinese Academy of Science.

we need to learn to live with economic mobilization. What can be done to make the program more effective and to insure that the broad implications of mobilization for defense will be democratic? First, civilians in Congress and the executive agencies must continually press the armed services for more detailed justification of their demands for strategic materials and armament. Second, mobilization officials must realize more clearly the impact of military preparedness on the American economy and the economies of the Western democracies. All possible steps must be taken to prevent economic prosperity from becoming heavily dependent on production for defense or war. Third, in our attempt to exercise effective economic control over production, prices, and wages, we should take advantage of our strengths and minimize our weaknesses. We should make better use of flexible monetary controls and lessen our reliance on direct price controls, which require scores of government offices and thousands of employees for their administration. By depending overwhelmingly on direct price controls in the present period, we run the risk of discrediting their application and undermining their usefulness when they may be desperately needed. And fourth, the price of industrial cooperation in the mobilization program must not be the uncritical acceptance by government officials of the views of the big-business community, or any other organized interest group, as the primary guide to public policy.

The Japanese "Insecurity" Treaty

BY HELEN MEARS

THE United States and Japan reached agreement last February 27 on administration of the security treaty which gives us the "right to dispose United States land, air, and sea forces in and about Japan," effective upon ratification of the peace treaty. These two documents—the peace and security treaties—represent the culmination of what bipartisan supporters term our "successful" Japanese policy. John Foster Dulles, chief architect of the treaty-making, has modestly called the peace treaty "an act in accordance with the fundamental moral principles of the great spiritual teachers and leaders of all nations and of all religions." Secretary Acheson, upon signing the security treaty, called it a "voluntary agreement between free peoples for the maintenance of peace and security."

When contrasted with the facts, such statements seem to cast doubt on our sincerity. To claim that the security treaty is a "voluntary agreement between free peoples" when one of the signers is an occupied nation and the other the occupier is to put a peculiar interpretation upon "voluntary" and "free." As a matter of fact, the Japanese were told from the first that they would get no peace treaty unless and until they ratified the security treaty. Not satisfied with warning the Japanese, our military also warned the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that the peace treaty should not receive final ratification until the agreement on American post-treaty military rights in Japan was concluded. In short, we made no bones about it—no bases, no peace treaty.

The agreement signed in Tokyo last February 27 establishes these post-treaty military rights. What are they? Although at this writing details are not available, dispatches from Tokyo suggest that our military leaders have won their long fight to retain most of their occupation privileges in Japan. The New York Times has quoted State Minister Okazaki ■ telling the Japanese press:

In principle United States garrison troops and their dependents will be tried by American military courts for whatever crimes wherever committed. However, in serious crimes Japan will be authorized to demand the surrender of such persons for trial in Japanese courts. . . . A joint Japanese-American commission will confer and establish precedents for each case encountered.

This means, in brief, reestablishment of the principle of extra-territoriality—the very principle which Asiatic peoples have resented most in Western policy for more than a century. We surrendered this policy in Japan quite early, in the 1890's. We surrendered it, albeit reluctantly, in China during World War II. Now, during a military occupation of Japan, we are reviving it to implement a treaty which we insist restores sovereign independence to Japan!

It is safe to predict that the security treaty will get us into serious trouble not only in Japan but elsewhere in Asia. In our preoccupation with the military aspects of our anti-Communist policy, we are neglecting political and psychological aspects which in the long run will prove decisive. We insist that the Soviet and Chinese Communists are wrong when they charge that we are turning Japan into a colony instead of a sovereign nation, or when they charge that our Japanese bases are intended for an attack on China rather than as ■ defense of HELEN MEARS is the author of "Mirror for Americans—Japan" and of many articles on Japan in national magazines.

Japan. From the Japanese point of view, however, the security treaty seems admirably designed to encourage such misinterpretation.

Take the question of bases. Americans have been told—and most of us believe—that the Japanese want us to maintain bases in Japan to “deter aggression” by the Russians and Chinese. But are our bases really so welcome? Last October the Oriental Economist, conservative and pro-Western, printed the following exchange:

Commentator: I guess the Americans are under the impression that most Japanese have a desire to be included [in the United States defense system].

Questioner: Suppose, for argument's sake, we Japanese did not so desire, what would happen?

Commentator: Even if we turned it down, America would stand pat on its demand. That's the important point.

Surely there is no hint here of a “voluntary” and “free” agreement. There is implication only of duress. The fact is that opposition to the security treaty in Japan has been persistent and widespread from the beginning, so widespread indeed that on the eve of the Diet debate on ratification the Diet sergeant-at-arms—according to the North American Newspaper Alliance reporter—added to his staff a group of jiu-jitsu experts in order to guard against “free-for-alls” in the legislative chamber. The Diet did in fact ratify both treaties, but only after what the American press termed “stormy” sessions.

FROM Japan's point of view the security treaty offers the reverse of security. It does not even pledge the United States to defend Japan; it says merely that United States forces “may be utilized to contribute to the security of Japan against armed attack from without.” One can hardly imagine anything more noncommittal. On the other hand, the treaty provides that our forces in Japan “may be utilized to contribute to the maintenance of international peace and security in the Far East.” Practically this means that we may use our Japanese bases for pushing war farther north into Korea, or China, or anywhere else in the Far East. Thus Japan's participation in any military adventure involving the United States or the United Nations becomes automatic. We may contemplate this situation with great satisfaction, but the war-weary Japanese can hardly be expected to do so.

Nor, for all the occupation privileges it grants, is the security treaty an unmixed blessing to our occupation force and to the G. I.'s who are its backbone. The

John Foster Dulles

G. I.'s may be used, according to the treaty, “at the expressed request of the Japanese government, to put down large-scale internal riots and disturbances in Japan caused through instigation or intervention by an outside power or powers.” This is clearly designed with Communist-inspired riots in mind. It presents a challenge which the Communists may be happy to meet. And what is to prevent the Japanese government from labeling every riot “Communist-inspired”—including riots inspired by hunger and unemployment? American soldiers might thus be thrust into mêlées in which the hands of the Japanese masses—Communist and non-Communist and anti-Communist—would all be turned against them. If the cementing of American-Japanese friendship is one of the objectives of our Japanese policy, certainly we are going about it the hard way.

Again from the point of view of the Japanese, we are not only offering insecurity rather than security but are demanding in return an insupportably high price. One of our first occupation moves was to supervise the writing of a new Japanese constitution which expressly provides that “the maintenance of land, sea, and air forces, as well as other war potentials, will never be authorized.” Today that policy has been completely reversed. The Japanese are required not only to pay for a growing army of their own but also to contribute to the support of American garrisons. Japan's military budget for 1952 is nearly one-sixth of what the four years and three months of its pre-Pearl Harbor war with China cost.

The political dangers of the policies inherent in the security treaty are clear. But the strategic dangers cannot be ignored. It is dangerous to assume that the Japanese are prepared to cooperate wholeheartedly with our anti-Communist policies. True, the Japanese historically fear Russia; they fear Russia today. But the Japanese know that their islands are not defensible; if war comes again, their tinder-like cities will again be pulverized and millions will starve. It is this which has induced in so many Japanese a fervent desire for neutrality in any new war.

A realistic look at the security treaty, within the frame of actual conditions in Japan, can lead only to the conclusion that it is our gravest political and strategic blunder since the end of the war. American policy-makers have been persuaded to place assumed strategic and military advantages ahead of ideological principles which, in the long run, will decide the contest of democracy against communism in Asia. And this time the errors cannot be charged against secret war agreements or alleged Communist traitors in the State Department.

Handbook on Communism

COMMUNISM IN WESTERN EUROPE. By Mario Einaudi, Jean-Marie Domenach, and Aldo Garosci. Cornell University Press. $3.

IN ITS serious tone, careful scholarship, and amazing compactness this collaborative study of Western European communism offers a welcome contrast to the emotional, imprecise, and diffuse writing on such topics that is currently the fashion nearly everywhere except in strictly academic circles. Here at last is a handbook on communism that can be read with profit by both the specialist and the general reader. The authors assume no knowledge on their readers' part; they explain every organizational unit or personality even at the risk of platitude. And they have wisely restricted themselves to the two great countries of the Western European continent—France and Italy—the only ones in which communism offers a real and continuing threat to a free society.

Their book is at once a history, a current analysis, and a proposal of remedial measures. This triple function gives it a somewhat uneven character. As history it is almost too brief. As a remedial program it is encouraging but not completely convincing. As analysis, however, it is nearly always admirable. The authors have grasped the essentials of Western European communism—its organizational solidity, the talent, self-dedication, and ruthlessness of its leaders, and its continuing appeal to populations starved for a political faith and profoundly skeptical of their rulers' interest in the well-being of the poorer part of the population. French or Italian communism, Mr. Domenach warns us, "cannot be assessed only as a 'party' organized for the political struggle, nor solely as a 'conspiracy' organized for the seizure of power; it is an immense machine, as complex as the state which it everywhere attacks. . . . It is a complete society which, in embryonic form, already exists inside the society it aims to replace." And he adds that we should not take too seriously the loss of membership and votes that, in France at least, has recently seemed to presage its decline. The hard core of militants—perhaps 15 per cent of its membership—is the real key to its strength; and this remains virtually untouched. "In order to direct the movement of the masses a party must first create the strong skeleton of a body which will take on flesh according to circumstances. When circumstances become critical, the body may be reduced to the skeleton, but the skeleton will not disintegrate."

Of the three authors Messrs. Garosci and Domenach are Europeans, and Mr. Einaudi is an American professor of Italian birth. This intimate connection with European society gives their analysis a depth and understanding—a sense of an experience personally or at least vicariously shared—that is usually lacking in American treatments of Communist themes. Such is particularly the case with the parts of the book written by the two Europeans—Mr. Domenach's section on the French party and Mr. Garosci's on the Italian.

This is not to say that Messrs. Garosci and Domenach are in any sense pro-Communist. The former is a well-known historian and a former leader of the ill-fated Party of Action that during the war years embodied the aspirations of the most intelligent and imaginative of non-Communist Italian anti-Fascists. He has seen the destruction of his hopes for a renovated, democratic Italy, and his knowledge that the Communist leaders bear a heavy responsibility for this disappointment gives his writing about them a tone of cold, quiet anger. These men he has fought and he obviously dislikes them profoundly. At the same time he understands the motivation of those who vote Communist because they see no other alternative to clericalism and reaction in an Italy in which the forces of the non-Communist left are divided and pitifully weak. He explains why it is that the Italian Communists have not suffered the same loss of voting strength as the French, and, along with their allies the left-wing Socialists, actually increased their vote between the parliamentary election of 1948 and the municipal elections of last May and June. Unfortunately, Mr. Garosci's section is too compressed to permit him to elaborate with much originality on these themes. We learn the basic facts about Italian communism—but not a great deal more.

Mr. Domenach's section, on the other hand, is both the longest and the most original in the book. Like his Italian co-author, Mr. Domenach is a veteran of the struggle against fascism: in the French Resistance he worked with Communists in a common cause; now, editor of Esprit, the journal of the French Catholic left, he fights the Communists politically and ideologically while advocating some of the same social goals. Hence the tone he takes toward his late allies combines compassion with reproof. And in so doing he reminds us of a number of things that we have tended to forget in the enormous simplification of American attitudes that the past four or five years have witnessed. The great strikes of the autumn of 1947, he tells us, were not originally Communist in inspiration—as nearly all American publicists have assumed. Rather they were an independent outgrowth of the "wide disparity between wages and prices," which the Communists, now out of the government, decided to support and exploit in the interests of their campaign against the Marshall Plan. I am not quite sure that this is the whole story, but I am very glad to have Mr. Domenach's corrective entered on the record. Similarly, Mr. Domenach's characterization of Maurice Thorez as a "Tito manqué"—a man who, if he had remained in France during the war, might have made a reality of a "Western communism" independent of Soviet control—is the most arresting item in the whole book. It suggests—and here again the author corrects the simplifications of hindsight—that the hopes of those who looked for this sort of development between 1942 and 1947 were not totally illusions at the time. That they eventually proved such does not mean that a large body of Frenchmen did not at one time think and act in these terms and that a certain number do not do so still.

As opposed to the contributions of the two Europeans, Mr. Einaudi's section—a general introduction and analysis—has a tone of detachment and of optimism about reducing Communist strength that reflects the greater remoteness of an American university campus. At the same time this relative detachment enables Mr. Einaudi to see the potential weakness of the Communist position and to strip away its pretenses more rigorously than either of his collaborators. Western European communism, he asserts, far from being a movement for social progress, is necessarily attached to "feudalism, inefficiency, and obsolete economic policies." Essentially retrograde in character, it thrives in countries whose "social structure . . . has maintained rigidities and cleavages" that favor a class-warfare approach. Once such countries have been fully modernized, the appeal of pseudo-revolutionary Marxism will all but vanish. Hence it is no accident that the Communist leaders direct their heaviest assaults against the Marshall and Schuman plans: these truly revolutionary measures "are bound to bring about far-reaching social and political changes that will create the conditions under which communism will not be able to survive."

This is a bold and compelling argument. It is far more discerning than the usual amiable banalities of Marshall Plan propaganda. Yet it suffers from some of the same deficiencies. It fails to take into account the extent to which the pressing needs of rearmament have diverted the American program in Europe from its original social-welfare goals. More important, it ignores the whole element of psychological inertia—the nearly universal apathy, weariness, and frustration—antedating communism, deeper than it, and largely independent of economic conditions. Characteristically, it is Mr. Domenach rather than Mr. Einaudi who draws our attention to "that inarticulate despair that is the fundamental psychic element of the European crisis." So long as despair remains the basic European attitude, communism—and other essentially irrational doctrines—will maintain their appeal. For communism, like Gaullism, offers a mystique—and with it a refuge for sick souls. Has Western democracy a mystique to put in its place? H. STUART HUGHES

The Peacock Vein

THE GROVES OF ACADEME. By Mary McCarthy. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.50.

THE experimental college is a subject for satire made to Mary McCarthy's hand. As a going institution of our society, it implicates a more public range of targets than the utopian colony of "The Oasis," and her dealings with it result in an extravaganza as diverting as Peacock.

For sheer comic bravura the poets' conference that fills the second half of the book is the show-piece. The method is a sort of verbal sonata form; theme, restatements and developments, coda. The lady poet who leads off the speakers takes Virgil as her subject: "A faint sigh rustled through the faculty. From the point of view of the student body, the choice was not a happy one. The majority of the students present had never heard of the person being alluded to as the Mantuan; they supposed he was a modern poet whom the faculty had not yet caught up with—a supposition correct in a sense, as Howard Furness, maliciously grinning, remarked in his slippery voice afterward."

The theme started, its potentialities unfold in an accelerando of double-edged ironies. For the students the situation is saved by the fact that one of them is doing a project on Hermann Broch and "The Death of Virgil." "Lise's major project, as the news of it spread around the room, evoked instant respect and attention; heads turned to nod at her approvingly, as though some member of her family had just been mentioned from the dais." Virgil too engages Dr. Muller, a pillar of the faculty who "like many historians, had certain regressive tendencies arising from the nature of his subject, which called forth a tolerance for the past, in the same way that some occupations, like sand-hogging, give rise to their own occupational diseases." Virgil, he feels, has much light to throw on "the phenomenon of imperialism in our time." Couldn't the poet's praise of Augustus in the Eclogues be considered an example of irony? Miss Mansell, who has been lecturing on problems of poetic style, catches only the word irony in his question and refers him to "somebody named Empson—if he caught the name rightly—and his treatment of the pastoral mode."

Finally, after this workout in the more esoteric keys, the theme broadens to its quantum of general reference as the dead-pan "normally" of the coda impales a whole phase of contemporary culture. The next speaker—a not unrecognizable elderly poet of the avant-garde who is "a bank president in private life"—takes Lucretius for his subject. "In the audience the President frowned; the faculty was uneasy. . . . Furness was recalling, with some disquiet, the old poet's bland question at the sherry party—'Is this the fabled college where everything is run backward?'—and the air of gentle disappointment with which he bore the news that no, indeed, it was not, that the courses ran normally from the immediate past to the present."

For the rest, the Peacock vein is imbedded in a tissue of psychological comedy: an anatomy of "occupational diseases" of laborers in the progressive-academic vineyard, "nice, high-minded, scrupulous people," with a sense of "vicarious outrage—the vocational endowment of all educators," and a "nervous habit of self-correction, always emending, penciling, erasing." By fabricating an issue of academic freedom the paranoiac Mulcahy of the not nice and unscrupulous minority provides the "case" for a web of decisions and revisions that leave him firing the high-minded President who started by firing him. The specialized little world that comes credibly to life within the framework of this plot is a microcosm of general cultural trends; it would be hard to think of any facet of its possibilities for comedy that "The Groves of Academe" does not light up.

HOWARD DOUGHTY, JR.

Introduction to Vedanta

VEDANTA FOR MODERN MAN.

Edited, and with an Introduction, by Christopher Isherwood. Harper and Brothers. $5.

VEDANTA, a body of teachings derived from the ancient Vedas and from later classics, is the nearest thing to a Bible that modern Indians possess. Unlike the Christian or Jewish Bible, however, it is constantly receiving fresh additions, on the principle that divine inspiration never ends. As a philosophy Vedanta forms the common basis of all the well-known Indian religions, including Buddhism and Jainism. As a system of religious thought, it has crossed continents, its influence having been acknowledged by such thinkers as Goethe, Schopenhauer, Emerson, Bernard Shaw, Carl Jung, and Albert Schweitzer. Mr. Isherwood calls Vedanta a "non-dualistic philosophy," in the sense that spirit alone is real, everything else being Maya, that is, appearance or illusion. Spirit, or Brahman, is the Vedantic God and is regarded as the ultimate reality. In this world of Maya a man leads only a shadow life of pretending. His real life does not begin until his divine essence, his Atman, has coalesced with Brahman.

To make Vedanta intelligible to the West, Mr. Isherwood presents an anthology of sixty-one essays and poems by thirty-six teachers or lovers of Vedanta, including Jawaharlal Nehru, Aldous Huxley, Gerald Heard, Rabin-dra Nath Tagore, John van Druten, and Hubert Benoit. In this meeting of East and West, the contributors discuss such topics as the Godward purpose of life, the discipline of Yoga, the bearing of Vedanta on daily affairs, and why, in the words of Mr. Huxley, "Time must have a stop." We are also given glimpses of Sri Ramakrishna, a Bengali saint (1833-1886), whom Romain Rolland and many noted Indians revere as a spiritual leader of the rank of Jesus and Buddha. Finally we learn that a number of Vedanta centers, for study and not for proselyting, have been established in the West—there are two in New York—under the direction of Swamis sent by the Ramakrishna Order of India. Clearly, the Vedanta Weltanschauung has formidable support.

It was probably the collapse of scientific materialism—a philosophy which helped to plunge us into the current series of world wars—that gave Vedanta its chance in the West. The materialists, who claimed that there was no such thing as mind, dominated Western culture from the time of Darwin and Karl Marx until the other day, when Jeans, de Broglie, Schrödinger, and other super-physicists proved that there was no such thing as matter. The shock of this discovery sent our cultured professional classes reeling. Bernard Shaw's "Too True to Be Good" dramatizes the event in the tragedy of the disillusioned atheist who, having learned of Einstein and nuclear fission, sees his solid, soulless, machine-like world dissolve into the mysteries of relativity and the quantum theory. In a word, the downfall of materialism left our cultured people gyrating in a spiritual vacuum. And nothing was more certain than that this vacuum would be filled by some religious belief up to date enough to treat science and religion as two necessary, compatible, and reinforcing sides of the intellectual movement of humanity. Among the religious philosophies that have tried to fill the void are the Butler-Bergson-Shaw version of evolution, which comes from Europe, and Western Vedanta, which comes from Asia.

What are the most striking features of Vedanta? To begin with, it has no canonical Bible. Its scriptures consist of a continuous body of inspired literature that extends from the old Vedic hymns of 3,000 years ago to Aldous Huxley's "Indian Philosophy of Peace" and Radhakrishnan's "Religion and the World Crisis," written the other day for the present book. There is no dominant founder, like Mohammed or Buddha, whom everyone must worship. Vedanta has temples without priests, counsels of perfection without dogmas, and a spiritual discipline without rites. Its one altar is the soul of man. Though Vedantists believe that a reunion with Brahman, through a strict training of the body-mind, is man's chief end and glory, they do not claim to be a Chosen People or to possess the one and only valid faith. Thus a newcomer is not required to disavow the gods, saints, or heroes that have been dear to him. He will not be asked to give up Christ for the sake of Krishna. On the contrary, he is expected to consider Buddha, Zoroaster, and Jesus as teachers no less trustworthy than Shankara or Rama-krishna. Obviously the Vedantists, with their doctrine of the Atman, have a mystical element that brings them close to the Quakers, with their belief in the inner light, and to the creative evolutionists, with their faith in an instinctive drive toward perfection. But what makes Vedanta unique is its emphasis on special mystical practices and also the fact that these practices—mastered aforetime by such Western seers as Pythagoras, Plotinus, and Meister Eckhart—are taught not merely to an esoteric group or to an intellectual élite but to anyone willing and able to undergo the intense Yoga discipline.

Mr. Isherwood has produced an anthology all of which is worth reading and some of which is in the highest degree inspiring. The book provides a first-class introduction to the Vedanta conception of Life and God.

A New Language

TOWARD A GENERAL THEORY OF HUMAN JUDGMENT. By Justus Buchler. Columbia University Press. $2.75.

THE central idea of this book is formulated in terms of the neologism "proception." This word is intended to suggest the "moving union" in the human individual "of seeking and receiving, of forward propulsion and patient absorption." By intention it represents the "interplay" and the "unitary" (why unitary?) direction of the individual's activities and faculties. Apart from his "proceptions," "he" is not an individual but a succession of spasms or kinks in the ether. In terms of this conception Professor Buchler develops a theory of "human judgment" deployed in its several basic dimensions of "communication," "compulsion," "convention," "perspective," and "validation." The point about "proception," evidently, is that it is intended to bring the sensory, conceptual, and motivational variables of human personality into a single system of interrelationships which leaves out nothing save prime matter. Buchler seeks first inclusion and then articulation—a favorite word. His is a philosophy of "transcendence," but only in the sense that it seeks to go beyond the traditional bifurcations and reductions implicit in such terms as "mental" and "behavioral." Yet it remains devoutly naturalistic and conceives the human organism as the joint function of its physical and social environments.

It is not surprising that Buchler finds previous frameworks for interpreting judgment inadequate. Unlike older "spectator" theories of mind, his analysis stresses the "funded" interpretations of an interacting, socially oriented individual. But unlike the more recent pragmatic theories, his doctrine admits of felt immediacies (Dewey called them "havings") and givens. The sheer brutality of things—including in one sense interpretation and communication themselves—incluctably forces itself upon the individual's attention. In relation to this aspect of his world the individual is perforce observer, sufferer, or patient. But he is also a manipulator, a doer, above all, a judge. And in this dimension he molds and interprets the world in his own image. From this point of view, things become products, facts classified data, and nature a subject matter for—"proception."

How far Buchler's development of his root idea accomplishes a basic reorganization of our conceptual patterns for the understanding of symbolism, communication, and method is perhaps a moot question. Since each of us brings to the reading of any book his own funded experience, it is inevitable, as the author himself would probably insist, that readers of this work will disagree as to its fertility and its suggestiveness for new interpretations of the phenomena of which it treats. In any case it needs to be supplemented by more exact and more detailed analyses of the complexities of human discourse. Lacking them, some readers who have already carried the analysis of some particular dimension of human judgment beyond the point to which Buchler's study takes us, will doubtless find it alternately vague and elementary. I found it in part a none too clear restatement of views I seemed already to know. But in part I also found, as in the discussion of conventions, a certain freshness of approach or as in the discussion of validation, a prod to further thinking.

Apart from his basic term Buchler generally manages to avoid jargon—perhaps the besetting vice of contemporary American philosophy. But he has a way of extending the sense or use of words beyond their ordinary meanings and roles, and so in a way he has perhaps inadvertently invented a new language of interpretation in the process of analyzing and explicating an old one. This is always a hazardous business. Sometimes new words function as catalysts simply because they are free from the stock associations by means of which all words tend to enslave our minds. "Proception" is not a lovely word; but it may force us out of our conceptual ruts. Words are often telescoped theories; old ones often little more than counters by means of which we reenact ingrained prejudices. How much prejudice and how little understanding is concealed, for example, in the little word "race"! Placed in new contexts or invested with new twists of meaning, old words may sometimes do the trick of making us think, and all the more effectively because they force us to see the familiar in a new light.

But there is also the risk. For we may think we have a new idea when all we really have is an old word used in an unusual way. We may spend time on redefinition which would be better spent in the assimilation of new facts or in genuine analysis of terms which we habitually employ without full comprehension of their meaning. A new way with old words can all too often trick us into supposing we have made an advance in thought, when what we have done is to say queerly something quite obvious. Take the word "articulation," for example. In its ordinary uses it means to utter distinctly, to express clearly or systematically, to divide into words and syllables. But in Buchler's account, by what I can only call a process of association or suggestion, it undergoes a series of sea changes which cause us to suppose we are really learning something when nothing is going on but verbal play with a familiar term. Thus "criticism is articulation, and articulation is realization." In every instance of social communication there is "an implicit mutual demand . . . for proceptive articulation in the form of products, overt manifestations of proception." "Articulation is the manipulation (and the implied proceptive deliverance) of products as ends in themselves. . . ." There may be something in all this—but it is said in such an odd way.

This accounts, I think, for the sense of "novelty"—or strain—one experiences in reading Buchler's book. In another context this sort of thing might, of course, be an exciting venture. But in the context of what is, or should be, an explanation and elucidation of human judgment it is often merely misleading. Even more important, it results in a discourse which is less precise than it needs to be. And this is inevitable, since it forces us to break loose from our old linguistic moorings without providing a seaworthy raft on which we can be sure to keep our minds afloat.

Old Masters in Color

ART TREASURES OF THE LOUVRE.

Text Translated and Adapted from the French by René Huyghe. Commentary by Mme René Huyghe, with a Short History of the Louvre by Milton Fox. Abrams. $10.

THE publishers of the Library of Great Painters here inaugurate a new series entitled the Library of Great Museums. Except for the monograph on El Greco, whose color is extremely "modern" and therefore more than usually susceptible of reproduction, this series represents an important effort to extend the facilities of color reproduction to the domain of the old masters. One cannot avoid the conclusion that, superior as many of these plates are to other reproductions of the same pictures, the old masters are still reluctant to yield up their secrets to color filters. Those of them who employed gold backgrounds can rest assured that modern glossy paper can record no echo of their splendors. The Madonna labeled Cimabue basks in the roseate glow of a sort of Turner sunset, while Giotto's St. Francis is ecstatic before a background somewhere between the color of straw and a French omelette. In general, the plates are keyed too dark and too hot. Too many bodies and faces seem lit by a roaring fire, and Daumier's Crispin has already turned to the color of a boiled lobster.

Most of the later painters come off very adequately, especially Rousseau le Douanier, whose terrifying fable of war is expressed in flat tonal areas and sharp value contrasts. Among the older painters, Zurbaran, who also employs abrupt contrasts of dark and light, is well transposed. A real tour de force is the Fragonard "Bathers," the juicy confections of which must have presented formidable difficulties for reproduction.

Verse Chronicle

THE latest book in the admirable Muses' Library series (Harvard University Press; this number priced at $2.10) contains the poems of Sir Walter Raleigh (sic, without the i; the history books, it seems, have been spelling the name wrong this long time). The format, as usual with this series, is not only handy but nice, and the needs of the student are met in such a way as not to confuse or put off the lazier general reader. The editor of this particular volume is Agnes M. C. Latham, whose introductory essay, careful and excellent throughout, lifts into moments of moving brilliance.

The North Sea poems of Heinrich Heine, here translated by Vernon Watkins (New Directions, $3), were written by a young man in a rather exalted state, a mood, pro tem, of emancipation, ecstatic rather than depressed by the riddle of life. In looser and larger meters than the wrier characteristic Heine, they nevertheless have their moments of concision, sharpness of observation, and immediate sensual perception amid the romantic yearnings and swoonings. Such is their looseness of form, so free are they from tight idiomatic effects, that the translator has his work more than half done for him before he starts; Mr. Watkins, himself an easy-going mellifluous poet with no great hold or bite, has enough sympathy with this kind of rhythm and enough respect for the concrete nouns and verbs not to let the tidal wave of adjectives and the adverbial froth and spume sweep him entirely away: the English version, on facing pages, is substantially just to the German.

Roger Fry has by no means done equivalent justice to Mallarmé in the twenty-nine out of sixty-four translations he has made from the latter's "Poésies," now published, in a rather jumbled book, by New Directions, price $2. This edition includes the Fry translations with their French originals, the other poems in the French only, an introduction and commentaries on the poems by Charles Mauron, an early introduction by Roger Fry, a publisher's note, an appendix: did I say jumbled? M. Mauron's introduction is excellent; his remarks on obscurity in general, and Mallarmé's peculiar kinds of obscurity in particular, are very much to the point. His commentaries, however, serve to confuse the average reader, meaning in this case me, or to lead him up the garden of literary scholarship. One feels that the time would be better spent reading the original French two or three times extra. If Mr. Fry has not translated Mallarmé as well as Mr. Watkins has Heine, it must be said, of course, that the task was enormously more difficult. I am sure that Mr. Fry's interest, understanding, and devotion went much deeper into Mallarmé than Watkins's possibly could with the Heine North Sea poems, but in rendering the poems into English he makes the most ghastly elementary mistakes. Surely no good writer could ever have said, in any language, the equivalent of "and my lamp which nathless my agony knows," or "whose ecstasy pure lies in painting the end." Nathless and also whilst, forsooth! I suspect there are other misprints than the one (p. 51) which renders the first line of a sonnet sestet meaningless: "For Vice, having gnawed by nobleness inborn" ("Car le Vice, rongeant ma naïve noblesse").

I suppose every reader of The Nation realizes that Roger Fry was by no means the inept idiot that these brief excerpts make him appear; if the paragraph above seems an abuse to his memory, I should like to make amends by quoting M. Mauron: "He was so sociable that he could never enjoy anything without at once feeling the need to share it with those around him. Therein lay, I think, the secret of that equilibrium which to the last prevented him from growing old: the correction of fastidiousness by generosity, and of generosity by fastidiousness."

"A man," observes M. Mauron, "may be said to be characterized by his obsessions." It is with these that Theodore Roethke deals in his third book, "Praise to the End" (Doubleday, $3). The title strikes me as unhappy, in a kind of guarded way, suggesting both a kind of finality which Mr. Roethke would be the last to advertise and a cheery facile optimism he would be the first to deny. The poems here continue, as well as repeat, the themes of "The Lost Son"; what we are offered here is a sequence. With many a writer who affects to plumb the depths of his own unconscious, one feels that after he has dived into the bathysphere, he is only too apt to emerge with nothing but the bathetic—or the banal—and that if he comes up with something rich and strange, or only grotesque, one cannot feel sure but that he has planted his deep-sea bucket in advance with a few specimens of starfish and sea urchins, not to mention an old boot or two, just to make it look better. Mr. Roethke is more convincing; he has established, and this is a matter of technique as surely as feats of prosody, avenues of communication to his own unconsciousness. Poetry made from this relation is bound to be difficult, obscure, intensely personal; the question will always be whether the poet can reach the reader as he has reached himself. One difficulty (stet!—too perfect a keyboard-slip to lose) which the terminology of the unconscious offers, its censorship, its disguise through vagueness, Mr. Roethke has calculatedly removed; his metaphors and images, his very rhythms, have the direct impact of a fullback hitting the line on third down with two yards to go. The danger here is that the rhythms themselves will seem a little obsessed, and they are also astonishingly easy to imitate—I warn Mr. Roethke right now that within five years he is going to be flattered to loathing; samples have already begun to catch my notice.

The charge, to use Mr. Roethke's own term, is the most important thing; to whose interest some effects of subtlety must be sacrificed. But mark that subtlety is a relative term and be prepared to make some structural adaptations; an end-stopped line, for instance, may not sound to you, en plein air, exactly the same as it does to the poet coming up from full fathom five. Adept at breathing, so to speak, through his gills, Mr. Roethke seems to me a little less sure of himself when it is time to use his lungs; his Jubilates, if no less original, do seem less experienced than his Misereres—which, by the way, differ from most in having some humor in them. Still, it is asking a good deal of a poet to face and report the horrors of the fire and the slime-pit and in the next breath to think he did see all heaven before him and the great God himself. After all, this is a continuing sequence; give him time.

ALEXANDER POPE. By Bonamy Dobrée. Philosophical Library. $3. Most of us were told for examination purposes that Alexander Pope was a malicious monkey who turned Pegasus into a rocking horse. That estimate of both his character and his poetry has been undergoing steady revision for some years now, and the present charmingly written little book of 120 pages gives a compact summary of the results of the best modern scholarship. Mr. Dobrée, who frankly bases his conclusions on the work of various scholars, especially on that of George Sherburn, is concerned chiefly with Pope's character and draws an essentially sympathetic portrait without falling into the partisanship of Edith Sitwell's somewhat fanatical defense. Recommended to any reader who wants to be brought up to date pleasantly and briefly.

THE ILIAD OF HOMER. Translated, with an Introduction, by Richmond Lattimore. Chicago University Press. $4.50. Translations of the Iliad continue to pour from the presses, this being the third or fourth, or so it seems, within the last few minutes. Professor Lattimore's version, while less spectacular than his recent presentation of Pindar, is workmanlike and competent; his introduction is both painstaking and intelligent, and his prosody is cleanly handled.

REVIVALS tend to induce in everyone connected with them an attitude toward the play in question similar to that of a fond parent—an attitude at once patronizing and indulgent, apologetic and proud. I find the atmosphere this attitude creates extremely irritating because it makes for self-consciousness all around and particularly in the actors, and because it implies a demand that the play and the performance be judged not on their merits but on the basis of quite extraneous considerations.

Many a revival of Shakespeare and other old masters has been corroded by the atmosphere I have described; it hangs thick over ANTA's revival of Clifford Odets's "Golden Boy" (ANTA Theater). Its effects, I could not help thinking, were reflected in the two reviews I read. Brooks Atkinson of the Times succumbed completely to its moist warmth and basked in it as in a steam bath. To him, all was wonderful. Walter B. Kerr of the Herald Tribune did not succumb, but he obviously felt guilty and his dissent was apologetic.

"Golden Boy" is not a very good play. It is skilfully constructed, but its plot is patently contrived. It has passages that are well conceived and freshly written; it is also ridden with the most ordinary kind of fancy writing and with clichés of the socially conscious thirties.

Like most clichés these contain a modicum of truth but not enough to transform them into eternal verities, and they are only intermittently appropriate to the characters who propound them. It follows that some of the characterizations are authentic and some are not.

The characterization of the Golden Boy is defective on another score. His development is stated rather than demonstrated. In the beginning his passion for music, admittedly hard to portray, is not made manifest; his later passion to make money is not very convincing either, but rather taken for granted, since it is documented mainly by a brief scene which shows him lusting after big cars speeding by; finally, we are told that he has disintegrated, but the process has not been depicted.

John Garfield's performance of the part is better than the writing, but he cannot make up what it leaves out. Lee J. Cobb as the old Italian father is more than adequate in a set part that requires little acting. The parts of Tom Moody, the prize-fight manager, and of the Golden Boy's brother-in-law, Siggie, are well acted by Art Smith and Michael Lewin; likewise the very minor but amusing bit of the "ham" prize-fighter. These parts are also well written. For the rest, the characterizations are uneven, and I thought the acting remarkably bad. In one case at least the revival psychology was clearly responsible. The gangster originally was meant to be taken seriously, or so I presume. In this production he is played for laughs as if he were a period piece—which in the context of the play makes no sense whatever.

I take this to mean the recordings of Mozart concertos and Schubert piano works and the earliest recordings of Beethoven concertos previously issued here by Victor; but I hope it means also the ones not issued by Victor: the recent European recordings of, among other things, Beethoven's Concerto No. 4 and Mozart's Rondo K.511, with some of the most beautiful playing of Schnabel's career; the pre-war recording of Schubert's posthumous Sonata in B flat; and of course the Beethoven Sonata Society recordings—above all the ones of Opus 109 and Opus 111, which have not, like the others in the series, been available on HMV records, though his performances of these two works were among his outstanding achievements, and the performance of Opus 111 perhaps the most remarkable and memorable of all.

It was the more remarkable for being flawed in the way Schnabel's performances often were—by unprecise, confused execution of difficult passage-work, by excessive and distorting intensity. One hears nothing of that kind in the performance of Opus 111 by Solomon just issued on an RCA Victor LP—nothing but unfailing and amazing perfection in the execution of passage-work, the shaping of phrase. But one also hears in Solomon's performance nothing of the tension from one note to the next that was the distinctive feature of Schnabel's playing and the secret of its power—the tension, at once cohesive and expansive, which produced the propulsive continuity, the cumulative force of the wonderful progression in the second movement from the hushed mystery of Variation 4 to the superearthly illumination of the end. And so the progression has no such continuity and force in Solomon's perfect performance.

One of the year's worst LP couplings gives us this Opus 111 not with another of Beethoven's last sonatas, but with the "Pathétique." And of the two works, both transferred to LP from recent HMV 78's, it is the "Pathétique" that is excellently reproduced, and Opus 111 that comes off the record with thin, shallow sound and terrific surface and background noise.

Another bad Victor LP coupling gives us Mozart's Sonata K.576 and Scriabin's Sonata No. 4 for piano. The Mozart is a fine work, with some of his most developed and complex writing for the instrument; William Schatzkammer's performance of it is fluent and in good taste, though also without the tension that I spoke of a moment ago, and that I have heard impart more exciting life to Mozart's music.

Bach's great Passacaglia for organ is, for the first time, not only effectively played by Helmut Walcha but clearly reproduced by a Decca record which also offers his performance of the uninteresting Pastorale in F.

Five of Mahler's last songs, to poems of Rückert, contrast strikingly, in their somber mood and matured idiom, with the four songs from the early "Lieder aus der Jugendzeit" and the "Es sungen drei Engel" originally written as a movement of the Third Symphony. The early ones are sung engagingly, on the Vanguard record, by Anny Felbermayer, soprano, the late ones with vocal magnificence and expressive power by Alfred Poell, baritone; and there is fine playing by the Vienna State Opera Orchestra under Prohaska, which Vanguard again reproduces with a beauty of sound that I haven't heard from other recordings of this orchestra.

The folksong-like substance of Janacek's Sinfonietta is quite engaging in the third and fourth movements, and the fifth builds up an impressive conclusion with its unusual number of brass instruments. The performance by the Symphony Orchestra of Radio Leipzig under Vaclav Neumann is reproduced with harsh distortion in the climaxes. On the same Urania record the charming Rossini-Respighi "Rossiniana" is played with insufficient animation and grace by the Berlin State Opera Orchestra under Hans Steinkopf; and the recorded sound of loud passages is gritty and harsh.

Period has issued a Russian recording of Prokofiev's Violin Concerto No. 1 which makes the tone of the great violinist Oistrakh gritty and ear-lacerating, the sound of the orchestra distant and dim; and as it approaches the center of the record the conclusion of the work is enveloped in a hash of distortion. Most of the record is taken up by Miaskovsky's Violin Concerto.

Not very interesting to my ears were Mozart's Piano Concerto K.451, well played by Jeannette Haie with the National Gallery Orchestra under Bales (WCFM); Haydn's Symphony No. 22 and Concerto in F for violin and harpsichord, both stolidly performed by the London Baroque Ensemble under Karl Haas with Jean Pougnet, violinist, and Lionel Salter, harpsichordist (Decca). And things to skip are the seventeen-year-old Strauss's Violin Concerto and eighty-year-old Strauss's Oboe Concerto, excellently played by Siegfried Borries, violinist, and Erich Ertel, oboist, and the Symphony Orchestra of Radio Berlin under Artur Rother (Urania); also the Vladimir Rosing performances of Musorgsky songs reissued on LP by Decca.

MY SON JOHN," the story of a traitor out of Anytown, U. S. A., goes across the screen dodging its point with all the deftness of a suspense yarn. The point was to show you the heart of a home-grown Communist as well as his day-to-day scurrings in the red network, but all you get is generalized bombast in his folks' idealized democratic household and familiar tear-jerking situations. Plotwise, a bright shy boy goes into government work and, reversing "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington," becomes a top Soviet spy. Back home for a rare visit, he mentions a speech he is to make to the graduating class of his old Alma Mater, and the content of that speech gets him into a dozen angry arguments on communism with his folks, who are charter members of the church and the Legion, and inspire each other with lingo from the gridiron ("Take the ball, John!"). An amiable FBI agent keeps poking around the neighborhood, and pretty soon the mother discovers the truth about her favorite son, leading to tear-duct scenes as she teeters on the edge of insanity and soul-stirring shots of the son's face as he begins to see the democratic light (in one silent stretch, shadows play over the face, changing it back and forth from Judas Iscariot's to Abe Lincoln's). The rest is mechanical fireworks: the flight from his co-spies, his bullet-ridden car spinning up the steps of the Lincoln Memorial, and the tape-recorded recantation of the dead ex-Communist played back to the empty faces of the sweet, innocent graduates.

With Helen Hayes, the late Robert Walker, and director Leo McCarey—the latter a social philosopher who makes platitudes boom like the truth—heavily involved in "My Son John," no one is going to fall asleep for want of effervescent dramatics. McCarey tries to stop United States youth from falling for the party line with the same formula he used in the past to get the kids off the street and into church—that is, tears, faith, and solid red-blooded Americanism. It is done with such earnestness as to be slow-moving, but the actors are masters of intricate timing and intonation and have the easy spontaneity and control to put across a story that is mostly talk in parlor, bedroom, and bath. Walker, with his unhealthy face and blunt sincerity, plays the traitor in a way that makes you marvel at how much this craggy, solemn-toned actor learned about his business and the people outside it in the last few years of his life. He was, I think, the first great actor to turn up in decades of films, one who reminds me only of silent geniuses like Conrad Veidt, Keaton, or an awkward, sour, dissipated version of Barthelmess. Helen Hayes plays the manic mother with all the eccentric wallop of Eleanora Duse doing a Krafft-Ebing rewrite of "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch." With Frank McHugh making you feel happy that he is back in films and McCarey working powerfully in the new style of close-ups, disembodied faces, and immobilized groupings, the movie is worth seeing, if only to dig Hollywood's latest political orientation.

Two Works of Art that reek with social therapy and old-fashioned technique—everything from grainy photography to sentimental curlicues—are in the neighborhood, occupying the bottom half of double bills. The quaint adolescent study called "The Big Night" is so slow, murkily lit, and incoherently involved with the meek pantomime of John Barrymore, Jr., that it might make more sense if the reels were run backward. However, "On Dangerous Ground" almost achieves a success in spite of itself. In the first place, it has to worry over the old chestnut about reform of the incorrigible by sweetness and trust—personified this time by a blind, tottering Ida Lupino who inspires cop Robert Ryan to mend his brutal ways. In the second place, it is tied to the idea that anything that moves makes a good motion-picture. The movie is a treadmill of stumbling, fumbling, smooching, hurtling movement, and by the time it reaches the run-down of an adolescent murderer over half the snow-covered hills of northern California, the customer is as fed up with motion as the panting actors. But the story is told with a camera and a rather unorthodox one, though it is often late to the scene and not sure of what is about to happen. Some of the support—Ward Bond and Anthony Ross—is good, but the chief virtue of the film is the fascinating jumble of action that results when two awkward, determined characters (Bond and Ryan) try to outlaw each other at the job of detecting.

Malthus's Assumptions

Dear Sirs: Many of your readers will welcome, as I do, Professor de Castro's article The Malthusian Scarecrow, which appeared in your February 16 issue. Professor de Castro rightly points out that the Malthusian theory "survives the facts which contradict it because it can be used to rationalize various interests and situations." Out of his own special knowledge Professor de Castro has made a valuable contribution toward refuting Malthusian dogma with facts. This he has done well in discussing the relation between food supply and population and possible new sources of food.

I regret, however, that Professor de Castro found it necessary to use additional arguments which seem to be less well supported by facts. While it is true that economically backward populations tend to have a high birth rate, this does not mean that malnutrition is the cause of high fertility. I do not myself know the literature on starvation and estrogen content, but I would question that a direct correlation has been established between estrogen levels and fertility.

Nor, despite Professor de Castro's claim, do his figures on the Japanese population increase from 1945 to 1949 prove his point that a low nutritional level causes overpopulation. The population of the United States grew about as fast as—or a little faster than—Japan's during the same period.

The explanation for poverty does not lie in the realm of social phenomena, just as the explanation for poverty does not lie in "overpopulation," but in the character of social institutions. Professor de Castro himself recognized this when he pointed out that "political and economic conditions placed a premium on large families" in the early United States. . . .

The important point to remember about Malthus is that his avowed aim was to combat the egalitarian movements of his day. . . . His theory "appeared at a time," says the Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences, "when the upper classes, terrified by the French Revolution, found in it a much-needed justification for the existing order against the radical proposals of Godwin and Condorcet." . . . Malthus believed that the poor of his day would learn from his "population principle" . . . that the principal and most permanent cause of poverty has little or no direct relation to forms of government or the unequal division of property." Neo-Malthusians have been disappointed when the poor refused to agree. . . . The day may not be too distant, when the people of "China and elsewhere," having overcome the social causes of their poverty, will have also starved out the neo-Malthusian form of genocide.

Fewer Gadgets, More Safety?

Dear Sirs: Leonard Engel's article Plane Facts, which appeared in your March 8 issue, oversimplifies the problem of improving airline safety. The article tends to give the impression that technical improvements in the airplanes themselves are all that is needed to make commercial aviation safe for those below as well as those aloft. While many recent accidents appear to have been due to technical failures, the over-all accident statistics indicate that bad weather is at least an equally important cause.

The airplane Mr. Engel suggests—namely, one with a large wing surface in proportion to its weight, low speed, and few "gadgets"—is exactly the airliner of the early years of commercial aviation, when the accident rate was far greater than it is today. The DC-3 has these characteristics to a considerable degree, but the figures do not show that commercial flying was any safer when it was used almost exclusively by the airlines of this country. . . .

Since each of the hundreds of instruments used in a modern plane is a safety feature, eliminating any of them, as Mr. Engel suggests, would be foolish until something better is developed.

Mr. Engel's suggestion of the "Ercoupe" as a prototype for large commercial airliners shows a lamentable lack of understanding of the relative requirements of commercial and private flying. The unique safety feature of the Ercoupe is the elimination of the inadvertent stall—a frequent cause of accidents in amateur flying but never encountered in airline operation. As for the Ercoupe being "the plane of the future," there is plenty of opinion to the contrary among pilots who have flown it, including myself.

That improvement in airline safety is desirable no one will deny. But it will not be obtained by returning to lower speeds and fewer instruments. Continued study and improvement of all phases of airline operation is the only practical answer.

Of Vital Importance to Every Parent and Teacher

SPECIAL INTERESTS with selfish motives are fighting today for control of the minds of youth. In a democracy, this is everybody's concern; and everybody should know the facts. They are presented in a pamphlet, THE BATTLE FOR FREE SCHOOLS, made up of eight articles by able and fearless educators. These articles describe the serious crisis faced by our schools, show that the attacks on democratic public education are increasing to an alarming extent, and discuss other problems vital to teachers, parents, and school boards. Edited by Dr. Theodore Brameld, professor of educational philosophy at New York University, they appeared recently in The Nation. They include:

- I. FEVER SPOTS IN AMERICAN EDUCATION
By Morris Mitchell, director of the Putney (Vermont) Graduate School of Teacher Education.
- II. TEACHERS AND THE "THING"
By Goodwin Watson, professor of education at Teachers College, Columbia University, author of "Action for Unity," and other books.

Will the South Bolt?

BY ROBERT E. WILLIAMS

AROUND THE U. S. A.

America Plus, Inc.

San Francisco

A NEW outfit called America Plus, Inc., is sponsoring a "Freedom of Choice" initiative measure to amend California's constitution. Solicitors are collecting dimes to defray the cost of getting 305,000 signatures before June 6 to qualify the measure for the November, 1952, ballot. Sponsors of the amendment firmly believe that they have found a gimmick by which it may be possible to annul the gains achieved in the past decade through civil-rights and fair-practices legislation.

The amendment implies that any civil-rights legislation prohibiting discrimination is "unreasonable." It purports to give owners of private property "freedom" to choose their neighbors, and business men freedom to choose their employees and customers. In a word, it would legalize almost any type of discrimination against just about any class of persons.

From the background of the sponsors, one can safely infer that should this measure be adopted only right-wing, isolationist Americans of indisputable Anglo-American antecedents would be immune to discrimination. The honorary national chairman of America Plus is State Senator Jack B. Tenney of Los Angeles County. Tenney, who also heads Americans for MacArthur, recently had to defend America Plus against the charge of anti-Semitism. His defense was simply that it is "pro-American." Tenney's conception of Americanism is indicated by his admiration for McCarthyism, which, according to him, "is beginning to mean courage and patriotism against overwhelming odds."

Once a leading left-wing Democrat, Tenney is now a staunch Republican. He served as chairman of the legislature's committee on un-American activities until lobbyist Artie Samish—a credit to Artie for this one—managed to have him removed from the committee. To Tenney's work on the committee, however, Californians are indebted for the list of "subversive" organizations which recently figured in the Lieutenant Governor's denunciation of the state Superintendent of Education, also a registered Republican, as a dupe of socialism. Arguing that a series of textbooks chosen by a state-wide commission for use in the public schools showed a leftist coloration, Tenney successfully opposed their adoption. The books were later used by the United States navy. To date Tenney has not chosen to attack the navy, but he denounced the United Nations as an "international monstrosity." He is now a candidate for Congress in the Twenty-second Congressional District of California.

Whether persons belonging to labor unions might escape discrimination under the amendment is still uncertain, as the final draft has not been prepared. Meanwhile, a brochure put out by America Plus declares that it gives business men the right to refuse employment to any person but that this right can be restricted by contract. It is possible that the final draft of the act will so expand the employer's "freedom of choice" as to invalidate union-shop clauses in collective-bargaining agreements.

Everyone with a bona fide signature and a dime is being encouraged to sign the petitions. The America Plus brochure appears to argue that a Negro, for instance, or a Jew, might find it to his interest to sign if he happens to operate a hotel, bar, skating rink, or other private business, since he would be able, under the amendment, to refuse service to any class of persons he desired, say, to whites or Gentiles. As a property-owner, he could even contract with his neighbors to keep old-line Anglo-Saxon, white Protestants in another part of town.

On the eve of the Republican and Democratic nominating conventions America Plus plans to hold a "Continental Congress" and then to ask both conventions to concur in resolutions adopted there. In this manner it hopes to launch a national movement to quash all anti-discrimination laws—local, state, and federal. At the least, it believes, the America Plus resolutions might lessen Governor Warren's chance of winning the Republican nomination. Tenney, it should be noted, has sided with a curious Republican splinter group that is trying its best to break Warren, even at the risk of splitting the Republican Party in California. He was one of the speakers at a "hate Warren" dinner of California Republicans held in Los Angeles last November.

The America Plus movement, with its pro-MacArthur, hate-Warren overtones, is supported by the Wage-Earners' Committee of Los Angeles. There seems also to be some "oil money" behind it. Indeed, the movement may turn out to be a simple front for a "stop Warren" delegation. Governor Warren has some powerful Republican enemies these days in California, including John Francis Neylan and L. M. Giannini (Bank of America), both of whom are bitter about his opposition to the regents' loyalty oath at the University of California. At the same time, of course, America Plus hopes to gain some support from the Dixiecrats at the Democratic convention, thereby sharpening the dilemma which the Democrats face on civil-rights matters.

Meanwhile universities—Santa Clara amendment ulty-sponsor seven other the state are The ultim Plus include Bill of Rig United State California is its ideas. If ceeds here, into other s its organizer

RUSSIA'S LATEST PROPOSAL ON GERMANY appears more serious with every day that passes. Fear is seeping through the Atlantic community that this time Moscow is not bluffing but calling our bluff, forcing us either to stand by our commitment to a united, democratically established Germany or openly to renounce it. The caution displayed by the Western nations in preparing an answer to the Soviet note reveals their awareness of the dilemma in which they seem to be caught. No matter what they say—their reply has not been finally approved as this issue goes to press—they can hardly do more than temporize. They may insist that before they consider Russia's terms, the United Nations Commission now attempting to find out whether the conditions for free elections exist must be allowed to pursue its inquiry in East Germany. They may try to argue that the day of national armies is passed and that German forces can "safely" be allowed only as part of the army of the Western alliance. But these devices make sense only if the Moscow proposal is not genuine. If Moscow is really prepared to pay the price it has offered to keep West Germany out of the Atlantic alliance, the West will have to raise the Russian bid or watch Adenauer go down to defeat along with his pro-Allied policy.

JUST AS THE WESTERN NATIONS AGREED, under American pressure, to arm the Germans in order to contain Russian strength, so Moscow is prepared to arm them in order to contain the Atlantic alliance. The risks must have been carefully calculated in advance. If Moscow's plan prevails, Germany will soon be the strongest European power this side of the Soviet frontier, and the fate of the Continent will depend on which way that power leans. The Kremlin may believe it can make a deal with a restored German state, a new Rapallo; but it may be satisfied for the present merely to deprive the Atlantic community of the core of its armed strength, and, relying on the complementary nature of Russian and German interests, to draw the two powers together in the future. Whatever the Kremlin's calculations, its offer to negotiate a general peace treaty with a unified sovereign Germany, assured in advance of a national defense force and a revived arms industry, with no restrictions placed on the use of Nazi officers and servicemen, has sent a chill through Europe. Even the satellite states show signs of fright, as indeed they should. For a rearmed German nation is a nightmare which cannot be exorcised by any formula of "neutralization." Russia's move is as dangerous as it is bold and shrewd, with possible consequences too far-reaching even to be guessed at today.

"UNLESS VIGOROUS PROTEST IS MADE . . . Congress is likely soon to pass a bill on immigration, naturalization, and nationality which has in it elements that are both obnoxious and dangerous." That is what The Nation said editorially last July 21 of the McCarran omnibus immigration measure. Since that time the bill and its House equivalent, the Walter bill, have been subjected to certain changes. But on the basis of the analysis of the two bills in their present form which appears on page 299 of this issue, we see no reason to alter our original opinion. The bills are still racist in concept, destructive of civil rights, and in general cut closer to the measure of a police state than to American democracy. The Walter bill may come up for debate on the floor of the House some time next week. Like its Senate equivalent, it is an extremely long and complicated measure whose terms are little known to any but a handful of House members. Certain alternative proposals—the Humphrey-Lehman bill in the Senate and the Roosevelt bill in the House—have never had hearings. The Nation urges its readers to wire their Representatives at once asking them to vote for recommitment of the Walter bill, thus assuring its reconsideration in the light of an informed public opinion and of the alternatives put forward by Roosevelt in the House and Humphrey and Lehman in the Senate.

THE AIR FORCE HAS ANNOUNCED THAT IT will not renew the six-month contract given to Dr. Walter P. On the basis of his Nazi record and involvement in war crimes, the Boston chapter of the Physician's Forum had protested his presence here. News reports indicate that Dr. Schreiber is now insisting on a public hearing before, presumably, he is sent back to Germany. We think Dr. Schreiber should be granted his request. It would be instructive to hear from him how Nazi medical science, under his supervision and with his collaboration, degenerated to the inhuman butchering of thousands of concentration-camp inmates in the name of "experimental research." It would be even more instructive to learn from him the identity of the person or persons responsible for inviting him here in the first place. A second public hearing would then be in order.

AS WAS ANTICIPATED BY THE NATION IN ITS issue of March 15 the Feinberg law has now been invoked by its intended victims. Arguing that under the law only the state Board of Regents, and not the Superintendent of Schools in New York City, can prosecute their clients, attorneys for eight teachers facing departmental trials won a stay last week from Lewis A. Wilson, Commissioner of Education. In the end the courts will have to decide the issue. But in the meantime—to quote Rose Russell of the Teachers' Union—"it is truly ironic that the teachers should have to look to the Feinberg law for protection." True enough. Up to the very moment that the Supreme Court upheld its constitutionality, the teachers—were arguing—and continue to argue today—that it is a vicious law which violates the Bill of Rights and whose only practical effect can be to put teachers into mental strait-jackets and to turn children into FBI spies. Nevertheless, the Feinberg law does preserve some modicum of protection for persons and organizations charged under its provisions. No organization can be listed as subversive, for instance, except after proper hearing; individuals are entitled to an open hearing and have the right of review in the courts. The safeguards are absent from the procedures being followed by Superintendent Jansen of New York City's school system, which have already resulted in suspension of teachers without fair hearings. The Feinberg law, bad as it is, is the teacher's only recourse at the present time.

SENATOR McCARTHY'S FOOTWORK MUST BE the envy of the entire lightweight division. When the press attacks him, he appeals to the advertisers. When a Senate subcommittee attacks him, he appeals to the press. When a fellow-Senator attacks him, he appeals to television. The only thing he never does is stand and fight his attacker. He has, at the moment, two admirable opportunities to do so. Seven months ago Senator Benton submitted 30,000 words of documented charges against McCarthy before the Senate subcommittee on privileges and elections. Last week Benton, in a stirring floor speech ably supported by Senator Lehman, declared: "I herewith offer unequivocally to waive any immunity which I may enjoy under the Constitution or under the Senate rules if any question of my personal legal responsibility is ever raised." In other words, he waived Congressional immunity and challenged McCarthy to take him to court. This is one fight the Senator from Wisconsin can take on. The other is the challenge issued by the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration, which has asked the Wisconsin Senator to repeat to the Senate as a formal motion of censure what he had already told the press—that is, that the subcommittee on privileges and elections is biased and prejudiced. McCarthy will take up neither challenge. This is as certain as the fact that the Senator from Wisconsin will run for reelection in November.

Spotlight on Wisconsin

THE strong showing made by General Eisenhower in the New Hampshire and Minnesota primaries has clarified the fight for the Republican nomination by greatly reducing the margins of error. There was nothing surprising about the returns—the polls indicated which way the wind was blowing—but the political effect of reasonable anticipation is very different from that of proved fact. Eisenhower's remarkable popularity is no longer a matter of conjecture; it has been confirmed in the only way that carries real conviction to politicians—by votes cast. Even the General's backers were so reluctant to take his popularity for granted that they permitted Harold Stassen to bluff them out of Minnesota's delegates on the basis of three or four meetings at which Stassen drew fairly large crowds. But now a chain-reaction has been set in motion: Taft has withdrawn from the New Jersey primary—a damaging admission of weakness—and a long line has suddenly formed for the Eisenhower bandwagon.

The spotlight, of course, now shifts to Wisconsin. Should Taft fail to win by an impressive margin in the April 1 primary, he might just as well concede the nomination to Eisenhower. Although it has been clear from the outset that Governor Earl Warren is a stand-in for Eisenhower in Wisconsin, the pro-Eisenhower elements who organized the Warren delegation are abandoning the pretense that Warren is a candidate in his own right. It is difficult, of course, for one man to campaign as the proxy for another, but in the special circumstances which prevail in Wisconsin there is reason to believe that it can be done successfully. The pro-Eisenhower forces have sufficient time to establish the fact, by meetings, radio, and the press, that a vote for Earl is a vote for Ike. Besides, Governor Warren is an ideal stand-in candidate. He is discreet, cautious, reasonably affable, and he likes to affect a self-effacing manner. He will not kick over any traces or commit any indiscretions. He will also draw some votes in his own right, for he has made a good impression in Wisconsin, where his matter-of-fact style of campaigning underscores the old-fashioned shrillness and absurdity of Taft's table-thumping tactics. Warren is not the usual "stalking horse" candidate in any case, for what he lacks in glamour he more than offsets by his possession of real political riches. Wisconsin is quite a distance from Sacramento, but Wisconsin voters are not likely to overlook the fact that Warren has one of the largest state delegations in his vest pocket.

As the Eisenhower sun moves to the zenith, the crisis in the Democratic Party will rapidly deepen. It is already apparent that the President and his top party advisers have lost command of the situation. Mr. Truman made the mistake of thinking that he could hold delegations without becoming a candidate for reelection. The device of using popular pro-Truman "favorite sons" to control key delegations might have worked had it not been for Senator Kefauver's brashness in insisting that he was not only Tennessee's favorite son but every other state's favorite son as well. When he entered the New Hampshire primary, a state which lacked a strong favorite-son candidate, the fat was in the fire. The President was then forced to reverse his position and did so in a belated and awkward manner. The write-in vote for Kefauver in Minnesota—where he had expressly withdrawn from the race—is an even stronger indication of the dissatisfaction with Truman's leadership than the heavy vote for Eisenhower. The President may be surrounded by sycophants and yes-men, but he still has access to the election returns, and the returns from the primaries in New Hampshire and Minnesota can hardly have encouraged him to seek reelection.

The more apparent it becomes that Truman will not run the more difficult it will be for him to steer the Democratic convention. It is always hard for an outgoing President to dominate his party on the eve of a convention; it becomes doubly so when, as now appears to be the case, the President permits the situation to get out of hand. At the same time, as the Eisenhower boom grows, the likelihood diminishes that Governor Adlai Stevenson will want to try for the nomination. Both on the West Coast and in New England, moreover, it is already somewhat late to launch a strong campaign for Governor Stevenson. In fact, the greater Eisenhower's chances for the Republican nomination, the more fluid the Democratic situation becomes, especially since few clear-cut tests seem to be shaping up in the remaining primaries. Thus the curtain may well rise on a Democratic convention without any strong grouping of delegations having been formed to fill the vacuum—an ideal situation for the emergence of a dark horse.

On the other hand, tensions in the Taft-McCarthy-MacArthur wing of the Republican Party will also be increased as the Eisenhower stock goes up. Given the degree of paranoia that exists in this quarter, it is reasonable to anticipate an outbreak of self-destructive violence in the form of wild charges, denunciations, and a reckless use of smear tactics that will only further isolate Taft. The difficulty that the Taft-McCarthy-MacArthur elements face is that they have been outmaneuvered. Eisenhower enjoys the advantage of being billed as the candidate of the "liberal" wing of the Republican Party when in fact he is probably also the candidate of the solid right wing—as distinguished from the diminishing "isolationist" right wing. The forces that Taft heads constitute not so much a "wing" of the party these days as a formation of lost battalions trying to fight their way back, with much bombastic rhetoric, to the safety of Fort William McKinley. Now that the Eisenhower movement has outflanked these battalions, the time has come for a hard drive at the center of the line. Wisconsin is the battleground for this drive. Should Taft's line fail to hold there, it will only remain for General Eisenhower to take charge of the final mopping-up operations. The time for his return would seem to be shortly after the Wisconsin primary. New Hampshire and Minnesota were recruiting campaigns; Wisconsin is the scene of the first major engagement. It may prove, also, to be the last.

South Africa's Crises

IN THE midst of celebrations of "three hundred years of progress," South Africa finds itself plunged into a grave constitutional crisis and, what is more serious, facing on April 6 the opening of a movement of civil disobedience by its oppressed native population. For both situations the Nationalist government headed by Dr. Daniel F. Malan, which took office in 1948, is squarely responsible. In accordance with its policy of Apartheid (separation), it has passed a series of measures discriminating against the non-European elements of the community—Negro, colored, and Asiatic—and taking from them their already limited political, social, and economic rights.

One of these measures, the Separate Registration of Voters Act, which removes colored (half-caste) voters in the Cape province from the common electoral roll, has been found unconstitutional by the Supreme Court because it was passed by a bare majority of both houses of Parliament instead of by a two-thirds' vote of a combined session, as the constitution requires. Infuriated by this ruling, Dr. Malan has declared that the government will move to prevent the courts from passing on the validity of legislation, a threat that if carried into effect would be a long step toward the dictatorship which his opponents assert is his final aim.

It is doubtful, however, if the Nationalists are yet in a position to take so drastic a step. They have gone a considerable way toward purging the army of "unreliable" elements and have begun to build up a party auxiliary force, the Skietcommando, modeled on Hitler's S. A. and S. S. But their high-handed methods have aroused opposition among Europeans as well as natives. Last year a former R. A. F. officer, Adolph G. Malan, a distant cousin of the Premier's, founded the Torch Commando with the express object of rallying anti-Nationalist sentiment. Joined by thousands of veterans, this has rapidly become a formidable organization and one that would probably present a serious obstacle to a government coup.

The Torch Commando, which seems to have put new life into the lethargic official opposition, the South African Party, should also serve to check the Nationalists if Malan decides to fortify himself in a contest with the courts by seeking a new mandate. At the last general election the Nationalists failed to obtain a majority of the popular vote; their narrow victory was due to over-representation of the rural areas where they have their greatest strength. There is little reason to suppose they would do better now, and they might very well lose the narrow margin of seats by which they control Parliament. Thus Malan appears to be at the end of his political tether unless he can create a situation which will enable him to seize the role of indispensable savior of the white race. April 6 may offer him the opportunity.

Last December the African National Congress, the largest and most representative native group in South Africa, decided that the time had come for action against the Apartheid program, which was condemning their people to perpetual helotry. It called, therefore, for immediate repeal of the discriminatory laws and, failing satisfaction, determined to launch on April 6 a campaign of mass civil disobedience. Malan's only reply was a warning that any disorders would be "dealt with."

While the African leaders hope to restrict their followers to passive resistance—they cannot hope to challenge the guns and tanks of the whites—they know that the result of their action will probably be bloody massacre. When it comes to native demonstrations, South African police are quick on the trigger, and the history of that unhappy land is full of tales of unarmed, orderly groups of natives shot down just because they had gathered to protest against some injustice. Usually that has been the end of the "incident," but this time, if the whites begin shooting, they may provoke a despairing revolt from one end of the country to the other.

That in turn would create a hysteria of fear in the white population, which is outnumbered by the non-white elements four or five to one, and give Malan a chance to proclaim martial law and swoop down on his enemies of all races. But it would also reveal to the world the rotten foundations of white supremacy in South Africa. Such bloody publicity, many natives have come to believe, is essential if they are ultimately to regain their freedom.

Fair Offer on Steel

BY WILLARD SHELTON

Washington

WITH long faces and the usual wailing about poverty, the powerful steel companies last week-end faced the crucial decision of whether or not to force a strike by the United Steelworkers in order to compel the government to authorize price increases covering—or more than covering—the entire wage-increase “package” recommended by the Wage Stabilization Board.

Nathan P. Feinsinger, W. S. B. chairman, correctly described the proposed settlement as a “darn good” one. It was good not only because it was acceptable to the union but also because the board had skilfully avoided two dangerous possibilities. It set no formal pattern for annual “productivity” wage increases—based on the assumption that output per man hour has risen—and declined to make a formal decision that would have caused January, 1951, to be dropped as the month from which to calculate cost-of-living increases.

The wage settlement was hastily publicized as proposing a 17½-cent hourly wage increase plus “fringe” benefits variously calculated as equivalent to from 5.1 cents to 9 cents an hour. Actually the recommended basic increase was less than 17½ cents. Spread across the entire year and a half of the proposed contract period, from January 1, 1952, to June 30, 1953, the flat wage increase averages 15 cents an hour. It begins with 12½ cents, retroactive to January, adds 2½ cents on July 1, and adds another 2½ cents on January 1, 1953.

In return for this the union accepted the W. S. B. recommendation of a no-strike contract lasting for eighteen months—six months longer than is customary. It waived in advance any claim for increases following future rises in living costs and did not insist on productivity increases comparable to those in United Automobile Workers' contracts, in which 4 cents is added annually to the basic wage scale. Both these demands are swallowed up in the July and January 2½-cent increases, which average out to 3.75 cents an hour for the year beginning July 1—less than the U. A. W. members get in productivity increases alone. Industry members who filed angry dissents to the proposals of the labor and public members of the W. S. B. carefully avoided dealing with the fact that the United Steelworkers might have been entitled to considerably more money had the public members accepted a different formula.

The last “free” contract negotiated by the union and the steel companies was signed in October, 1950. In the next few months there was a terrific spurt in living costs. By W. S. B. figures the men were entitled to 9 cents more an hour to match the rise in consumer prices from January, 1951, to January, 1952. The union would have won an additional 8 cents—a total of 17 cents—had the board reverted to the October, 1950, contract date instead of keeping the January, 1951, base period. It got only 12½ cents effective at once, and part of that may be spread around, through collective bargaining, to meet union demands for larger shift and grade differentials.

Industry spokesmen have for months been using every available forum to announce that they could not afford a penny more in higher costs and to warn that “another round” of wage increases would be followed inevitably by price rises spreading through the entire economy and starting another spiral of inflation. Not until last week did industry members of the Wage Board finally agree that they might tolerate a total wage rise of 13.7 cents an hour. There was danger, in fact, that practically all standards of wage stabilization might be wrecked in the steel controversy. If the Wage Board had granted a full 17-cent basic cost-of-living increase and in addition had felt compelled to grant “productivity” increases, hundreds of other unions would have demanded the same benefits.

On the subsidiary issues there is a hollow sound to the industry's outcry about “fringe” raises won by the union and about the W. S. B.'s recommendation of a union shop. Most of the fringe increases are awarded in the form of six paid holidays a year. Does the steel industry hope to maintain forever a substandard contract under which workers get no paid holidays? Thousands of contracts in other industries now provide for them; the steel companies have simply been behind the parade.

The companies make a tremendous uproar about the government “dictating” the union shop. Why should the government have to “dictate” it? The union shop is established practice in American industry. The theory that workers should not be forced to become union members can be effectively reversed: the majority that want a union shop should not be forced to work side by side with others who take all the benefits the union wins but refuse to bear their share of the union's expenses or help decide its policies. The argument disappears in any case in view of the fact that the steel companies already have closed-shop contracts with unions other than the United Steelworkers—with coal miners and railroad workers, with building-trades workers and other employees.

THE issue now is prices. Ellis Arnall, Economic Stabilization Director, has testified that the steel companies are entitled to one price rise based on the Capehart amendment—to compensate for all higher costs experienced through July, 1951—and possibly to another if it can be shown that higher wages impose an inequity. Every industry has a right to prices that bring profits up to 85 per cent of earnings in three of the four years of the 1946-49 base period. Twice in the post-war years the steel companies have refused to raise wages until promised price rises. The Office of Price Stabilization has statistics indicating that steel earnings are high enough to bear a substantial increase in costs without higher prices.

There will be no steel strike—not even a short one—if the companies accept the W. S. B. proposals. The union has repeatedly postponed strike action to give the board a chance to complete its complex calculations and negotiations. Honest bargaining on issues left unsettled by the board and a willingness by the companies to work out price problems through processes already available under the Defense Production Act would make a work stoppage in the basic steel industry completely unnecessary.

Will the South Bolt?

BY ROBERT E. WILLIAMS

Raleigh, North Carolina

IN CHOOSING Senator Richard B. Russell of Georgia as their standard bearer the leaders of the "Stop Truman and Trumanism" movement in the South undoubtedly made the best possible selection for accomplishing their purposes in the Democratic National Convention. Whether Senator Russell will also serve their ends after the convention is a different question. But by accepting his leadership the original "rebels" have to a large extent transferred from themselves to him the power of decision. Senator Russell's opinions and not those of Senator Byrd or Governor Byrnes or Governor Talmadge will be sought by the men trying to work out a platform that will prevent a split in the party. And in all probability Senator Russell will decide whether the revolt is to die with the convention or to be carried on by means of a splinter party. Certainly, it would be difficult for the anti-Truman movement to obtain popular support in the South without the aid of the man chosen to lead it.

Russell's record and point of view—except on civil rights and states' rights—are very different from those of Harry F. Byrd, James F. Byrnes, or Herman Talmadge. Russell does not show Byrd's ultra-conservatism, Byrnes's personal antagonism to President Truman, or Talmadge's demagoguery. But he has a larger following than these men or anyone associated with them, and circumstances made them need his leadership. It was obtained only after considerable pressure had been exerted in his home state.

The circumstances which confronted the leaders of the revolt were President Truman's refusal to say whether or not he would be a candidate and the uncertainty as to the Republicans' choice. Their primary objective is the defeat of President Truman, and they want that defeat to be utter and complete. They want not only to prevent the election of Truman but also to make certain that nobody who is backed by Truman or who supports the Roosevelt or Truman programs becomes President.

It is not remotely probable that the rebels will get all they want at the Democratic National Convention, or even that they will get enough to satisfy them. Senator Russell will undoubtedly be more easily satisfied. The risk of choosing a leader who might not go all the way with them had to be taken in order to obtain a standard bearer certain to make a better showing at the convention than they themselves could hope to make.

Senator Russell's qualifications were clearly revealed at the 1948 convention. The 1948 revolt was headed by a weaker set of men than is the present movement. Ben T. Laney, then Governor of Arkansas, was considered the strongest of the lot and was chosen as the candidate to present to the convention, but it soon became apparent that he could not command anything approaching a solid Southern front. At the last minute Senator Russell, who had previously stood aloof but had been disgruntled by the adoption of a strong civil-rights plank, was induced to let his name go before the convention.

Most of the South rallied behind Truman. Nowhere was his strength demonstrated more plainly than in the North Carolina delegation, which contained more pro-Truman members than any other from the South. When the delegation was elected, it was expected that all but one or two of its thirty-two votes would be cast for Truman, and the expectation held until Russell entered the field. The Senator's friendships with the delegates, plus the feeling engendered by the platform fight, so changed matters that Truman got only fourteen of the thirty-two votes, the remaining eighteen going to Russell.

Russell is stronger now than he was in 1948. His leadership is more widely accepted in the Senate, and his reputation throughout the country was enhanced by his handling of the MacArthur investigation.

What course will he follow in the convention and afterward? And will his course be satisfactory to those who induced him to enter the race? No one can answer those questions categorically. Senator Russell himself does not pretend to be able to do so. He has declined to speculate on whether he will lead or join a splinter-party movement, but he always takes pains to remind his questioners that he did not bolt in 1948, although tremendous efforts were made to get him to do so. That reminder is important, but not necessarily controlling. If the present and future can be judged by the past, Senator Russell's course in the convention is reasonably certain. He will oppose the renomination of President Truman to the last roll call. If President Truman is not a candidate and Russell cannot obtain the nomination for himself—he has no illusions about his chances—he will exercise his judgment as to other candidates. He has recently opened headquarters in Washington and launched a national campaign for convention votes.

Russell supported the so-called court-packing bill in 1937 and has been more consistently pro-Administration than any other Southern Senator except Kefauver, Hill, and Sparkman. But he shares the views of the most rabid Southerners on some phases of civil rights and states' rights. Even on those questions, however, he is more amenable to compromise than many others on his own and the other side. His state abolished the poll tax as a prerequisite for voting some years ago and is the only state in the Union permitting eighteen-year-olds to vote. But he is quick to resent anything he construes as an affront to the South. On his record Senator Russell may be expected to go into the convention in good faith, and to accept its verdict unless he feels that the South has been treated unfairly. On that point he is less sensitive than some of his colleagues but by no means free from emotion.

The Southern revolt has become more respectable and more responsible by its acquisition of Senator Russell as leader. If he should refuse to carry on after the convention, the movement would lose much of its impetus. Its eventual course will depend to a considerable extent on the action of the Republican convention. The Southerners who would like to see Senator Taft the next President concede that they could not carry the South for him, even if they supported him openly and President Truman were his opponent.

There is little danger that Senator Russell will head a third party merely to serve as a stalking horse for the Republicans. In the alignments resulting from the struggle over civil-rights legislation, his defections from the position taken by the majority of his party have been more numerous in recent years than during the New Deal or the early part of the Fair Deal. Even so, an analysis by the Congressional Quarterly shows that in 1951 Russell voted with the Democratic majority in 80 per cent of the forty-eight contests in which this majority was defeated by a Republican-Democratic coalition. This 80 per cent compares with 3 per cent for Senator Byrd and 68 per cent for Democratic Senators from all sections of the country.

By choosing such a man to lead them the anti-Truman Southern Democrats have greatly increased their strength for the time being. In the long run they may have lost more than they have gained.

North Dakota Showdown

BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

Fargo, North Dakota

A SHOWDOWN fight in North Dakota, long in the making, will this year determine not only who controls the Republican Party in the state but the future pattern of North Dakota politics. The Republican Organizing Committee, meeting in Bismarck, has decided to run Representative Fred G. Aandahl against Senator William Langer for the Republican Senatorial nomination. For weeks the committee has been debating whether to risk losing a Republican seat in Congress—and with it Aandahl's influence as a member of the House Appropriations Committee—or suffer the humiliation of seeing its arch-enemy, Langer, returned to the Senate without substantial opposition. The delegates to the recent state convention finally decided that now was the time to deal with Langer.

The fight shaping up between Aandahl and Langer has a personal as well as strictly political basis. The feud between the two men dates from 1932, when Langer, who had just been elected governor with Non-Partisan League backing, launched a successful recall campaign against Aandahl, then a member of the state Senate. Aandahl returned to the state Senate in 1939 and later played a prominent role in the formation of the Republican Organizing Committee, which was set up in 1943-44 as a means of unseating Langer and of removing the taint of N. P. L. radicalism from the Republican Party in North Dakota. Aandahl was the committee's first candidate for governor. He was elected in 1944 and served two additional terms; he is now finishing his first term in Congress. He is a well-liked, able, conservative Republican, who has announced that he favors the nomination of Senator Taft, as do probably most of the Organizing Committee. Aandahl is certainly the strongest candidate who could be entered against Langer and is conceded to have a fifty-fifty chance of winning the Republican nomination.

FOR the first time in its brief history the R. O. C. this year will be presenting a "united front" of candidates against its Non-Partisan League rivals. The same convention that decided to back Aandahl for the Senate indorsed A. R. Bergesen of Fargo and Otto Krueger of Bismarck for the two Congressional seats. In the past the R. O. C. has sought to create disaffection in the ranks of the N. P. L. by indorsing at least one of its nominees for Congress. But this year Aandahl, Bergesen, and Krueger will campaign as a one-for-all and all-for-one trio. They are out to defeat not only Langer but the veteran N. P. L. Congressman, Usher Burdick. For the first time, also, the R. O. C. now has state-wide strength. At a recent state convention delegates showed up from counties which have sent N. P. L. candidates to the state legislature for the past thirty years.

Since North Dakota can almost certainly be counted on to be in the Republican column in this year's Presidential election—and by a big vote—it would seem that the R. O. C. might be able to defeat Langer and break up the N. P. L. as an influence in the Republican Party. But the entry of a strong candidate against Langer may have the effect of revitalizing the N. P. L. For the last twenty years the League has been largely dominated by Langer—to the annoyance of its younger members. A rift between these younger "insurgents," many of whom are members of the Farmers' Union, and the older pro-Langer elements has developed. But now that a serious threat has appeared in the form of the new R. O. C. "united front" of candidates, Langer can be expected to heal the breach and breathe new life into the organization. The Aandahl-Langer fight will certainly bring out a big vote.

Since the depression there has been a constant tug-of-war between the N. P. L. and the R. O. C. for control of the Republican Party. The division between these groups follows traditional, sectional, ethnic, and socio-economic lines. N. P. L. elements are concentrated in the western, arid part of the state; the R. O. C. supporters are found mainly in the more prosperous, humid Red River Valley. The N. P. L. is made up of descendants of the "hell-raising" radicals of former years; the R. O. C. of descendants of the Republican "stalwarts" of the same period. Many N. P. L. members are of Russian-German descent—the so-called Volga Germans; many of the R. O. C. adherents are of Norwegian descent. The former are largely Catholic, the latter Lutheran. N. P. L. farmers tend to belong to the Farmers' Union; R. O. C. farmers, to the Farm Bureau.

Traditionally the N. P. L. has always preferred to function within the framework of the Republican Party. This preference is hard to explain, for the average N. P. L. member is a strange misfit in the Republican camp. Logically the N. P. L. should have gone into the Democratic Party in the early period of the New Deal. Indeed, the younger Farmers' Union men in the League, under Quentin Burdick's leadership, tried to bring about such a realignment, which would have roughly paralleled the break-up of the Progressive Party in Wisconsin. But tradition was too strong; the older N. P. L.-ers still wanted to work within the Republican Party, probably because it was isolationist in foreign affairs. At present the N. P. L. and the R. O. C. are about equal in power; each holds about the same number of elective offices, state and federal. The Democratic Party remains a small patronage outfit controlled by Dave Kelly, the national committeeman.

North Dakota liberals have mixed feelings about Senator Langer. They remember with distaste his crude indulgence in patronage politics as governor. They feel that Langer is first and always for Langer. Though he quarreled personally with the late William Lemke, Langer is also associated with unpleasant memories of Gerald Nye and the attempt to inject anti-Semitism into North Dakota politics. Liberals are critical of Langer's position on most international issues. At the same time they agree that he has an admirable voting record on domestic issues and is passionately attentive to the wishes, problems, and whims of his constituents, regardless of their political affiliations. Langer is said to run one of the best "service" offices in Washington; if you want anything in Washington, just write Bill Langer. And proud parents of new-born North Dakota babies are made still more proud by the receipt of a personal congratulatory note from "Bill and Lydia" which invariably arrives before mother and baby have left the hospital.

Carl F. Kraenzel and the other social scientists who prepared that interesting report, "The Northern Plains in a World of Change," maintain that just as the people of the northern plains have long failed to recognize the distinctiveness of the region and its special problems, so the regional political thinking needs to be readjusted to new trends in national and international economic policy. Senator Langer is an example of this maladjustment: witness the incongruity between his views on foreign policy and on domestic issues. In the past North Dakota could indulge in this type of schizophrenic politics, but the maladjustments have created tensions which today are forcing a basic political realignment. This year's election will be an important step in the process.

British TV: Low-Budget Highbrow

BY ANDREW ROTH

London

AMERICAN viewers frequently find British television less exciting but more rewarding than their own. The women announcers are attractive, well-dressed, and obviously cultured but seldom the voluptuous beauties who telecast in the United States and France. British TV censored the fast-moving American comedy "Apples in Eden," by Frances Agnew. The play was about a lawyer secretly married to a tennis star and still pursued by his former mistress. It had the top dramatic spot one Sunday, but before it was repeated, the TV controller decided to cut out the word "mistress," a scene showing the lady en negligée, and a silhouette of her in the shower. He admitted there had been few complaints, but he felt it wise to avoid the charge of bad taste.

On the other hand, political debate on this side of the Atlantic is much freer. The BBC has not recently televised any admitted Communist, but in its weekly round-table "In the News" it allows remarkably frank discussion of international and domestic issues. The chairman is frequently a Liberal, and usually a militant Conservative and a militant Laborite take part. Robert Boothby, M. P., is one of the regular Conservative speakers; Bevanites Michael Foot and Tom Driberg or the Socialist professor A. J. P. Taylor present the leftist view. Professor Taylor said recently that Britain had been exploiting the colonial territories for 150 years, which was long enough. That sort of thing draws a few indignant letters but nothing like the attacks directed against much milder statements in the United States.

Comparing British and American television is rather like comparing the well-bred, restrained daughter of a poor British vicar with the uninhibited family of an American millionaire. British television is calmer and more intellectually stimulating and is free from the annoyance of commercial advertising, but it lacks the variety, color, and richness of the American product.

TV in Britain, like radio, is the monopoly of the semi-governmental British Broadcasting Corporation. Its revenue comes chiefly from its share of the £2 ($5.60) sound-and-television license fee paid annually by viewers; some additional revenue is obtained from advertising in the BBC's Radio Times. About 150,000 viewers are "pirates" who pay no fee. Actual expenditures last year came to £1,718,578 (almost $5,000,000), which was roughly the amount paid by TV license holders.

ANDREW ROTH is a staff contributor now stationed in London.

British TV, unable to make gigantic leaps forward by tapping the tills of private companies anxious to sell soap, can grow no more rapidly than its public grows. This growth is proceeding at the rate of 50,000 a month. With the average cost of a set between £65 and £75 (about $200)—which for the average viewer represents ten weeks' salary—sales do not mount too fast. When the tax on sets was doubled recently, sales were almost halved in many areas.

Although it has recently been overtaken by American television, the BBC has made steady progress since it first pioneered in this medium. Its experimental transmissions began in London in 1929. The first public service of high-definition television in the world was initiated by the BBC when Alexandra Palace went on the air in November, 1936. When service was suspended during the war, 20,000 receivers were in use.

On resuming service in June, 1946, British television was confronted with the problem of developing into a national institution while struggling with a limited budget and an audience impoverished by heavy taxation. By the middle of 1949 the London transmitter at Alexandra Palace served 150,000 television sets. This number was soon doubled by the opening of the first relay station near Birmingham. But not until last year did television become anything like mass entertainment. After the world's biggest transmitter was opened in October to serve Lancashire and Yorkshire, the additional 75,000 viewers thus obtained brought the total to over a million. When the Scottish and Welsh-West Country transmitters start operation, presumably before the end of 1952, 78 per cent of the country will be covered.

Britain is fully committed to a 405-line interlaced scanning system, which many American visitors find clearer than the 525-line system they know at home. (France uses 441 and 819 lines; Holland and most of the other European countries 625.) Britain and Europe in general use positive modulation, which requires maximum power for a dead-white picture; the United States uses negative modulation, maximum power for a black picture. Color television is relegated to the future by the need for an inexpensive method of converting transmitters and receivers. The BBC has said: "It is hoped that the radio industry will design and manufacture equipment which can be thoroughly studied and tested before any decision about a future color-television system for public service is made."

In the field of drama British TV is doing an outstanding job on its modest budget. It presents an average of two full-length dramas plus two one-acters a week. And full-length really means full-length. Several months ago Elmer Rice's "Counsellor-at-Law" was given in its original two-and-a-quarter-hour length, instead of in the fifty-seven-minute version to which it is usually tailored in the United States to fit into a sponsor's hour. Once every quarter a Shakespeare play is shown, also an opera. First-class modern drama by writers like Lillian Hellman, J. B. Priestley, and Bernard Shaw are mixed with some second-rate potboilers. The acting is usually competent and sometimes outstanding. There is talk now of earning dollars by selling telefilms of the shorter dramas to American television stations.

Television still shows a tendency to experiment in production techniques. One experiment which didn't come off was Lance Sieveking's "A Tomb with a View," which tried to establish a mood and a pace by inserting a number of still shots—infuriating much of the audience. There has also been considerable criticism of the recent production of Jacques Offenbach's operetta, "La Belle Hélène." This missed fire partly because it is hard to handle operetta on the small TV screen and partly because modern anachronisms were superimposed on an 1860 satiric version of a Greek story.

British TV dramatists, like others, are struggling with a medium combining the advantages and disadvantages of theater, movie, and radio. As Val Gielgud, head of the BBC's TV drama section, puts it: "The reaction of the film audience, which is numbered in hundreds, is quite different from the reaction of the television audience, which is divided into individuals or small groups. Therefore the 'target approach' of the producer must be proportionately different. The economic and 'facilities' conditions of film production cannot for an instant be compared with those conditioning television practice. A large-scale film budgets in terms of hundreds of thousands [of pounds]; a television production in terms of a couple of thousand at the outside—and this is exceptional."

British TV plays are indeed "low-budget" by American standards. It is estimated that some $300,000 is spent every week in New York for television plays; a comparable figure for British TV would be $10,000. In New York, of course, there are half a dozen programs to choose from; in Britain there is only one. But even so, British costs are reasonable—for the average play about £900 ($2,500). This includes two and one-half weeks of rehearsals but not the expensive overhead—cameras, technicians, and so on. An opera costs about £2,400 ($6,700), to produce, which is why only one is given every quarter.

ANOTHER outstanding accomplishment of British TV is its children's hour, usually scheduled from 5:30 to 6:30 p. m. Since there are no other television broadcasts until 8 p. m., children can lead the normal life of the pre-TV era. "Poverty has its compensations," was the comment of one visiting American parent. What British TV lacks in time for children, it makes up in quality. Thus in the week ending December 11 it gave them their own newsreel, three plays, a puppet show for the very young, a cowboy movie, and demonstrations of how to pick out a tune on the piano and how candy is made. The participation of the audience, which is estimated to number three million, is encouraged. Once children were asked to write the continuation of a serial, and 1,400 plays were submitted. An art competition brought 6,000 entries the first week. Next May experimental telecasts specially designed for schools will start.

For older viewers "Outside Broadcasts" open up a world far beyond their normal experience. About fifteen of these are televised a month, running the usual gamut of sports, festivals, ceremonies, and other major events. Coverage of the election was excellent. One of the things British TV does best is the documentary study of an industry or a social problem.

At least two British TV comics utilize the type of situation humor which Fred Allen feels is the best form of humor for television. But these two—Terry-Thomas and Eric Barker—do only a thirty-minute spot apiece every two weeks. Terry-Thomas has struck a rich vein of visual humor in his frantic impersonations; Eric Barker's amusing topical humor includes take-offs on other TV programs. Lack of a pool of competent comics and "gag-men"—and of the funds to pay them—rules out more shows of similar interest.

Many here are happy that TV cannot dominate life in Britain so completely as it does in the United States, but there are complaints. Thursdays, for example, are called "blank" because the Sunday play is repeated. Many who approve the BBC monopoly feel that there should be some choice of programs in TV as in sound radio, which offers the Home, Light, and Third programs. Others think TV should be completely divorced from sound broadcasting instead of staying under the BBC roof. Some defects could perhaps be cured by more financing, which could be obtained by raising separate TV license fees to, say, £2 a year.

There is surprisingly little call for a commercially sponsored TV. It has been suggested that advertisers might be allowed to sponsor shows during unused hours, but commercial sponsors seem little interested in heavy investments in "dead" hours. For twenty-five years every parliamentary commission has indorsed the present system. The Times, commenting on the subject, said: "The remedy for television, if it is bad, is to improve the BBC's conduct of it and not to undermine the foundations of British broadcasting."

McCarran's Iron Curtain

BY ALEX. BROOKS

SHORTLY after the First World War the United States went through a period of intense anti-foreign isolationism which eventuated in the Immigration Act of 1924. This act established the rigid and restrictive quota pattern under which we have been operating since. Introducing into our law a racist concept of national origins, it gave large quotas to the Northern and Western European nations, where the pressure to emigrate was slight, and small quotas to the Southern and Eastern countries, where pressure was great. As a result, the Northern and Western quotas have been largely wasted, and European immigration to the United States for the last twenty years has totaled less than one-third of the allowable amount.

Now we have come full cycle again, and current post-war jitters threaten to cause another wave of discrimination and restriction. Unfortunately, little public notice has been given to quietly planned long-range changes which would effectively strangle for many years to come a flow of immigration which only recently was temporarily augmented by hard-won D. P. legislation.

Under the guise of preparing a streamlined and efficient revision and modification of our antiquated immigration laws, Senator Pat McCarran and Representative Francis Walter have presented two practically identical omnibus bills which provide thirteen new grounds for excluding future immigrants, more than twenty new grounds for deporting displaced persons and other immigrants admitted in past years, and a practically undetermined number of new ways of depriving a naturalized American of citizenship. These bills purport to eliminate racial discrimination and to tighten naturalization and denaturalization procedures. Actually, they embody more than a hundred changes which would weaken the rights of immigrants and aliens.

The most blatant hypocrisy of the new bills is their claim to eliminate racial discrimination. They make a gesture in this direction by admitting a sharply limited number of Japanese, Koreans, Indonesians, and Burmese. The Japanese would be given a quota of 185. In addition, all Orientals, many of whom are at present ineligible for naturalization, would be allowed to become American citizens. This would enable 85,000 first-generation Japanese already living in this country to achieve their dream of citizenship.

Though they make this partial concession to racial equality, the bills retain many obsolete and obnoxious discriminations and add a number of new and unwarranted ones. For instance, the retention of the 1920 census figure as a base for determining the rate of immigration perpetuates a discrimination against the Southern and Eastern Europeans, who have contributed the bulk of our immigration in the last thirty years. It is these people who are in dire need of asylum in this country. All their quotas are oversubscribed; some of them are mortgaged into the next century by recent D. P. legislation.

The framers of the Walter-McCarran bills make certain that Orientals will be strictly limited to their quotas by expanding an already enacted racist measure to provide that any immigrant "who is attributable by as much as one-half of his ancestry to a people or peoples indigenous to the Asia-Pacific triangle" is to be charged to the quota of the country of his "ancestry," regardless of his place of birth or citizenship. Total immigration from this group is limited to 2,000 a year. This discriminatory provision, strikingly reminiscent of Hitler's abhorrent Nürnberg laws, was openly fashioned to exclude all but the bare handful of Orientals provided for under stringently limited quotas. Under this rule, a citizen of Great Britain, born in that country of a British father and a Chinese mother, would not be admitted to the United States as a member of the British quota of 65,000 but would be shunted to the Chinese quota of 105.

The Walter-McCarran bills go still farther in discriminating against Negroes. Under the present law immigration from colonies and other dependent areas is charged to the quota of the governing country. Citizens of Trinidad, Jamaica, and other West Indian colonies, most of whom are Negroes, at present have relatively free access to the United States. The new bills stipulate that hereafter not more than 100 persons may enter annually from one such colony. This would have the intended effect of reducing Negro immigration from the West Indies by about 90 per cent.

In order further to enlarge the grounds for exclusion, deportation, and denaturalization, the Walter-McCarran bills eliminate the non-quota status of professors. Restrictions are also tightened against the victims of religious persecution, who were formerly granted an exemption from literacy requirements. A similar exception for close relatives of legally admitted aliens and citizens of the United States has also been dropped.

One of the profound ironies of the Walter-McCarran bills is their subversion of certain safeguards against administrative abuse favored by their authors six years ago. Senator McCarran himself hailed the Administrative Procedure Act of 1946, designed by his Senate Judiciary Committee to provide additional judicial checks on possible abuses by administrative officials, as a "widely heralded advance in democratic government."

The Administrative Procedure Act is, in effect, emasculated at many points by the new proposals. Prosecutors, for instance, may also serve as judges in immigration cases. Exclusion or deportation is not based on whether an alien has actually done something wrong but on whether an immigration official is "satisfied" or "has reason to believe" he has. The Attorney General is even empowered to sanction deportation or deprive a resident of his precious citizenship when certain facts appear in his "opinion" to warrant such drastic action.

One of the three liberalizations embodied in the McCarran-Walter bills weakens the absolute bar against the admission of totalitarians set up by McCarran's own Internal Security Act of 1950. Totalitarians actively reformed at least five years prior to their application for admission may come in if their presence here is thought to be "in the public interest." But an alien who at any time after he was admitted to this country has been engaged in a Communist or totalitarian cause, regardless of whether he later acknowledged his mistake and became a valuable member of the American community, must be deported. Finally, the bills would disqualify from citizenship an applicant who had been unlucky enough to belong to a "direct predecessor" of a Communist or totalitarian organization, even one originally democratic in character, from which he later resigned in protest.

At their joint hearings the Walter-McCarran bills met vigorous opposition from representatives of Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish religious groups and of Italian, Czech, and other nationality groups, from the American Bar Association Committee on Aliens and Naturalization, and from other quarters. Some of the more objectionable sections were removed as a result of this criticism; most of them remain.

THE Walter bill was suddenly reported out and scheduled for floor debate two weeks ago. Senators Lehman and Humphrey and Representative Roosevelt, alarmed by Congressional apathy concerning the bill, alerted others. A vigorous effort, headed by Roosevelt in the House, was made to postpone floor debate until Congress could be informed of the widespread organizational opposition to many of the bill's features. As a result, consideration of the bill was postponed. Since then, numerous religious, civic, educational, nationality, and labor groups have urged recommittal so that there may be time to consider thoroughly the more than one hundred amendments being prepared.

In the meantime, a substitute omnibus immigration bill which will almost certainly get Administration support has been introduced by Senators Humphrey and Lehman and Representative Roosevelt. This bill, cosponsored by Senators Benton, Langer, Kilgore, Douglas, McMahon, Green, Pastore, Kefauver, Morse, and Moody, is everything the Walter-McCarran bill is not. It would codify, simplify, and humanize the present law in many ways. It would modernize the quota system by basing quotas on the 1950 instead of on the 1920 census (thus increasing the total quota), and would provide much greater flexibility in the operation of the quota system by allowing for the "pooling" of unused quotas. The previous year's unused quotas would be allocated to immigrants who are relatives of American citizens and of aliens residing here permanently, to those whose services are urgently needed in this country, to victims of religious and racial persecution, and to special-hardship cases. The total flow of immigration would be enlarged by as much as 75,000 each year merely by the intelligent use of the quotas conceived appropriate when our present immigration law was enacted.

Unlike the McCarran-Walter bill, the Humphrey-Lehman-Roosevelt bill actually eliminates all vestiges of racial discrimination. It provides, for instance, for proportional quotas to Japanese, Burmese, Koreans, and other Asiatic groups who at present have no quotas, and also for proportional quotas for such groups as the Chinese, who have been limited to approximately 100. The concept of nationality by ancestry instead of by birth is eliminated.

The H-R-L bill provides the protection against administrative abuse absent from the McCarran-Walter bills. Exceptions to exclusion can be based on special circumstance. By relying to a heavy extent on factual grounds for exclusion rather than on the "opinion" of administrative officials, the bill avoids a large area of potential administrative abuse. Its administrative features are a striking improvement over those of the current law.

The H-L-R bill provides a statutory basis for the Board of Immigration Appeals—assuring its freedom from administrative influence in weighing appeals and reviews in deportation cases—establishes a Visa Review Board within the State Department to handle appeals against the decisions of consular officials, and makes the Administrative Procedure Act applicable to deportation cases. All new powers granted to the Attorney General are surrounded by safeguards.

The Ballot Comes to Bhuti

BY JEAN LYON

New Delhi, India

INDIA has recently completed what should go down in history as the world's most strenuous expression of ballot-box democracy. For the first time its entire adult population was eligible to vote. For the first time the people went to the polls and elected a government. The process took four months. Two and a half million ballot boxes were placed within reach of the nearly 180,000,000 potential voters. Prime Minister Nehru traveled more than eighteen thousand miles in his campaigning.

My most vivid experience in the whole long period, during which I followed the proceedings in three different states, was my two-day stay in a mountain village called Bhuti. On the first day Bhuti's two-room schoolhouse was transformed into a polling station—a most original creation, for none of the villagers had ever seen a real station. On the second day some 600 of the 1,200 adults living on the side of the steep mountain on which the Bhuti schoolhouse was perched, in full view of the snow-capped Himalayas, came to the station to vote.

The day of preparation was a mad day. Seven civil servants, most of them under thirty, gathered at the schoolhouse in the chill mountain dawn. They had brought with them one small canvas bag of supplies and twelve ballot boxes with non-tamperable sealing devices. They faced two completely bare schoolrooms—Indian schoolrooms never contain anything but students, for the floor serves as both desks and chairs. The team was headed by a young government veterinary surgeon who when he had received his orders to report at Bhuti had been a hundred miles away treating mountain sheep. He had ridden a mountain pony for four days to get to his assignment. At the schoolhouse that morning he kept thumbing through the pages of the election manual, reading the rules to the local school teachers who were his assistants—five men and a girl.

The most important rule was that the ballot boxes must be behind curtains, so that voting would be secret. But what to use for curtains? Twelve hours later he had not only his curtains but registration desks, polling booths, and a separate entrance and exit. All day long people had trudged up and down the path between the schoolhouse and the village carrying things on their heads. Floor mats had been sewed together with strings for curtains. Ballot boxes were set on planks supported by rocks. The exit had been devised out of the schoolroom's back window, with a Lifebuoy-soap box as the step under the window sill.

That night the polling team spent the night rolled up in blankets on the floor of the new station—all except the girl school teacher who went back with me to the rest house, three miles up the mountain. The boys told us later that their chairman had kept them awake until two in the morning reading the entire election manual to them by the light of a kerosene lamp.

By mid-morning of the next day—Election Day in Bhuti—the steep slope above the schoolhouse was bright with the head scarves of the hill women and the checkered wool shawls of the men. Election posters were pasted on the gray rocks. People gathered in knots around those who felt like expounding their election preferences. Some had brought along their hand spindles and settled down for a long sociable day.

This largely illiterate electorate was anything but lethargic. Some were not quite sure yet how they would vote and went around gathering opinions. Those who voted first took on the job of instructing the others in the intricacies of registration and dropping their ballots into the boxes marked by party symbols. Women received last-minute directions from their menfolk. Self-appointed poll watchers loudly reprimanded the three constables for being lax in their duties if anyone strayed into the area around the schoolhouse before it was their turn to vote. The low-caste Kolis, a farm-labor group who until a decade ago were admittedly treated "worse than dogs," were out in full force, both men and women.

That Bhuti had a polling station at all seemed amazing to me after I saw that empty little schoolhouse and the primitive huts in the village. That the people knew enough about the candidates to make a choice seemed even more amazing after I had tramped over the mountainous terrain, where the fastest means of travel was a pony. But what made that Election Day most impressive was knowing that there were thousands of other Bhutis in India and that over 50 per cent of the eligible voters in them cast their ballots. The illiterate peasant of India, the country's heart's blood, had taken part in choosing a government.

IF I was most interested in the long-range educational value of the elections, Indian commentators were concerned rather with the immediate political results. The success of the Communists in the south came as a surprise to Indians for two reasons. First, it had been believed that the Socialists were India's second largest party. While they were known to be weak organizationally, they seemed more unified than the Communists and certainly more firmly established than the new mushroom parties. The second reason was that Nehru had emphasized in his campaign speeches the danger from the right rather than the left. His most spirited attacks had been aimed at the communal parties—right-wing groups formed along religious lines. Neither the Socialists nor the communal parties showed the strength expected, and the Communists with their united fronts, though a small number in the whole picture, have definitely developed into the leading Congress opposition. They are still, however, a numerically small opposition. In the House of the People, the lower house of the Parliament, Communists and their left-wing allies won 27 of the 497 seats, the Socialists coming in third with 12 seats, and the three major Hindu communal parties combined having but 10 seats. The Congress Party remains solidly in control with 363 seats. All the opposition parties together hold but one-fourth of the seats in this main national legislative body.

The picture in the state assemblies is perhaps more telling. In four of the twenty-three state assemblies the Congress Party failed to win a majority, and in a fifth its majority is one. In Travencore-Cochin, where some 70 per cent of the population is literate as against 10 per cent in the rest of India, and in Madras, India's second largest state in both area and population, the Communists have won such substantial blocks of seats that with backing from their allies and some of the independents they could make it impossible for the Congress to form ministries. In Hyderabad, despite the fact that they had been a law-and-order problem there until recently, they won nearly one-fourth of the assembly seats. The results in these three states are generally interpreted as more of a vote against the Congress than a vote for the Communists. But the fact that the people chose the far left rather than one of the more moderate opposition parties, like the Socialists or the new Peasants, Workers, and Peoples Party, which was last year's offshoot from Congress, seems to indicate that they are in a mood for drastic change. A very different phenomenon was the landslide for the landlords' group in Rajasthan, where the Congress won a majority of only one.

The story is nowhere near as simple as it looks in the tabulated results. There were innumerable cross currents, such as the Christian-Hindu feud in Travencore-Cochin, which made people vote for candidates on religious rather than ideological grounds, and the strong caste loyalties in Madras, upon which the Communists reportedly played. A thorough study of the elections in these states might prove some new truths. In Rajasthan, where the peasants are still, in large part, living under a feudal system, they voted for their feudal overlords. In Madras, where at least the top layer of landlords has been eliminated, the land reforms were apparently not far-reaching enough to make the arguments of the Communists lose their appeal.

Undoubtedly the elections show widespread dissatisfaction with the Congress government. In an established democratic country the opposition to the party in power could have been larger without indicating so much discontent. This is being viewed with alarm in some quarters and should be. If the government does not recognize the people's discontent and search out the reason for it, the foundation for democratic development in India grows shaky. Abroad, alarm should be diluted with a large dose of respect for the Nehru government, which was willing to risk its one-party control in possibly premature national elections.

The Fallacies of Spengler

OSWALD SPENGLER. By H. Stuart Hughes. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

THE purpose of the Twentieth Century Library is to give the intelligent layman a basic understanding of those thinkers of the last hundred years who have most influenced the intellectual currents of our time. The present volume on Oswald Spengler fulfils this purpose exceedingly well. Destined for the layman and not for the specialist, it is written with ease and clarity; it is a good example of the "popular" presentation of a difficult subject and offers much within its small compass. It is well informed, and the discussion of the relationship between Spengler and the National Socialists is judiciously balanced. For the very reason that the book offers such a thoughtful and sound exposition of Spengler's theories, it should be pointed out that the author, an assistant professor of history at Harvard and associate director of the Russian Research Center there, has been too strongly fascinated by the "profundity" of Spengler's pessimism regarding Western civilization and our times.

Mr. Hughes rightly presents Spengler as a great artist. His "pictorial, figurative language, his talent for finding the images and personalities that set off in high relief an entire epoch of the past—these give to his work a character of excitement, of tension, and of evocative melancholy." But as a thinker Spengler was in no way original, and as a prophet or intuitive seer he was weak or mistaken throughout. He was one of the many intellectuals in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries who hated or feared nineteenth-century Western civilization with its capitalism, parliamentarism, democracy, and big cities, and who looked back with nostalgia to the time before the commercial and industrial revolutions.

Like many German and Russian intellectuals Spengler had no understanding knowledge of the West, especially of England and the United States. Speaking of the future of the United States, he saw before him neither a real nation nor a real state but a boundless field and a population of trappers, drifting from town to town in the dollar hunt, unscrupulous and dissolute. Spengler's estimate shows the same lack of understanding, the same supercilious contempt for the West which Hitler showed in judging and in underestimating America. The parallel goes even farther, and Spengler reveals the same depressing shallowness of historical and political judgment as Hitler—though the literary style, the occasional flash of genius, and the breadth of knowledge put him otherwise high above Hitler. Both believed that Bolshevik Russia "had ceased to be a state" and had fallen prey to a barbarian horde, fundamentally not different from the United States, with its standardized population, its purely economic life without any depth or any true political outlook, its ruling trusts not so different from the Russian state trusts.

Spengler identified Western civilization with what he called the Faustian man, a predominantly romantic and Germanic type, certainly one of the elements of modern civilization, which also includes, however, the classical sense of measure and law and that moderation and compromise which triumphed in the Glorious Revolution. Spengler's sense of a decline of Western civilization had been expressed infinitely better by a long line of more original thinkers, by De Maistre and Donoso Cortès, by Paul de Lagarde and Konstantin Leontiev. There had been a number of minor Germans, well known in their time, as pessimistic as Spengler later was. To mention one among many, Karl Vollgraff, professor of political science in Marburg, answered in 1851 the question how humanity looked in his day with the words "a colossal heap of ruins," and protested in 1831 against the constitution for Hessen as a fraud, because parliamentary democracy could not meet the needs of the time. These prophets of doom were wrong, though their number was great. Even Jacob Burckhardt erred when he predicted that "a definite and supervised stint of misery, with promotions and in uniform, daily begun and ended to the sound of drums," must logically come from modern Western civilization. It came where modern Western civilization was weakest, in Russia, and for a certain time in Germany and Italy; it did not come in Burckhardt's Switzerland or in the English-speaking countries where what Spengler despised most in Western civilization was strongest.

Spengler regarded Mussolini as "a master-man with the southern cunning of the race in him." Unfortunately for him, Mussolini was not a master-man or even one with the cunning of a Franco. Spengler expected the Germans to become the shield against Russia and Asia. His prediction was neither original nor correct. The alliance between Bolshevik Russia and Asia against the West of which Spengler made so much had been openly proclaimed by Lenin. The Germans, whom Spengler jubilantly called the "strong race, the eternal warlike in the type of the beast-of-prey man," did not save Europe from Bolshevism but brought the Russians to Berlin and Vienna. English parliamentary democracy and American democratic industrialism saved the world from the German threat to Western civilization and are now saving it from the similar Russian threat.

Though pessimism seems at present very fashionable, it is hardly justifiable to call Spengler "a loyal son of the West" or to speak of a renewed interest in him. Mr. Hughes calls him more correctly in another place the typical "incompletely educated German intellectual manifesting [toward the West] an uncritical a series of prejudices as any lower-middle-class German." Spengler's "state of mind of an old society anticipating its end" does not offer a key to our times. All his essential predictions have failed to materialize. Nor does the world at present, at least in the West, point to cultural sterility and dictatorship, as the modern Spenglerian seems to believe. Brooks Adams predicted in 1896 a similar decay: "No poetry can bloom in the arid modern soil, the drama has died, and the patrons of art are no longer even conscious of shame at profaning the most sacred of ideals." But the arts are today certainly not more neglected or sterile than they were in 1890. Spengler and the Spenglerians underestimated the vitality of Western civilization and society. HANS KOHN

Truman's Self-Portrait

MR. PRESIDENT. By William Hillman. Pictures by Alfred Wagg. Farrar, Straus and Young. $5.

LIKE Harry S. Truman, this is a wonderful human document. It is not really a book by Hillman so much as a newspaperman's dream realized, a publisher's delight, a journalistic beat of stupendous proportions. The President of the United States writing and talking about himself, his inner feelings, his private attitude toward present and former associates (most of them still living and able to talk back), some of his problems and decisions. What more could the happy, happy collaborators ask this side of River Jordan?

As might have been expected, Truman emerges in these pages as a devoted, patriotic, earnest, hardworking President. But the record shows a man of much broader dimensions than used to be assumed: he is well grounded in history and the classics, an astute observer of the human scene, a man who has enormous respect for his office—the Presidency, not the individual picked by fate to fill it. He is a lonely man—as lonely as Lincoln—and sometimes for the same reasons: people don't call him an "ape" and a "baboon," as they did Lincoln, but plenty of them think they know more about running the President's job than "little" Harry, and occasionally they find themselves suddenly on the outside looking in. Unlike the Lincolns, however, the Trumans have an extraordinarily happy family life.

There are some great gaps in the section devoted to Truman's diaries. From September, 1948, to March, 1949—the whole period covered by the campaign, the election, and the inauguration—there is not a line. So we do not know what he may have written about a Senator like Olin Johnston of South Carolina, who fought the President's reelection but pushed into the front rank of those who "greeted" him on his triumphal post-election return from Independence. We don't see the National Security Council at work, the Cabinet in operation, the Central Intelligence Agency making its reports. These are the private papers and comments of Harry Truman, not the public ones, and not all the private papers are available.

We get a glimpse of the President's attitude toward his subordinates. When he appoints a man to a quasi-judicial agency he then forgets about it: he expects the man to do good work or he would not have appointed him. Was he privately dismayed when Mon C. Wallgren demoralized the Federal Power Commission? Does he yet have any idea of his failure in four Supreme Court appointments, in which Roosevelt's liberalization of the court was undone? If so, nothing in the record as set forth by Hillman indicates it.

Yet there is enough to make a first-hand document that is fascinating both because of its revelations of Truman the man and its glimpses into the office of the Presidency. The man is enjoying his job now, even though conscious of its burdens. He could write during the Berlin blockade and just after the Chinese entered the Korean war that he feared we were close to all-out conflict, and write it simply as a fact, not something to keep him awake nights, because he honestly believed he had done everything possible to prevent war. There are other examples of raw courage; and anecdotes about how he learned the folk habits of our democracy.

Will he run again? Is it conceivable that after making more enemies by his candid comments he will try for the Democratic nomination? The answer is probably a qualified no. One suspects that when he began his interviews with Hillman he had every intention of retiring after his term. Whether he has now been persuaded that he must "save" his policy is a different question. If he gets mule-headed about this he can be a tough customer even for such other tough customers as Byrd, George, Taft, and his whole assortment of bipartisan enemies. He is not easily scared. He was troubled but not scared even when he had difficulty in 1946 with both Jimmy Byrnes and Henry Wallace, to say nothing of Harold Ickes. The best guess is that he will still feel that he has done whatever he could and step aside for new party leadership; but if he should decide to run, the book would not hurt him, despite the anger it must arouse. In the decisive Northern and Western states more people distrust Byrnes, really, than distrust Truman, and the President's homely touch, which shines through the book, would have its effect.

WILLARD SHELTON

Dos Passos: The Second Trilogy

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA. By John Dos Passos. Houghton Mifflin Company. $5.

IN THIS newly assembled trilogy—the individual volumes appeared in the decade from 1939 to 1949—Dos Passos continues the savage assaults on American life he began so memorably in "U. S. A." But where in the earlier trilogy his target was nothing less than our whole moneyed society in the first thirty years of the century, here it has shrunk to certain aspects of our political life during the 1930's and '40's. And where then his orientation was radical if not actually Marxist, it has now, during the course of his own personal evolution from left to right, altered to an extreme conservatism which looks upon almost every kind of government activity as wasteful or wicked.

What makes these later novels less exciting and effective than the earlier ones is their occasionally querulous tone, a sharp recession in the reality of their characters, a contraction of outlook on Dos Passos's part. His attack upon the Communists in the first novel, "Adventures of a Young Man," is perfectly valid factually and historically, but it suffers from the incredible naivete of its hero, Glenn Spottswood, and a tendency to project the dense jungle of leftist politics in the oversimplified terms characteristic of the proletarian novel so fashionable in the thirties, when this story was first published. The second volume, "Number One," is equally unimpeachable on grounds of fact. Its target is machine politics and the political boss, and again the impact of Dos Passos's fictional version of Huey Long is watered down by the character of the narrator, Tyler Spottswood, who is chronically drunk for reasons never explained and swamps the book in a tedious procession of binges and hangovers. The concluding novel, "The Grand Design," attacks the New Deal for having reneged on its idealistic promises and corrupted the American dream by undermining the old traditions of self-reliance and individual initiative. Of its visible accomplishments there is scarcely a word, and Roosevelt, who never appears directly, is referred to in almost constantly sneering terms.

One emerges from the trilogy with a growing feeling of hopelessness. There seems no room in Dos Passos's world for men of good-will, who are murdered like Glenn, take refuge in drink like Tyler or in suicide like Georgia Washburn—whose death, though she is a minor figure, moves us more than Glenn's—or in the chagrined and disillusioned withdrawal from Washington of Paul Graves and Millard Carroll, who had come there originally under the New Deal spell. The Rousseauist theory of the good individual born into a corrupt universe, which animated Dos Passos's fiction from the beginning, has contracted here into a grinding pessimism that lowers the vitality of the writing even when its documentation is most accurate.

Yet the reader is seldom allowed to forget that he is in the presence of one of the powerful and significant novelists of contemporary American literature. There are scenes and writing here that rank with the best things in "The 42nd Parallel" and "The Big Money." Glenn Spottswood, that excessively ingenuous and victimized young man, organizes the coal miners in a remote mountain area of West Virginia. Their lives, grimy habitations, and intensely poignant reactions to a desperate situation are narrated with a bold and resourceful hand. Some of the bombastically ingenious speeches and sinister vulgarities of Chuck Crawford, the political boss, are unreelied with a grimly comical effect, though Chuck himself has been overshadowed by the far more complex and convincing figure of Willie Stark in Robert Penn Warren's "All the King's Men." The travels of Paul Graves, the non-political agricultural scientist who wants to make the corn grow better, among the farms of Alabama and Nebraska give Dos Passos a characteristic opportunity to practice his superb talent for recreating the concrete place. These and other vivid passages survive the arid stretches, factionalist involvements, and niggling defeatism of "District of Columbia." They remind us that though Dos Passos is not at his best here, he retains the power to arouse and persuade.

But the energy and technical ingenuity of "U. S. A." have abated. The drift and flow of American life that once caught up the Dos Passos characters in an irresistible stream, and filled the reader with a sense of exhilaration even when the seamiest aspects of the industrial age were being exposed, have been replaced by narrower channels and a slower movement. The vitality, the exhilaration are no longer so pronounced. The vigorous, rough-textured style has grown gritty and monotonous. And in place of Mac, Charley Anderson, and J. Ward Moorehouse, we have the Spottswoods, father and sons, the most spectacularly uninteresting family in recent fiction.

The closely knit structure, descriptive power, deep feeling for country are still plain in Dos Passos, but this second trilogy is a weaker, smaller achievement than the first.

Deathless Salesman

DUVEEN. By S. N. Behrman. Random House. $3.50.

SAUL STEINBERG'S jacket design for this book makes any other preface unnecessary. Four differently shaped portholes frame identical icons of the Lord Duveen of Millbank. The Man of Distinction, in quadruplicate. While Duveen was not quite in the class of the Pharaoh Khephren, with his twenty-odd portrait statues in his temple at Gizeh, Steinberg, invoking the same theory of salvation by multiplication, confers on him a sort of Oriental immortality.

Ordinarily a reviewer's first task is to indicate the contents of the book at hand. In the present instance it is perhaps sufficient to report that the six essays on Duveen which appeared in the New Yorker last fall are now available as a single item, illuminated, in the medieval sense, by Steinberg's drawings. As nearly everybody has read these essays, this review will be limited to some marginal comments.

pace and impersonal slant of other New Yorker profiles, with the authorship effectively submerged, one may still speculate about Behrman's intentions. Is he playing "the most spectacular art dealer of all time" dead-pan or straight? He has managed to embalm an age with a collection of anecdotes, an age which lost a prime force when Duveen died thirteen years ago. He is largely content to let the picture he has drawn speak for itself. Each suggestion of a sly leer is countered by a hint of hero-worship. With personality looming so large in Duveen's story, such hero-worship is not altogether unjustified. Nevertheless, somebody ought to protest when manipulation is lent enchantment and vulgarity is glamourized into something nostalgic. Veblen, where is thy sting?

Unless I have misunderstood the reference, one of the anecdotes contains an error in fact. It relates how Bernard Berenson, the hero of the essay called "B. B.," met an old friend, a German, who is described as the director of the Dresden Museum before the war. "He returned to resume his former post," Berenson says, "but the Russians came and carted everything off—all the most beautiful things. . . . What made my friend cry was not alone that they took the things off but that they were so badly crated!"

The error of this tale is in the first part, not the second. The man who was the director of the Dresden Museum before the war—in fact, since 1910—died during the war. In 1939 Hitler had added to his duties the task of forming a major collection of art for presentation to the city of Linz, which was due for some cultural expansion because Hitler had spent his boyhood there. The manner of the collecting for Linz was not always nice. A successor appointed in the spring of 1943 inherited his techniques of acquisition. The new appointee, who is still alive, is not the present director of the Dresden Museum; nor has he returned to Dresden since the war. He sincerely mourns Dresden's lost treasure, but he filled in the late war years the highest art position the Nazis could confer. I should doubt very much that this is the friend Berenson referred to.

The most remarkable of the six essays, it seems to me, is the one that is primarily about Berenson. But Behrman has fully developed the contrast in personality that the strange association of Duveen and B. B. affords. That it did not collapse sooner is perhaps the most surprising thing of all. In this improbable combination of commerce and culture, the balance of immortality swings sharply in B. B.'s favor. The most exquisite sensibility of our day triumphs over the world's most deathless salesman.

trying for two years to get to America. They have moved from city to city and have finally reached Cairo, where they hope—one does not know quite why—to obtain from the American consul the precious permits which all the other American consuls have refused. The man (Paul Lukas) is confined to a wheel chair as a result of a wound sustained when an American bomb fell into a Nazi concentration camp where he was confined. So far, so good. We are ready to grant that he should be allowed to go to America; we are convinced that his devoted and capable wife Lili (Gusti Huber) is perfectly able to support the family; and we are all set to be angry if the visas are refused.

But suddenly another Austrian appears on the scene. He is a likable young man who has come to Cairo to buy cotton; he believes that Austria has a future and persuades Lili that the place for Austrians like herself is—Austria. He persuades us too, since we are favorably disposed toward Austria these days; but the immediate effect of this quite new theme is to dilute our sympathy for the crippled husband and to nip in the bud our first fine interest in the fight for visas. We now see the husband's desire to escape as selfish and his exploitation of his wife as cruel; and we find ourselves thinking that it might be just as well after all if the visas were not granted. Which is a queer position to have arrived at, given the first scenes of the play.

The resolution of this curious state of affairs is perhaps the best that could be devised. The husband is told by his own doctor that he will die soon anyhow—he has been refused a visa on the same ground—and thereupon commits suicide. The wife and child, though they get their visas, decide to return to Vienna and make a new start, presumably with the aid and comfort of the young Austrian.

The scene is a run-down Cairo hotel, which allows for the usual hotel routine, not to mention the hot-country routine, of types and episodes. The setting, by Jo Mielziner, is very effective; the routines are less so.

Paul Lukas as the husband does very well what little he has to do, though his big scene comes after the "other play" has taken over and the sympathy of the spectator has been diverted.

FLIGHT INTO EGYPT (Music Box Theater) has two themes—which is one too many for a play. What is even more of a hazard, dramatically speaking, both themes are valid and timely; and each is completely at cross-purposes with the other. It is as if the scripts of two plays had got entangled, and even so skilful a director as Elia Kazan cannot produce a unified or forceful effect from such disparate materials.

The play depicts the decisive day in the lives of three Austrians, a man and his wife and child, who have been

On balance, the principal merit of "Flight into Egypt" is that it introduces the Viennese actress, Gusti Huber. Her role as the wife—complaining, desperate, hysterical by turns—is a rather thankless one, but she has the skill to keep it from becoming monotonous and to make it sympathetic throughout in spite of the shifts of theme. She gives the impression of knowing her business very well and it would be interesting to see her in a part that gave her more range.

The adjective "old-fashioned" comes to mind in connection with "One Bright Day" (Royale Theater) because it shows the president of a drug company wrestling with a problem in ethics having to do with the quality of the product he manufactures. But the problem is real—and no doubt problems of the same sort come up every day in the week. They are old-fashioned only in the sense that they are no longer fashionable as subjects, having been displaced by the kind of problems posed in "Flight Into Egypt" or Marquand's "Point of No Return." The ending is particularly unfashionable; the president—and capitalist—does the right thing. The play is a well-made play—it is also well acted—and the first two acts have more reality than "Point of No Return." But though the resolution itself is convincing enough, the third act is more complicated and longer drawn out than it need be.

B. H.

IT WAS not only the voluminous luster and splendor of Flagstad's voice from the lowest to the highest notes of its range that was so amazing at her first appearance here seventeen years ago; it was also her way of singing—of deploying the voice in a long phrase in which it rose without effort to a powerful and securely held high note and went on from this, in thrilling fashion, to another and still another before descending to complete the phrase, all as though breath were not even involved. The years since then have taken the luster from the upper range of the voice; but they haven't changed the way of singing: in the second performance of Gluck's "Alceste" at the Metropolitan, as on other recent occasions, Flagstad began with her lower notes characteristically voluminous and lustrous, her upper ones thin, edged, and tremulously shrill, until the Divinités du Styx at the end of the first act—the first of the occasions when the voice began one of those remarkable sustained phrases which it carried to an exciting climax in a succession of secure, clear, and increasingly powerful high notes, and having done this once did it immediately a second time. There were some in the audience who knew what the voice had lost of its earlier beauty; but anyone who heard it now for the first time and without that knowledge—who heard the lustrous lower notes, the clear and powerful high notes in the sustained phrases so exquisitely and touchingly inflected by musical taste and feeling—would say what he heard was phenomenal. It would be considered phenomenal if it were the singing of a young person; it would have been pronounced phenomenal if it had been Flagstad's singing at her first appearances here at the age of forty-two; and it is even more phenomenal in the performance of a woman of fifty-nine, who ends her career still the greatest vocal artist of our day.

It was an act of intelligence, taste, and courage for Mr. Bing to make the last manifestation of Flagstad's art at the Metropolitan her singing of Alceste's music rather than Brünnhilde's. And whereas the splendor of that art was first revealed here in the shabby performances of the end of the Gatti-Casazza era, this last time everything was done to present it in surroundings worthy of it—a performance bright, clean, carefully put together, and precisely executed. In fact too much was done: Dr. Graf wasn't content with making the chorus expressively active, but had dancers underline the singing with plastic movement; and whatever might be said of the idea of this innovation, the actual movements which looked like a take-off on goings-on in a class in modern dance at a girls' college did not heighten the solemnity of the scenes. And I would say the same of the ballet that Mr. Solov devised for the last scene.

I saw no point last year in giving "Alceste" in an English translation which wouldn't be heard sufficiently in the Metropolitan; and one thing to say about the performance is that I was in fact able to hear almost none of the words of the chorus and only a few of those enunciated so clearly and well by Flagstad and Sullivan—enough to give me a general idea of the action but not the moment-to-moment detail which the English translation was supposed to give. But another thing to say after the performance is that I see no point in giving an opera in English so that it may be understood, and then assigning to it singers like Schöffler and Pernstorfer whose German accents make their English a foreign language nobody could understand.

The translator of "Alceste," Mr. John Gutman of Mr. Bing's staff, began a publicity article about his translation by declaring opera in English to be something to be accepted here as "Carmen" in German is accepted in Vienna. But "Carmen" in German is a monstrosity; and the fact that such monstrosities are accepted in Vienna is no reason for introducing them here, where—whatever else may have been wrong with opera at the Metropolitan before Mr. Bing took over—one thing that was right was that for the most part the works were given in their original languages. This practice began when the Metropolitan's singers were mostly foreigners; but the fact that they now include many Americans is no reason why it shouldn't continue. As between opera in the original Italian or French pronounced with slight defects by Americans, and opera in an English mangled beyond recognition by foreigners, I would choose the first.

My ear catches an occasional defect in Albanese's Russian; but this doesn't diminish the pleasure of hearing that language with the music of the Letter Scene from Tchaikovsky's "Eugene Onegin," which she has recorded for RCA Victor with an orchestra directed by Stokowski; and the language is one of the points of superiority of this performance over the one previously issued by Columbia, in which Welitch sings in German. The other points of superiority are musical—the intensity and passion of Albanese's singing, the cohesive tension of Stokowski's performance of the orchestral part, as against singing by Welitch and playing by the Philharmonia Orchestra under Süsskind that are almost perfunctory. In addition the recorded sound of the Victor performance is far more beautiful, though it becomes afflicted with high-frequency distortion as it approaches the end of the side. On the same LP record is the Villa-Lobos Bachianas Brasileiras No. 5.

Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas" is performed on a Period record by Eleanor Houston (Dido), Adele Leigh (Belinda), and Henry Cummings (Aeneas), among others, with the Stuart Chamber Orchestra and Chorus directed by Jackson Gregory. Miss Leigh's soprano is the most beautiful; Miss Houston's acquires in When I am laid in earth some of the sensuous warmth it lacks earlier; Mr. Cummings's baritone is rough. The performance is excellent; its recorded sound is not always clean, and wavers in pitch on the first side.

Several excerpts from Purcell's "The Fairy Queen," including the fine soprano arias O let me ever, ever weep and Hark! hark! the ech'ing air a triumph sings, and several from "The Masque in Timon of Athens" are on an Oiseau Lyre LP, beautifully sung by Margaret Ritchie and played by an instrumental group under Anthony Lewis. The recorded sound of the instrumental portions is ear-piercing and often enveloped in a hash of distortion.

Record Notes

BY ROBERT E. GARIS

J. C. Bach: Piano Sonatas: Opus 5, Nos. 5 and 6; Opus 17, No. 6; Tolson (WCFM); music uninteresting; performance unexciting.

J. S. Bach: Selections from the Anna Magdalena Book: Rapf and Weis-Osborn (Bach Guild); minor harpsichord pieces by Bach and others, six fine Bach songs; harpsichord playing fair, singing very beautiful except for some uncertainties of pitch.

Music of Jubilee; Biggs with Columbia Chamber Orchestra under Burgin (Columbia); a selection of familiar chorale preludes and movements from Cantatas; performance fair, with occasionally vulgar brass playing.

Suites No. 2 and 6 for viola; Lillian Fuchs (Decca); the familiar suites usually played on the cello; performance rhythmically heavy, lacks ease; recording a bit cavernous.

Bartok: Viola Concerto; Primrose and the New Symphony Orchestra of London under Serly (Bartok); Serly's realization of Bartok's sketches—some effective moments in a generally scrappy piece; performance good.

Beethoven: Piano Sonatas, Opus 27, No. 2 ("Moonlight") and Opus 81a ("Les Adieux"); Serkin (Columbia); good performance, except for occasional over-excited distortions; noisy surfaces.

Trios, Opus 70, No. 1 ("Geister") and Opus 1, No. 2; Boston Trio (Allegro); performance good; recording very bad; noisy surfaces.

Brahms: Sonata No. 3 for piano;

Rubinstein (Victor); good performance; piano sound lacks body.

Chopin: Preludes; Brailowsky (Victor); poor performance.

Debussy: First Rhapsody for clarinet and piano; Kell and Rosen (Decca); poor performance; recording cavernous and muffled.

Hindemith: Sonata for clarinet and piano; Kell and Rosen (Decca); pleasant inventive music; slouchy and mannered performance by Kell, good one by Rosen; recording cavernous.

Mozart: Organ Sonatas, K. 67, 68, 69, 212, 225, 329; Messner with the Salzburg Mozarteum Orchestra under Paul Walter (Period); pretty uninteresting music except for some charming things in the last two; performance fair; recording brash, badly balanced.

Stravinsky: Three pieces for clarinet solo; Kell (Decca); pleasant, unimportant music; good performance, recording cavernous and blurred.

Wagner: "Tannhäuser"; Seider, Scheck, Paul, etc., with Munich State Opera Chorus and Orchestra under Heger (Urania); chorus and orchestra acceptable, singing very bad.

Landowska plays for Paderewski (Victor); engaging arrangements of Polish folk music by Couperin, Rameau, Landowska, and others; performance effective, occasionally over-effective.

The Italian Madrigal: a collection of music by Landini, Banchieri, Palestrina and others; Vassar Madrigal Singers under Geer (Allegro); what may be beautiful music made to sound uninteresting in this poor performance; recording blurred.

The Goulding Case

PAUL W. GOULDING, for ten years a member of the faculty of Nazareth (Pennsylvania) Area High School, recently submitted his resignation to the school committee rather than sign the loyalty oath passed last year by the state legislature.

Mr. Goulding is a Quaker, is married, and has three children. Fortunately, he will still be able to provide for his family, for he has been offered a position at the Abington Friends School near Philadelphia. But he will sacrifice a thousand dollars a year in income. He chooses to pay that price rather than conform to a law which he says carries the "superficial and unreal implication that we have only to close our minds to communism in order to save America."

Mr. Goulding taught seniors at Nazareth in a course called "Problems in Democracy" which cut across many fields of thought in the social sciences. His methods were much admired by his colleagues. He turned his class into something like a forum in order to elicit student opinion of all shades.

Before deciding to give up his post at Nazareth, Goulding carefully weighed many factors, not the least of which were economic. In a statement to the press he said: "Frankly, I don't know whether I would have had the courage to refuse to sign the oath if I had not had another position open to me." His opportunities were narrowly limited by his act, for he could hardly find employment in the public schools of any state, whether or not it requires an oath of loyalty of public servants.

The Pennsylvania oath requires all persons in state- or local-government employ to pledge allegiance to the Constitution and laws of the United States and Pennsylvania and to swear that they are not, and during the period of their employment with state or local government will not become, members of any organization advocating overthrow of the government by force or other unconstitutional means.

What were Mr. Goulding's reasons for refusing to sign this oath? He has answered that question for us:

I think that each one of us must follow his own conscience. Mine was not a snap decision. I have followed this trend toward regimentation, and I am unable to continue to conform to this kind of pressure in public schools.

That the actual words of the Pennsylvania loyalty oath are relatively innocuous is a tribute to the resistance by a free people and their representatives against coercive forces that would cast our very thoughts in a mold of conformity, mechanization, and violence. In spirit, however, the oath is one of several instruments by which we are being "persuaded" that totalitarian regimentation must be met by totalitarianism, one hundred per cent Americanism. In a day when the impulse to conform, to acquiesce, to go along is the instrument used in subjecting men to dictatorial rule throughout the world, nonconformity—with a religious motivation—becomes a means of preserving the dignity of mankind.

F. A. Marcks, superintendent of Nazareth schools, commented:

This man is certainly no Communist or subversive. He may be over-sensitive. The law itself may be futile, but we have no choice in the matter. He must take the oath or leave his post. We are going through what might be called an epidemic of loyalty oaths, and in time we may recover a little more of our perspective. A Communist might well be expected to take such an oath without qualm. Mr. Goulding has indicated that he cannot conscientiously take the oath. His attitude is one of protest against what he calls regimentation by influences working together to deprive us of our freedom. His protest recalls the fable of the oak and the reed. The oak refused to bend before the prevailing wind and was broken. The reed bent and stayed. Of course, the attitude of bowing to the prevailing wind can be carried too far.

Marcks admits we have lost our perspective and thinks we may recover it in time. Mr. Goulding, having followed the trend toward regimentation in the public schools, doubts our chance of recovering it. At what point Marcks believes we might bow too far to the prevailing wind he does not say. Mr. Goulding makes his position clear by the very act of resigning.

The reactions of Nazareth residents to Mr. Goulding's refusal to take the oath showed a virtually unanimous belief in his sincerity of purpose and his courage; members of organizations instrumental in securing the loyalty legislation even revealed something approaching a sense of guilt. For them it was one thing to go on record as indorsing the Americanism represented by the statute; it was another thing when a quiet, respected school teacher suddenly terminated his relationship with the community because his conscience would not let him acquiesce in what they looked upon as a simple oath of loyalty.

The president of the Lions Club said Mr. Goulding had great courage, and he felt certain that "state and nation were behind him." Several people thought that if he "did it on account of his religion, it was all right." Surprisingly, the V. F. W. post commander said Mr. Goulding "had every right to refuse to sign the oath," and added that he "agreed in part" with the attitude of teachers toward the oath.

As a result of the pressure exerted by certain groups which have made themselves the custodians of American democracy, Paul W. Goulding must leave Nazareth. Once again, in a blind attempt to destroy something which it fears because it does not understand it, an American community has lost the services of a man of talent, sterling honesty, and great courage.

The Shape of Things

SOMEWHERE ON THIS EARTH THERE IS A congenial home for the follower of every political philosophy save the anti-Nazi. He alone has become a kind of international outlaw, a pariah as unwelcome now on the other side of the Elbe as he has long been on this. So much emerges unmistakably from the Soviet proposal that "all former members of the German army, including officers and generals, and all former Nazis" should have the right to participate in the building of a united "democratic peace-loving Germany." The Russians propose further that Germany, having achieved democracy and a state of peace-lovingness with the aid of former S. S. Brigadenführers and general staff officers, be permitted to have its own "army, navy, and air forces." The moral obtuseness of these proposals are unfortunately paralleled in the West's answer. True, we did not bother to promise jobs to ex-Nazis, but that was because we have been giving them jobs for years—for example, see Mr. del Vayo's story on page 318. But we share with Russia a fervid desire to rearm the Germans, except naturally we want them to fight on our side. So we offer the Germans, instead of their old gray-green uniforms of unhappy memory, the more colorful garb of the European army—British cloth, perhaps, with a French cut to the jacket and more than a touch of American in the pockets. Both sides offer all-German elections, but only under conditions—again naturally—which would assure predetermined results. The exchange of notes are further moves in the courtship of a Fraülein whose "yes," The Nation is convinced, will make the successful suitor an even unhappier man than the rejected one.

BY FILING AN ACTION FOR LIBEL, SENATOR McCarthy has upset our prediction of last week that he would not accept the challenge to test in court the truth of Senator Benton's charges against him. But Joe's latest move is probably not so much an act of brashness as one of desperation. In an election year he simply could not afford to ignore Benton's charges indefinitely. By filing the suit he obviously hopes to stall the investigation of the charges by the Senate subcommittee on elections and to create the impression that he is "fighting back."

But the point to note is that McCarthy remains on the defensive. By forcing him to act Senator Benton has kept his charges current. He has insisted on an early trial and has driven McCarthy to say that he too wants an early trial. Thus it is clear that McCarthy has not only failed to regain the offensive but has been driven into a corner from which he is now trying to escape. He has simply underscored the weakness of his case by saying that Benton's charges would never have been made had it not been for his, McCarthy's, attacks on "Communists in government." If he has no better defense than this, he might as well drop the libel action now.

JOE MCCARTHY DISPLAYS A CURIOUS TALENT for getting hold of other people's mail. A University of Minnesota student wrote to Myles McMillan, political editor of the Madison Capital Times, asking him to suggest some questions to ask McCarthy when McCarthy spoke at the university on March 8. The speech was given, and at its conclusion, before any questions could be asked from the floor, McCarthy read aloud a garbled version of the student's letter. What's interesting is that McMillan had never received the letter, although the student swears that it was properly addressed, stamped, and posted. A week later McCarthy spoke before the Young Republicans of Dane County in Madison, Wisconsin; this time McMillan was in the audience. Again McCarthy, at the close of his speech, began to read the letter. Interrupting from the floor, McMillan explained that, although the letter was addressed to him, he had never received it; charged that McCarthy had read a garbled version of it the previous week; and demanded that the letter be shown to him as its legal owner. But McCarthy refused to yield the document; instead, turning to the audience, he said slyly that from time to time he "borrowed" material from Time and the files of the Institute of Pacific Relations, the implication being that he had "borrowed" McMillan's letter too. McMillan has entered a formal complaint with the postal authorities; "borrowing" other people's mail can be a criminal offense. Members of the Senate enjoy many privileges, including access to documents not normally available to the public. But when a Senator turns up in possession of a letter which the addressee swears he never received, some explanation is obviously in order. Perhaps the Senate subcommittee on elections will be able to induce McCarthy to explain this mystery when, if ever, it holds hearings on Senator Benton's resolution calling for his colleague's ouster. In the meantime, all critics of the gentleman from Wisconsin had better keep a sharp eye on their private mail.

FRANCO'S INTENTION TO BLACKMAIL THE United States into giving him the maximum number of dollars for the minimum amount of military help was confirmed by the aloof and almost indifferent attitude of the authorities when the new American ambassador, Lincoln MacVeagh, presented his credentials in Madrid. While the humorous Madrilenos were saying "this is not the Lincoln who liberated the slaves," the official reception was much cooler and less lavish than on the arrival of Stanton Griffis. "The general impression," wrote the New York Times correspondent, "is that of subtle snubbing of the United States." The snubbing was made even sharper by the absence of Foreign Minister Artajo, who, instead of remaining in Madrid to welcome the new ambassador and open the long-awaited negotiations with him and the American military mission, had departed on a much-publicized tour of the Arab countries. Franco's idea is to create the impression that he has the entire Arab world in his pocket and thus still further improve his bargaining position. The arrogant attitude of Madrid might well lead President Truman and the State Department to reconsider their policy toward Spain, especially since Admiral Fechteler declared in a Congressional hearing on March 27 that Spanish bases were not essential to this country's defense plans.

SERETSE KHAMA, SUSPENDED CHIEF OF THE Bamangwatos, largest tribe in the British Protectorate of Bechuanaland, is to be permanently barred from power. This decision of Lord Salisbury, Tory Secretary of Commonwealth Affairs, compounds the error of his Labor predecessor, who banished Seretse from the Bamangwato reserve for five years. It will be regarded by native Africans from the Gold Coast to the Cape as unwarranted interference in tribal affairs inspired by a desire to appease South African champions of white supremacy. Seretse's offense is marriage to a white woman. This, Lord Salisbury maintains, is a violation of tribal law that disqualifies him from the chieftainship. But as his junior in the House of Commons was forced to admit, the Bamangwato have accepted the marriage and in several tribal meetings have asked for Seretse's return. The fact is that it is not tribal law or custom that has been outraged but white taboos. In the Union of South Africa the fear of miscegenation is such that not only marriage but sexual relations between whites and Negroes are a crime for which both parties may be severely punished. Thus the British government is afraid to countenance the mixed marriage of a chief in territory bordering and economically dependent on South Africa, whose Nationalists have long claimed the right to rule Bechuanaland and two other native enclaves which remained subject to the British crown when South Africa became a dominion. Yet it ought to be clear by now that Britain cannot appease the Malan government of South Africa without alienating native opinion in other parts of the continent that are moving irresistibly toward self-government.

HENRY W. GRUNEWALD, "MYSTERY" FIGURE in the investigation of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, becomes a little less mysterious with each new phase of the investigation. When it was revealed that Grunewald had made contributions to the Democratic National Committee, the Senate's Republican leaders clucked pious disapproval. But it now appears that Grunewald was on equally good terms with the high command of the Republican Party. Senator Owen Brewster used him as "a kind of conduit" to funnel contributions of $5,000 each to Senators Milton Young and Richard Nixon. He also admits having known Grunewald for "a good while"; in fact, Grunewald has called at his office as often as two or three times a month over a period of several years. The Republican leader of the Senate, Styles Bridges, also knew Grunewald well enough to intervene in a $7,000,000 tax case at his request. It should now be fairly clear that the "mystery" never really existed. For example, there is no mystery about the large sums which Grunewald listed in his tax return as "brokerage fees and commission" but which he now says were really winnings from gambling, "primarily on horses." Grunewald seems to have been the kind of gambler who bet on both political horses, the Democratic and the Republican.

The Wilson Fiasco

THE responsibility for a steel strike, if one occurs, will rest directly upon the President's ill-chosen, incompetent ex-mobilization director, Charles E. Wilson. Although officially withdrawn, Wilson's petulant criticisms of the Wage Stabilization Board's recommendations in the steel-wage dispute obviously stimulated the industry to resist the proposals and in effect invited the steel operators to force a strike to force the government into a stiff price increase. For this disservice to the country, among others, Wilson's resignation over the weekend was accepted at the White House.

Two issues were involved: (1) whether the Wage Board's steel proposals were in fact equitable and appropriate, and (2) whether Wilson, even if the proposals were faulty, had not shown himself, once too often, incapable of mastering the social and political overtones of economic mobilization in a democracy.

Nathan P. Feinsinger, chairman of the Wage Stabilization Board, truthfully said that the steel-wage proposals were reasonable. When price controls are shot through with loopholes deliberately created by Congress, wage stabilization cannot mean a wage freeze. The most liberal interpretation of W. S. B. regulations on cost-of-living wage adjustments would have given the steel workers substantially more than the 15-cents-an-hour basic increase the board recommended. W. S. B. procedures have always provided for correction of inequities. It was an inequity for steel workers not to have been paid holidays when other industrial workers had them, and six paid holidays a year was the principal "fringe" benefit allowed by the wage board.

The broader question was Wilson's bias and malevolent ignorance whenever he was forced to deal with a question involving labor. If he believed the wage proposals seriously threatened our economy he should have used a little tact and discrimination. He could have called in Philip Murray, president of the United Steelworkers. He could have tried to argue his case with Roger L. Putman, stabilization director, with Ellis Arnall, price director, and with Feinsinger.

Instead, Wilson ran up to New York to discuss matters with the masters of the steel industry, went to Key West to talk to Truman, returned to Washington to issue public denunciations of the proposed settlement. Having provoked the fiery retort from Murray that the unions would not cooperate with the Wage Board if Wilson could arbitrarily dismiss its findings as false and wicked, Wilson belatedly tried to climb off his high horse. By that time he was confronted not only with labor's boycott threat but with the possible resignation of the public members of the W. S. B., and of Putman and Arnall as well, none of whom were willing to be exposed to snap-judgment repudiations when they were working in good faith to get a practical answer to wage and price questions.

Of course, Wilson said, the W. S. B. is a "duly constituted" body with authority to handle wage questions; its proposals should naturally be considered the "basis" for settling the steel-wage dispute. But he made these admissions only after he was driven to them by the explosive reaction of Murray and the board's public members, only after he had given aid and comfort to the steel industry if it chose to resist the board's proposals, only after encouraging the anti-labor majority of the House Rules Committee to clamor for an "investigation" designed to assist the companies.

The question of prices is and always has been the major issue in the steel dispute. But the companies want more than a price rise: they want undiminished profits after taxes, and Wilson has encouraged them to demand just this kind of "relief" or to induce a strike by whitening down the wage-board proposals—after the union has four times voluntarily postponed its deadline to give the W. S. B. a chance to act.

The President's letter accepting Wilson's resignation gives the gist of the dispute in the following words: "As far as steel prices are concerned, it is true that I agreed to a 'possible necessity' of allowing some price increase. . . . Such a determination should obviously be made only after a thorough examination of the facts. For example, it seems to me to be quite material and important that the profits of the steel industry are continuing at extraordinarily high levels—that their profits amount to a good many times as much as any increased costs they would incur under the recommendations of the Wage Stabilization Board."

Mr. Truman Steps Aside

THE timing and occasion of the President's announcement that he is not a candidate surprised nearly everyone, but his withdrawal itself is no surprise. Mr. Truman has not been acting like a candidate for months. The most significant aspect of the announcement was the flat statement: "I shall not accept renomination." Clearly the President's decision is irreversible. He will not be drafted; he will not reconsider; he cannot undo what he has done. This means, of course, that the race for the Democratic nomination is now wide open.

The tardiness of the President's statement confronts liberal elements in the Democratic Party with a major crisis. In the first place, Mr. Truman has now lost, if he ever possessed, the power to name the candidate. It has never been easy for an incumbent—even a popular incumbent—to handpick his successor. Mr. Truman is not a popular incumbent and he has permitted the control of the delegations to get completely out of his hand.

Consider, for example, the chaotic political scene in California. After months of painful negotiation a unity slate was finally assembled. It must be assumed that Mr. Truman was informed of every detail of these negotiations and that he approved the plan of uniting the Roosevelt and Pauley elements—the left and the right—in a pro-Truman delegation. Yet in the wake of the Minnesota and New Hampshire primaries he suddenly insisted (March 19) that the delegation must disband. Now, with the deadline rapidly approaching, a single delegation has been entered, one pledged to Senator Kefauver. A politician of Mr. Truman's experience does not present an upstart rival with the California delegation unless he has some compelling reason. Either Mr. Truman was afraid that he might suffer a humiliating defeat in the California primary or the size of the write-in vote for Eisenhower in Minnesota convinced him that he should retire. Even before his announcement, therefore, he had lost the power to handpick his successor; now he probably could not even veto the nomination of a candidate of whom he disapproved. Thus those who think that it will be easy for Mr. Truman to hand the nomination to, say, Governor Stevenson, had better resurvey the situation.

Now that Mr. Truman has withdrawn, the pre-convention bargaining will really start. The outcome will be largely determined of course by the way in which each of the various groups making up the Democratic coalition appraises the relative strength of the other groups, alone and in combination. The Southern Bourbons are at the present time the best-organized; in fact, they hold the initiative. The Bourbons no longer have any reason to fear the Republican Party. Not one candidate for the Republican nomination even vaguely threatens "white supremacy." On the other hand, the power of the South in the Democratic Party has increased since 1948—witness the conciliatory attitude which Senators Douglas and Humphrey have lately shown on civil rights. To be sure, the Negro vote in the key states is as important as it was in 1948 but the bargaining position of the Negro has deteriorated. No one knew in 1948 how many Negroes might vote for Henry Wallace if the Democrats failed to adopt a militant civil-rights program. But the Negro vote is not likely to swing to Taft, and it is difficult to imagine Warren or Stassen or Eisenhower becoming passionate advocates of civil rights overnight. The Bourbons know exactly what they want—a "compromise" nominee for the Presidency who is "reasonable" about civil rights, the Vice-Presidency, restoration of the two-thirds' rule, protection of seniority in Congress, and more power for the South in the councils of the party. In a wide-open convention, the Bourbons can make deals right and left; their compactness will give them great bargaining strength. Right now the Bourbons are odds-on favorites to win a strategic victory in Chicago. Only some countervailing power can offset their tactical advantage. What the liberals need, above all, is a left wing within the party. Without a left flank of some kind they can exhort and argue but they are captives; they have no alternative.

Furthermore, the liberal elements of the Democratic coalition have been weakened by the witch hunt which has driven men like Frank Graham and Claude Pepper from elective office and chased most of the liberals from Washington. Immobilized, demoralized, disunited, they have lost the initiative. For years these elements relied on the magic of Roosevelt's name and his political skill; since his death they have coasted along with Truman—for the ride. Collectively they possess great power, but they lack the habit of united action. Each individual organization knows what it wants and will have spokesmen at Chicago to suggest excellent planks for the Democratic platform. But if the liberal elements of the old coalition cannot agree well in advance of the convention on a strong candidate, a platform, and a strategy, they are likely to be outmaneuvered by the Bourbons and their allies. The danger is not that the Bourbons will bolt but that they will win most of their objectives by astute bargaining.

The crisis faced by the liberal elements is enhanced by reason of the fact that General Eisenhower is precisely the kind of candidate who, if nominated by the Republicans, will draw votes from every element making up the old Roosevelt coalition. It will be relatively easy for Republican therapists to induce large sections of an anxious public to transfer their affection and loyalty for the Roosevelt father-image to the symbol of the friendly, frank, warm-hearted General. Unless prompt action is taken, moreover, there will be a strong tendency for certain elements of the old coalition, specifically in the labor movement, to climb aboard the Eisenhower bandwagon and to make deals while they can be made. If Eisenhower is nominated, he will not be defeated by a Democrat whose principal virtue is his general "acceptability" to all elements of the party. Only a candidate who offers a real alternative to the General's point of view and program is likely to defeat him.

In the wide-open fight that has now developed, the Democratic convention can easily be deadlocked. Kefauver, Russell, and Kerr will control important delegations, and much of the remaining strength will be parceled out to tenacious favorite-son candidates. With many explosive issues certain to arise—civil rights is one—the convention may have to look around for a dark horse candidate. While there are not many dark horses in the Democratic pasture these days, there are some that offer attractive possibilities from the point of view of the Bourbons and their allies—for example, a Paul Douglas-Richard Russell ticket.

Faced with this emergency, what should the liberal in the Democratic coalition do? Organized groups should, first of all, take polls to find out, if possible, the kind of candidate their members really want (see page 314 of this issue). Secondly, the leaders of these organizations should immediately get together for the purpose of working out a strategy and platform and agreeing, if possible, upon a candidate. If they do this, the liberal elements can have a decisive influence in the convention even if they control no delegations; for no Democratic nominee can hope to win without the support of such groups as the A. F. of L., the C. I. O., the Farmers' Union, the United Mine Workers, and the Railroad Brotherhoods. If the Democratic Party is not to fall apart at the seams, or to be taken over completely by a fusion of conservative Northerners and Southerners, the liberal wing must regain the initiative. The objective cannot be the selection of a "harmony" slate that will "hold the party together"; already this theme is being ballyhooed far and wide as the major task of the convention. The Bourbons are much too strong today, in alliance with other conservative elements in the party, to be held in line by a few minor concessions. Concessions and compromises will not hold the Democratic Party together; only a candidate and program that will capture the imagination of the people can serve the purpose. For this is 1952, and the world moves. The Democrats must not compromise with those "dinosaurs" of whom the President spoke; they must find a road to the future.

Vote Your Choice for President

IN THE last few weeks The Nation's readers have been firing questions at us: What kind of President does the country need in this year of decision? Will the candidates chosen in the Chicago conventions truly reflect the people's wishes? Will liberals have any say in the matter? Can they even make known their preferences? How can we assure the selection of candidates who will offer the people a real choice?

To these readers—to all our readers—we say: who is your candidate? And to enable you to answer that question simply and directly, we have prepared the ballot printed below.

This is your opportunity to make your choice known. The American electoral process puts up many barriers between you and the chance to vote for the man you want: a tangle of conflicting state laws governing the selection of convention delegates; the power of political machines and pressure groups; the ability of the mass communications media to mold opinion.

The only way you can register your preference is through the informal poll. The remaining primaries, like many which have already taken place, offer but a limited range of choice. Many states have no primaries at all. We don't pretend that informal polls will be a decisive factor at the nominating conventions. But they can influence the platforms adopted and the candidates considered.

In any case, the people's preferences should be recorded. Fill out and return immediately the ballot below. Urge other readers to mail their ballots. You need not sign your name. Space is provided for a "write-in candidate in case your own preference is not on our list.

Nation readers form an important country-wide audience. If enough of you mark and return these ballots to give a good sampling, the results can have weight. The larger the return, the more interest and influence the poll will have. This is your chance to tell not merely us but the politicians and the country at large who you think should be the next President of the United States.

INSTRUCTIONS

1. All ballots must be mailed not later than April 25 and should be addressed to: POLL EDITOR, THE NATION, 20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK 7, NEW YORK.
2. You may vote for your first and second choice irrespective of the column in which the names appear, but only two choices may be indicated. Use the figures 1 and 2 to indicate your first and second choice.
3. Knowing that every copy of The Nation is read by more than one reader, we have printed extra ballots, one of which we will send to any individual who requests it in writing before April 19.

YOUR BALLOT

The Nation's PREFERENTIAL BALLOT FOR PRESIDENT to be mailed not later than April 25 to POLL EDITOR,

Joe McCarthy in Wisconsin

BY WILLIAM T. EVJUE

Madison, Wisconsin

WISCONSIN is taking seriously the accounting it must make to the nation this year for electing Joseph R. McCarthy to the United States Senate in 1946 and for giving the nation the ugly cult of McCarthyism.

Somewhat more than two years ago McCarthy began his rampage in a speech at Wheeling, West Virginia, in which he charged that he held in his hand the names of 205 Communists in the State Department who were working there with the knowledge of Secretary Acheson. Like the rest of the country, Wisconsin was stunned and puzzled by his reckless charges. Even the people who knew him best and had come to expect the worst were mystified. What was he up to now? they asked. They knew that he had been pretty thoroughly discredited in the state. A succession of revelations which broke after his election in 1946—including his failure to report $42,000 of his 1943 income to state tax authorities, a disbarment recommendation brought by the state Board of Bar Commissioners, and the finding of the Supreme Court that he had violated the Constitution, the laws, the legal code of ethics, and his oath as a judge and lawyer—added up to a record which seriously weakened his position at home.

In late 1949 and early 1950 Republican politicians casting about for a possible weak spot in the organization which they could take advantage of to satisfy their own ambitions looked hopefully toward 1952, when McCarthy would have to face reelection. They looked beyond 1950, when the state's senior Senator, Alexander Wiley, would be up for reelection. The situation was summed up by one prominent Republican with Senatorial ambitions in a remark to newsmen: "I think I could take Wiley, but I'll wait for the easy one in 1952."

In February, 1950, McCarthy opened his anti-Communist campaign. It caught the Republican leaders in Wisconsin by surprise, and for some time they maintained a discreet silence. Soon, however, it became obvious that McCarthy's gamble to rehabilitate his political prestige was working. In the atmosphere of suspicion and fear hanging over the country his campaign caught on and spread. Anti-communism was not a new issue to Wisconsin Republicans; they had been using it for years against the La Follettes and Roosevelt. But McCarthy had added a dash of reckless irresponsibility which made it look like a new formula for political dynamite.

WILLIAM T. EVJUE is the editor of the Madison Capital Times.

The inferiority complex of the national Democratic Administration helped to make the concoction even more formidable. There was obviously no disposition in either the executive branch or the Senate to clear the decks and take on this demagogue who was using his privileged position in the Senate to destroy reputations and damage national prestige abroad. I was in Washington in the summer of 1950 and was astounded at the terror a poolroom politician from my home state could instil in men holding responsible positions in the government. The President tried to ignore him. The State Department could do no more than act injured. Senators sat mute as he brought the tactics of the gutter brawler into the chamber and made a shambles of the Senate's dignity. He had only to speak, and the newspapers opened up their front pages and radio its air lanes.

The hate groups and the malcontents rallied to him without waiting to see whether he could get away with it. As soon as it became obvious that he could, the big and wise money went on his nose. When McCarthy returned to Wisconsin in the early summer of 1950 to address the state Republican convention the word had gone down: "This is our boy." In consequence he got a roaring welcome and an indorsement of his campaign without dissent.

As McCarthyism grew and spread throughout Wisconsin, I could recall only one thing similar to it in the history of the state. It had all the characteristics of the campaign of persecution carried on against citizens suspected of "pro-Germanism" when the hysteria of the First World War was at its height. In those days it was as dangerous to be suspected of "pro-Germanism" as it is today to be suspected of communism. I recall them vividly, having lived through them as a supporter of the elder Senator La Follette and having felt the sting of the advertising and circulation boycotts organized against the fledgling Capital Times in Madison by the souped-up patriots of that period. It is significant, incidentally, that McCarthy and his latter-day patriots have urged a boycott against the Capital Times because of its opposition to McCarthyism, the first publication in the country to be so distinguished.

In the days of "pro-Germanism" hysteria it was only necessary to start a rumor questioning the loyalty of a citizen and he would find his house or barn daubed with yellow paint. La Follette was the target of the same charges of disloyalty as are hurled at Acheson, Jes-sup, and Marshall today. But that hysteria spent itself against the fundamental good sense of the people. In 1922 La Follette, the symbol which it had attacked, was reelected to the Senate by an unprecedented majority.

The difference between the two situations is of course great. La Follette used his position in the Senate to fight against the hysteria. McCarthy is using his to fan it into new fury and to exploit for his political advantage. There are signs, however, that McCarthyism is spending itself. For one thing, Washington shows a greater disposition to carry the fight to him. Senator Benton's resolution questioning his fitness to serve in the Senate could be a valuable offensive weapon against him if the rest of the Senate had the courage Benton displayed in introducing it. [See page 309 of this issue for editorial comment on McCarthy's libel suit against Benton.]

This advantage will probably be lost through the timidity of Senator Gillette, chairman of the Rules Committee, and the refusal of progressives like Douglas, Humphrey, O'Mahoney, Fulbright, and others to depart from the ridiculous patterns of conduct called "Senatorial courtesy." The President, who in the summer of 1950 seemed afraid even to recognize McCarthy's existence, has spoken out with more courage than most of the Senate liberals. But the Democratic National Committee, which has done nothing to justify its existence since McCarthyism became a part of the national vocabulary, is still in the storm cellar.

THERE are signs that the people here are catching up with McCarthy. He is running into the beginning of the "big doubt," which he exploited so shrewdly to defeat Tydings in Maryland. It is not a "big doubt" yet, but it is growing. It showed itself in the last session of the legislature when a young Republican Assemblyman introduced a resolution for an amendment to the legislative-immunity clause of the state constitution. The amendment was debated on a pro- and anti-McCarthy basis and was defeated by the Republicans, but it pulled six Republican votes in the Assembly and all the Democratic votes except one which has since turned Republican.

Unlike the 1950 Republican convention, the 1951 convention saw some determined delegates take the floor to speak against a resolution indorsing McCarthy. When they were booed down by the McCarthyites, Governor Walter Kohler denounced the un-American conduct of the McCarthy supporters. Kohler seemed to be preparing himself to lead the opposition to McCarthy. On his return from a European tour last fall he announced that he was contemplating running for the Senate. His statement gave great impetus to the efforts to retire McCarthy, particularly after subsequent polls indicated that he would win in a primary contest. Since then, however, Kohler, who is not a political leader of strong convictions, has collapsed under pressure from party bosses and announced that he will seek reelection as governor.

No formidable primary opponent against McCarthy is in sight, though speculation mentions the names of former Governor Oscar Rennebohm; Leonard Schmitt, a young Republican attorney who has been leading the fight against the present bosses of the party; and Delbert Kenny, a prominent Republican once indorsed by the party for governor but later double-crossed. The candidacy of state Senator Chester Dempsey, which was announced some time ago, is taken seriously by no one but Dempsey. One Democratic candidate, Henry Reuss of Milwaukee, has announced. He is conducting a vigorous campaign, but the party is not agreed that he is the strongest possible candidate, and there is still a chance that others may enter.

One thing that makes it difficult to gauge the sentiment about McCarthy is the prevailing atmosphere of hysteria and intimidation, which is not conducive to the free expression of opinion against him. The pro-McCarthy forces, on the other hand, with the Chamber of Commerce, American Legion, and knife-and-fork-club crowd offering ready-made forums, are very articulate. The anti-McCarthy people were recently given a demonstration of what they can expect when a group of Republicans, independents, and Democrats at Wisconsin Rapids sponsored a newspaper advertisement criticizing the Senator. A few days later McCarthy dived into his fox-hole of immunity in the Senate and charged that Philleo Nash, a Presidential aide and the brother of Jean Nash, one of the sponsors of the advertisement was a Communist. The Nash family are well-to-do, highly respectable cranberry farmers at Wisconsin Rapids.

The hysteria responsible for McCarthyism is clearly on the wane in Wisconsin. Whether it is diminishing rapidly enough for Wisconsin to right the wrong it did the nation in 1946 is a question that cannot now be answered.

McCarthy at Princeton

BY KARL E. MEYER

Princeton, New Jersey

NOTHING red is in evidence at Princeton University but the picturesque brick floor of two-hundred-year-old Nassau Hall. One pundit has described Princeton as "the farthest north of all Southern schools." In a Presidential straw vote taken among the undergraduates in 1948, Harry Truman ran a lame third, trailing behind the Dixiecrats as well as Dewey. These things make the current reaction of Princeton undergraduates to the Senator from Wisconsin, Joseph Raymond McCarthy, worthy of notice. When the evil smells of "McCarthy-ism" penetrated the ivied Eden of Princeton, an old and stable conservatism was confronted with the Realpolitik of Know-Nothing Republicanism.

It all began last February, when five Princeton sophomores, with commendable curiosity, decided to attend a meeting of the Essex County Republicans in nearby Milburn which Senator McCarthy was to address. They went, they listened, and they were called Communists—a traumatic experience for a Princeton sophomore and newsworthy enough to be featured on the front page of the Daily Princetonian. The headline read: "Five Princeton Sophomores Attend McCarthy Talk; Senator's Fans Term Them 'Intellectually Twisted.'" The story revealed that the Princeton Five showed a lack of reverence at the meeting by asking, among other things, if Senator McCarthy would repeat his pro-Communist charges against Ambassador Philip Jessup from the immunity-free podium of Milburn High School and were told by two "dowager types" that they were "intellectually twisted."

Before the evening was done the young scholars were in for further, if less horrifying, surprises. In an informal question period after the address, the Princetonian reported, one of them made a skeptical remark about the virtues of Joe McCarthy. "Some neighboring listeners," it continued, "hearing the remark, demanded that the two Princetonians be ejected from the meeting. Others proclaimed, 'Let the Commies talk, let the Commies talk.' At this stage a 'little man in a blue suit' appeared and declared that he heartily wished that the Princetonians be sent to Korea and be brought back in a basket." "This suggestion," concluded the paper, "met with no objection from nearby spectators."

Instead of enlisting in the marines, however, the five sophomores drafted a long letter to the student paper, which, under the circumstances, was a model of restraint. The letter began:

Until last Friday night we had only read about, never experienced, a demagogue. But then in Milburn, New Jersey, we saw Senator Joseph McCarthy in action. This was one of the most eye-opening experiences of our lives, for this representative of the American public transformed a crowd of supposedly intelligent citizens into a mob of . . . haters. To say that these people's minds were putty in the hands of this oratorical artist is too trite and feeble a statement.

The conclusion of the letter warned:

We feel that McCarthy's appeal to the existing insecurities and fears of the people, his appeal to emotion and not reason, serves to label as subversive any criticism of the status quo. The inference is that any position to the left of McCarthy must be disloyal.

This might have been the end of the story, but even at Princeton there are some freshmen foolish enough to believe what they read in the papers, if they read beyond the sport and—at Princeton—financial pages. One such freshman wrote a letter immediately to the Princetonian complaining that he was "sick and tired of hearing one of our most courageous and honest living Americans slandered by such terms as 'bigot,' 'character assassin,' 'neurotic,' and 'pathological.'" The victimized citizen was Senator McCarthy.

Many students were profoundly disturbed by the fact that even a freshman should have such an idea. In an editorial entitled McCarthyism a Threat to Individual Dignity, the Princetonian scolded the erring freshman and warned, "In our opinion, McCarthyism and its effects are as dangerous a threat to the security of this country as any move by the Soviet Union or its satellites."

There were several more letters correcting the freshman. The most interesting was one jointly drafted by five fellow-freshmen who desired to restore the honor of the class of 1955. McCarthy, the five students observed, was called "courageous" and "honest."

But is it honest to exaggerate, to distort? [they asked]. Is it honest to maliciously assail a person without giving any real proof, as he did with Mr. Jessup? Is the Senator courageous to hide behind Congressional immunity or, when bluffed out of this protection, to make threats so vague and hazy they can hardly be defined?

The demands of honor, however, are still more stringent than a mere rebuke at Princeton. The final touch was supplied by the Carlsen Club, an organization recently set up to honor the exploits of the skipper of the Flying Enterprise. The club president, a sophomore, announced that the offending pro-McCarthy freshman was being dropped from its membership. He explained:

While the club maintains that everyone has the right to freedom of expression, we also feel that the interests of integrity and loyalty in public service—the principles for which we stand—are hindered by the existence within our midst of such libelous views. . . .

This was a unique and in some ways an unfortunate twist: a Princeton freshman being dropped from organizational membership for supporting a Republican Senator.

There may be repercussions. Princeton has been called as politically pure as a Vermont Senator. If Senator McCarthy learns of recent developments, Princeton's reputation may change. After all, one of Princeton's famous alumni is Norman Thomas, and as McCarthy will tell you, a Socialist is only a Communist marching at half-time.

Rebirth of the Nazi International

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

THE other day the Bavarian Radio revealed that "85 per cent of the leading officials in the West German Foreign Office are former Nazis," a proportion even greater than when the ministry was headed by Joachim von Ribbentrop. The broadcast included an interesting statistical picture of the current personnel, by departments, as follows:

Political Department. The entire executive staff of ten, including the department head and all desk chiefs, are former Nazis who served under von Ribbentrop.

Länder Department (Department of the Federated States). Seven of the eight top officials are veterans both of the Nazi Party and of the Nazi foreign service.

Commerce Department. All five top officials were once party members and also employees of Hitler's Foreign Office.

Cultural Department. Three of the four executives are party veterans.

Personnel Department. Eighteen of the nineteen top officials worked for Hitler's Foreign Office; fourteen were Nazi Party members. (The Personnel Department has primary responsibility for choosing the Foreign Office staff.)

Protocol Department. Two of the three top executives were party members.

The qualitative break-down of this list is as impressive as the quantitative. Among the men now serving in the Bonn Foreign Office are Legation Counselor von Keller, first assistant to Woermann, a Hitler Secretary of State who was sentenced to death as a war criminal at Nürnberg; Legation Counselor Melchers, a Middle East expert who conducted the Führer's negotiations with the Grand Mufti, Jew-baiter and war criminal; Herr von Trützschler, who helped prepare Ribbentrop's famous White Books; Heribert von Stempel, secretary of Hitler's embassy in Washington and one of the organizers of the Nazi fifth column in the United States, who is now in a position to resume his contacts in this country. This is only a small sampling of what the Hitler regime has bequeathed to Herr Adenauer's Foreign Ministry. Other ministries are only a little less contaminated. Last fall, at a meeting of experts called to Paris to discuss the question of a European army, French officers expressed resentment that their German opposites were accompanied by advisers who had formerly been notorious Nazis.

The situation in Germany has become more dangerous because of the number of disgruntled ex-servicemen who have been drawn into soldiers' leagues by ex-General Friessner. They constitute a political army of a distinctly fascist stripe. Friessner himself has been so outspoken in his Nazi sympathies—he characterized the abortive 1944 revolt against Hitler as a "cowardly attempt to murder the Supreme Commander behind the front line"—that Bonn felt compelled to replace him. But his successor, on assuming office, declared: "I had to obey the orders of my Führer. I could not stab the Supreme Commander in the back as the Social Democrats did in World War I." It would not seem as though the change were calculated to modify the nationalist fervor of the war veterans' organizations or their loyalty to former Nazi leaders.

The fascist revival is also in full swing on the other side of the Brenner Pass, especially in southern Italy. There the neo-Fascists expect great victories in the municipal elections to be held at the end of next month. Foreign observers in Rome were shocked by the recent demonstrations for the return of Trieste instigated by neo-Fascists. But these evidences of fascist arrogance in Italy are less important than the underground effort to reorganize the Fascist militia, or the fact that important henchmen of Hitler are still in hiding and presumably playing active roles in the Fascist underground. One may doubt the report recently published in the Berlin Socialist daily Telegraf that Martin Bormann, the Führer's deputy, is hiding in a Rome monastery under the name of Brother Martin. It is a fact, however, that many Nazis have found refuge in Italian monasteries.

They also continue to find refuge in Switzerland. Recently a reporter for the weekly Die Nation of Berne discovered that a resident of Lugano was receiving a great deal of mail, especially from South America, and was making frequent rush trips to Italy and Austria. The Lugano man also made a trip to Egypt, where a group of ex-Gestapo members has been active for a year, operating within the framework of the amusing but dangerous friendship which has sprung up between Franco and certain Arab feudal chiefs. The Berne reporter finally penetrated the alias of this seemingly inoffensive resident of Lugano. He turned out to be former S. S. leader Eugen Dollman, once a close associate of Heinrich Himmler and intermediary between Marshal Kesselring, commander of German forces in Italy, and the Gestapo, which was then trying to liberate Mussolini. As a result of Die Nation's exposé, Dollman has been deported; Swiss authorities, who like authorities elsewhere had come to believe that fascism was an outmoded affair of interest only to historians, are now carrying on a thorough investigation of Nazi activities in their country.

A few days after Die Nation's story appeared, John J. McCloy, American High Commissioner for Germany, denied knowledge of the existence of an important group of Nazi conspirators in Cairo. It is apparent that Mr. McCloy does not read the German press with sufficient care. For the Echo der Woche of Munich had already carried a long article, entitled Nazi Conspiracy in Cairo, Madrid, and Rome, which presented detailed information on what the paper called "the new Fascist International" and its operations in the Middle East at a time when that area was becoming increasingly a focus of East-West conflict.

The title of the Munich article was not a literary caprice. An international fascist conference held secretly in Sweden some time ago—a recent issue of

U. S. Policy on Nazis

OFFICIAL publisher of the daily Neue Zeitung of Munich, which carries on its masthead the legend, "An American Newspaper in Germany," is the United States High Commissioner for Germany. Recently the newspaper in an editorial sharply warned Chancellor Adenauer that his foreign policy could never win back the confidence of the world so long as his Foreign Office employed men who had served the Nazi regime and were accessories to Hitler's crimes.

A few days later, at the specific request of the High Commissioner's office, the Neue Zeitung ran the following retraction: "A speaker for the American High Commissioner made this statement on Monday: 'In view of the fact that the political past of certain members of the Foreign Office is being investigated upon the initiative of the Foreign Office itself, the editorial of the Neue Zeitung was out of place. The Neue Zeitung had no intention of influencing the authorities charged with the investigation.'"

Tactfully ignoring the hint of internecine squabbling at high American levels implicit in the incident, the Social Democratic News Service, an organ of the German Social Democratic Party, made the following general comment: "For the price of a German defense contribution, the United States High Commission is apparently willing to accept even gravely incriminated members of the Foreign Office, regardless of the fact that these people have dishonored the German name."

Time magazine makes reference to it—adopted as its slogan: "Fascists of the World, Unite." The few intelligence agents in Europe who are paying any attention to the problem are convinced that an executive committee is reorganizing fascist forces throughout the world from underground headquarters in Madrid. These agents are also convinced that the fascists have a great deal of money at their disposal. It will be recalled that during the war official investigations revealed that considerable sums had been transferred to several Latin American countries, notably Argentina, from Germany via Madrid.

In the war's closing months, when Hitler knew that the struggle was irremediably lost, fund transfers from Germany to Spain increased. Other Nazi assets were either hidden in a physical sense or deposited in various countries under aliases. A sensational discovery in a Tyrolean village in 1950 disclosed that S. S. forces, before they withdrew from the area in April, 1945, buried forty to fifty million dollars' worth of loot. Surely there must still exist many caches of gold and foreign currency which the Gestapo took from Jews and other Nazi victims, not only in Germany but in the occupied countries.

As for the United States, one can assume that the thousands of Nazis who were in this country before Pearl Harbor, and about whom the FBI made several interesting reports at the time, have not simply disappeared into thin air; nor have they been converted to democracy. Most of them are still here and form a link between the Nazis in Europe and those who operate in Latin America protected by totalitarian regimes like Perón's. America has become a kind of refueling point for the busy and wide-ranging fascist conspirators.

Impressions of New China

BY V. K. R. V. RAO

[V. K. R. V. RAO is one of India's most distinguished citizens, a scholar and economist of international repute. He has represented the government of India at the United Nations and at many important international conferences and is now head of the Delhi School of Economics and of the Department of Economics at Delhi University. This article is the first of two based on his experience as a member of a group of Indian intellectuals who made an official good-will tour of China last fall. We think Mr. Rao's reports of special significance as reflecting an important segment of non-Communist Indian opinion on Communist China.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Delhi, India

AT THE outset I wish to state that my observations on the new China have a very limited basis. They are derived largely from a stay in China of hardly more than five weeks, during which I visited Canton, Peking Mukden, Tientsin, Nanking, and Shanghai. I was able to inspect a number of factories, villages, shops, universities, and exhibitions, as well as visit places of cultural and historical interest. In addition, our group held discussions, either together or singly, with important personages in the political and economic field, including the Prime Minister of China, the Governor of the People's Bank of China, the Mayor of Peking, the Vice-Chairman of the All-China Federation of Labor, and several university professors. In a number of cases the conversation was in English and carried on tête-à-tête, while in others interpreters had to be utilized. A trained observer is also adept at using his eyes and ears in a foreign country, and though ignorance of the local language may put the ears out of action, the eyes discover many interesting things on a long rail journey.

Let me begin with some remarks about the new government of China. It is a multi-party government in the sense that it contains representatives of political parties other than the Communist Party and prominent individuals with no special party affiliations, but leadership is unquestionably in the hands of the Communist Party, and the three most important posts—Chairman, Premier, and Commander-in-Chief—are held by Communists. It is based on what is called the "people's democratic united front," which includes not only the working class and the peasantry but also the petty bourgeoisie, or trading classes, and the national bourgeoisie, or patriotic capitalists. Admittedly the government functions as a dictatorship, but the only groups conscious of repression are those with vested feudal interests and persons who, having lost their special positions of privilege or power, would like to bring back the old regime. I cannot help feeling that part of the emphasis one finds in China on the suppression of these classes is due to the fact that Chiang Kai-shek's rule in Formosa constitutes a standing threat to the Peking government, especially since it is supported by the United States.

For the rest of the population, and this means the vast majority, the constitution provides for people's congresses at all levels; these are elected by universal franchise and in turn elect the central, regional, state, municipal, county, and village governments. A few cities and counties have already elected people's congresses; in others local power is wielded by representative conferences constituted on the multi-party lines of the Central Chinese People's Consultative Conference. The system has brought the people into close contact with the government and given them the opportunity to ventilate their needs and express their criticisms.

Moreover, the people are being organized according to locality, occupation, sex, and so on, and these organizations function actively, directing their attention not so much to ideological issues as to the concrete problems of daily life. The people discuss their own faults and ways of helping themselves as well as the faults of government officials and ways of obtaining more effective government aid. Of course their meetings are also used by the government to expound its program, explain its actions, and seek popular support for its policies. The government is constantly explaining and educating; the people are constantly discussing. China has become one large talking shop or rather a multitude of little discussion clubs; and there is an undeniable feeling in the air that the people are participating in the government.

Whether this is democracy or dictatorship I do not know. I do know that the political liveliness, the widespread knowledge of and interest in details of government activity, and the government's sensitiveness to the need for educating public opinion and enlisting public support make an overwhelming impression even on a comparatively hard-boiled and much-traveled visitor. Curiously enough, the only other country I know where there is the same mass interest in governmental activity and the same governmental sensitiveness to it is the United States. Perhaps the new China, in spite of its denunciation of "American imperialism," is being unconsciously influenced by the democratic processes characteristic of the nation with which the old China had more friendly associations for a century and a half than it enjoyed with any other country.

There is no doubt that the new government is an effective government; its writ runs the length and breadth of continental China. It is true that most of the bridges are still guarded by armed sentries, and that officials, both civil and military, have an alertness which suggests they are conscious of hostile forces across the seas and of the possible presence of saboteurs and counter-revolutionaries at home. But soldiers were little in evidence in the cities and villages we visited, and the police of the cities generally carried no arms. One could sense in the people walking on the street, hurrying to their work, crowding into department stores, or returning from movie houses that intangible something which betokens confidence in the maintenance of law and order. Women moved about as freely as men. There were no black-outs, and neon lights livened up the streets at night.

THE strongest impression I received from the tour was of normality with perhaps a little more mass activity and enthusiasm than one would find under a longer-established regime. Obviously the new government has come to stay; all varieties and shades of opinion in China appeared convinced of this. At last the country has one government, one flag, one national anthem, one currency, and one system of law. I could feel the consciousness of strength this evoked in the most ordinary people I met. It was a great change from the old regime, people told me. Unless everyone was lying and my own eyes were deceived, the effectiveness, stability, and popularity of the new government of China are beyond all doubt. The magnificent, five-hour-long parade I saw on the national day in Peking confirmed this impression. It was like nothing I had ever seen before in India or outside.

Naturally, I was curious to know how the new government had become so popular. It was partly, of course, because of the contrast between the austerity, devotion to work, and honesty of the new Communist-led officialdom and the demoralization and corruption of the previous
